The victims of 9/11

Introduction

This project began with a compelling story. A terrible tale that I, like most of the people on the planet, had been told at a terrible time -- when I was angry like I've never been angry before. A story told when I was suddenly scared for the lives of my children and utterly captured by an urgent need to protect them. It was a story, therefore, that I was more than ready -- eager actually -- to believe.

And believe it I did. For four years and eight months.

At which point, in late April of 2006, the same story -- seen more clearly in the context of its aftermath, and with certain previously hidden truths about it brought to light -- began to fall apart.

The film United 93 was released that month, and I was among the many thousands of Americans who considered ourselves intrepid enough to defy the widespread handwringing over whether it was "too soon" to revisit our national tragedy. I went to see it.

To review, United 93 is director Paul Greengrass' take on that mythical flight, the last to have been hijacked on September 11th. It is an amazing and difficult experience to take the ride -- a ride we have all imagined at some point in time. Blown away by it, and more than a little troubled by a few of the surprising details in the narrative, I went back a few nights later for a second look.

The film reminded me that I had flown from LA to NYC shortly after that day, and will always remember how blatantly some of the male passengers, myself included, circulated among our fellow travelers as we waited to board. We were looking into the various faces of this gathered group of strangers, and making quick assessments about who each of these people might actually be. There was a sense among us that a message was being sent: Anyone who means to do something bad to this flight will be challenged. The example of the reports of heroism among the United 93 passengers was still vividly etched in our minds.

The movie is shot in the casually observed style of a documentary, which contributes greatly to its power. The plot is designed to unfold in a time frame that corresponds to known, actual events of the day, as lived through and recorded by the thousands of people in positions of official responsibility across the eastern United States. These were people of good conscience who were taken by surprise by the attacks -- masked as they were by the six astoundingly coincidental, simultaneously staged "war games" which mimicked their every aspect -- and these good people struggled to respond coherently.

Several of the Air Traffic Controllers who actually manned the consoles on 9/11 play themselves in the movie -- brilliantly -- as does Ben Sliney, at the time the National Operations Manager of the FAA. Historians will note that September 11th was Mr. Sliney's very first day on the job.

There are many strangely haunting aspects to the chaos that marked our government's lack of useful response to the grandly executed brutality, and the movie mostly lays them out without comment or explanation. At one point early in the crisis an FAA official tells Sliney that he just called the "hijack control center" for help, but there was "no one at the desk and no back up..." I had heard reference to that particular oddity a couple of years before, but let it slip my mind.

"What exactly is the hijack control center?" I asked myself this time.

And how could such an apparently crucial post be left unmanned? Why hadn't that turned into a scandal? Wouldn't someone's head roll if they showed up late for work that day or otherwise blew that assignment? I wondered who took the fall for it and what might have been written about that little nugget.

Typing the words "hijack control center" into Google, I was immediately ushered into the ocean of speculation that has risen around so many aspects of the infamous day.

Though my skepticism meter was red-lining as I began to read -- four years and eight months, after all, is a long time to devote to a fiercely held point of view -- I decided to explore.

Two years of study have since gone by.

Along the way, I've encountered some of the wackiest thinking and most random butchering of logic and language a person could imagine. There is some preposterous bullshit out there; leaps to outrageous conclusions that only the most reckless psychic acrobat would dare to try. People can be so easily rendered irrational by their unsated rage and fear.

That being said...

There is no longer any doubt in my mind that the truth about what happened on 9/11 has been withheld from the American people and eventually misrepresented, in a profound and deeply troubling way.

The import of this cannot be overstated:

The course and very consciousness of our nation, and indeed the entire world, has shifted abruptly because of September 11th; modern history instantly and forcibly altered. There cannot be a crime that screams for a more thorough examination, and any patriotic American citizen might think that such an examination would have been undertaken immediately by our government. In this case, the citizen would be wrong.

When you familiarize yourself with some basic facts about the day -- and then read how those facts were dealt with in the official "report" of the reluctantly convened 9/11 Commission -- you quickly realize that the Commission had no intention of learning or reporting the truth.

It is quietly routine, for example, for military jets to scramble, engage, and divert errant airplanes in the skies above America. As 9/11 approached, this well practiced response was recurring roughly ten times a month, and was typically launched within minutes. Yet on the day of the attacks -- in a week which had been widely specified in advance to be particularly "dangerous" -- no intervention whatever was accomplished during a siege which lasted for more than an hour and three quarters.

The need for clarification of the reasons for such a bizarre and unlikely stand down is overwhelmingly obvious.

Yet when any judgment of the changing, contradictory, and incriminating explanations offered by those in charge could be avoided by the 9/11 Commission -- it was. When it couldn't be avoided -- it was often stripped of its implications by a bald-faced distortion of fact. No further questions asked.

