Notes for James G. Perry:
On July 18, 1850 James G. Perry began his enumeration of the citizens of Logan County, Virginia for the 7th decennial census by the federal government. As he started out, he encountered a cultural technology and population structure far different from what a traveler would now find. Roads were virtually non-existent, consisting mostly of rough paths trailing beside the watercourses. Rivers and creeks drained generally northward to the Ohio River and followed two main drainage systems: the Guyandotte River in the east and center, and the Tug Fork of The Big Sandy River on the west. Along each of these rivers a simple road ran roughly north and south alongside the river; a single intersecting route ran up from the mouth of Pigeon Creek on the Tug Fork east to the county seat on the Guyandotte River, then northeast to Boone County. Goods were carried in wagons on the three roads, by horseback along the trails, or in push canoes carrying cargoes of furs and ginseng up and down the rivers. The County of Logan was larger in 1850, comprising what would later include Mingo County on the west and the "foot" of Lincoln County to the north. Even so, the area spanned only about 45 miles from north to south and an equal distance east to west.