To leave other considerations aside for a moment and focus only on the tragedy in New York: The murder of thousands of human beings and the destruction of the three towers -- the two that were hit by airplanes and the one that wasn't -- was surely the most widely watched and terrifying crime ever committed, and yet somehow most of us who witnessed it have been made to accept an explanation of how it happened which cannot possibly be true. I'm ashamed that I remained ignorant of that fact for such a long time.

Walking through lower Manhattan in the aftermath, I had been moved to tears repeatedly by the desperate messages of hope and the tattered pictures of lost loved ones and the families they left behind that seemed to cover every inch of every available wall and post. Pleas for information that might lead to miracles -- miracles that the totality of the destruction would not allow.

So much horror visited on so many people, in so short a time. The horrific gray powder covering everything; a powder so fine it looked like mayonnaise; its stench inescapable for blocks on end. It is nothing less than a crime against the remembered lives of the innocents -- each and every one of the human beings who were literally turned to dust before our eyes -- not to have demanded to know what caused such horror to happen.

Ominously for our future -- most of us do not understand science, and thus we may be lied to with transcendent confidence.

But the fact remains, that in the history of the world -- before and since September 11th -- no steel-framed building has ever collapsed due to fire. On that day, we were told it happened for the first time, and then, remarkably, for the second. What are the odds?

And finally -- God must've averted His eyes -- for a third time.

It is a telling observation that half of the American people do not have even a vague knowledge that World Trade Center Seven also exploded to its demise on 9/11 -- some seven hours after the failures of the twin towers. The math, of course, gets more difficult here: Two planes must somehow be made to knock down three buildings.

When asked, authorities first blamed several small fires of unknown origin. Building Seven, however, was possessed of a state of the art fire prevention system, due to the fact that its tenants included the CIA, the IRS, the Secret Service and Mayor Giuliani's $23 million Emergency Command Bunker -- not to mention the SEC, where millions of pages of precious data, including that of the federal investigations into the Enron and WorldCom scandals, were stored.

Then authorities instead blamed damage to one corner of the base of Building Seven, said to have been incurred from the destruction of Building One -- though the two stood 355 feet apart and another seven-story building stood between them. A single, authentic-looking photo was released, which showed such damage from an odd angle, but interestingly showed not a trace of the jagged rubble which supposedly caused it.

But no matter. As any lumberjack -- or toddler -- can tell you: a tall thing that falls due to a weakened bottom corner is going to tip right on over like a big tree. But the 47 Stories of Building Seven -- two seconds after multiple huge explosions were heard from inside it -- collapsed directly down into its own footprint in six and a half seconds.

How exactly did Usama bin Laden do that?

I look at the videos now, including the ones I watched on the day and so many times since, and think: "How could I have been so clueless... ?" The answer, of course: I was too stunned and too angry to think.

Shock and awe.

To use the favored terminology of Donald Rumsfeld.

And of course, so much of what has happened since has served to reinforce the paralyzing effect of that original dose of "terror" that two billion people, all over the world, were dealt on that indelible day. We have heard our leaders use the word "evil" a lot in the intervening years, applied to the various "terrorists" and "terrorist-harboring states" that are now so firmly focused in the cold efficiency of our military vengeance.

But truly the "evil" of 9/11 stands alone. Such a small word, in fact, fails to adequately convey the soul-searing depth and the world-wide breadth of so horrendous a series of events. A word like "monstrous" might come closer to describing it.

And who are the monsters? We've been told. But do we truly know?

Remarkably, the posing of those rather important questions is considered bad manners by a large number of smart and reasonable people. On more occasions than I can count, a person with whom I've begun to talk about 9/11 -- and the lies and the theft and the killing that have followed in its wake -- has quickly looked for an exit by summing up the unanswered questions as a "conspiracy theory." Though this moment does nothing to address the questions or end the killing -- it usually ends the conversation.

The fact that such a simple, two-word description can so consistently terminate uncomfortable thinking got me wondering again: Is there no such thing as an actual conspiracy? Is that why it's considered a mark of foolishness to even think about the possibility? Since thinking about possibilities, of course, leads to the formation, in the human mind -- of ideas? Which may sometimes be embarrassingly described as.... theories?

In an attempt to answer these questions, I decided to do a little investigating into the history of this curious phenomenon -- and to write about it. Maybe I'm wrong, but if you have children, or friends, or parents -- or hopes for the healthy future of our country -- I think you'll find this report worth reading.

The Business of Treason unfolds in twelve illustrated chapters which run less than 200 pages. A lot of material is covered fairly quickly, with references embedded throughout. In the early chapters, these references serve mostly as lists of connections to the outside sources of my research. As the chapters progress, the references expand to include a great deal of directly quoted material -- much of which will amaze you -- and all of which is linked. Afterward, a selection of various articles of interest is appended.

The piece is designed to provide an accessible approach to what is, for most of us, a challenging set of new ideas. If we are to continue to thrive, we have a lot to learn, and as you will hopefully agree, the time to "sit silently and hope America will be okay" has passed us by. With that in mind, my one request of you is this: If you value the effort -- please pass it along to others. You have my permission to copy The Business of Treason in its entirety; to print it, post it elsewhere on the web, share it in any way that you wish -- as long as you do not do so for profit. The pages through "Ben Franklin" are formatted to be printed onto three-hole paper, which can easily be entered into three-ring binders, for those who'd prefer to hold these words and pictures in their hands.

For gaining a solid understanding of the forces this document seeks to address, there is no substitute for reading the books and watching the DVDs which are cited in Reference 11.10. (You can call up this list at any time by jumping to page 902.) For many people, a pivotal shift arrives when they spend 90 minutes watching the movie, 911 Mysteries -- a vividly unforgettable piece of work. The address below provides a free stream of it, along with ordering info for the DVD, if you'd like to gather your friends and share it.

Thank you in advance for taking the time to explore. It's not an easy journey. But it is surely one we owe to the founders of our marvelous country; and to the millions of her citizens who have sacrificed so much over the years to honor America's profound and ongoing impact on the dreams and development of all humankind. Their voices call out to us today as if from the very soul of our nation -- and ask, most urgently, that we turn our eyes from all that is routine, and open our minds to the crucial tasks at hand.

As history will remind us in these pages, great lies will often last for decades, especially when profit is involved. But not forever. They cannot survive the attention of patriots.

Upon the occasion of his August 1977 death from heart disease at the tender age of 42, Elvis Presley was said to be consuming 65,000 calories a day.

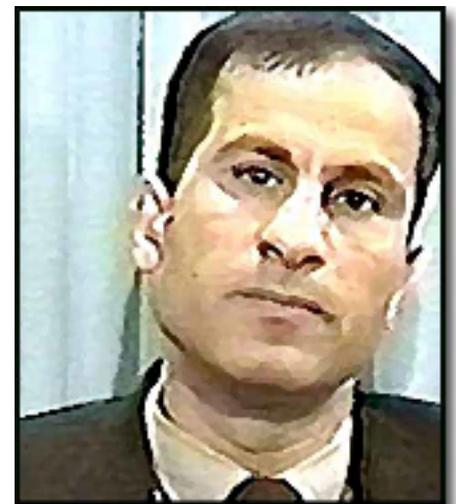

Though the recommended maximum intake for an adult male (according to the British) is 2550 calories a day; and though pumping 65,000 calories a day is the equivalent of wolfing down 108 Big Macs (which is widely considered dangerous); and though his bloated, stone cold corpse was identified at the scene in one of his many elegant Graceland restrooms -- many thousands of people consider Mr. Presley's reported passing a "fabrication." Scores of his fans around the world claim to have seen him in the years since -- alive and chillin' -- still and always -- the "King."

John Wilkes Booth was the Johnny Depp of his day -- America's most compelling actor. And yet, though widely successful and respected, he came to feel that acting was beneath him. With the Civil War raging toward resolution, and the Confederacy beginning to falter, the way of life that Booth had been raised to revere was clearly in terrible peril. His political opinions grew ever more vociferously anti-Lincoln and pro-slavery, stoking the desolation of the many friends (and hangers on) whose loyalties mirrored his own. Long drawn to the light, this celebrated "leading man" began to imagine for himself a role so grand as to deliver his legend to immortality.

In the spring of 1993, an Al-Qaeda operative by the name of Ali Mohamed provided extended security services for the American fund-raising tour of the soon-to-be infamous Ayman al-Zawahiri (Usama bin Laden's chubby right hand man). Only weeks before, Mohamed had been detained in Vancouver while attempting to pick up another suspected Al-Qaeda, a man who was carrying two false passports at the time. Upon his arrest, Mohamed instructed the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to call his "handler" at the FBI. They did, were told Mohamed worked for the Bureau, and that the Bureau would like to see him released. The Mounties complied immediately.

Originally published in 1905 by Sergei Nilus, The Protocols of the Elders of Zion is a document that has been quoted and referenced in countless countries for more than a hundred years. Currently most often in play in the Arab world, this treatise, said to delineate the “secret plans of the Jewish race to conquer the world,” was first used to political effect in the waning years of Tsarist Russia. Upon the revolutionary 1917 victory of the Bolsheviks, among whom were many Jews, the “protocols” experienced a surge of interest worldwide, which led to its debut in London, where it was first presented in an English translation in 1920 and titled, The Jewish Peril.

Henry Ford was among its most aggressive supporters in the United States, but it was Adolf Hitler who employed the piece to most devastating effect. In Mein Kampf, he quoted it as direct justification for his accusations against Jewry. Telegraphing the murder of millions that his National Socialist Party would soon undertake, Hitler declared, “...the whole existence of this people is based on a continuous lie...”

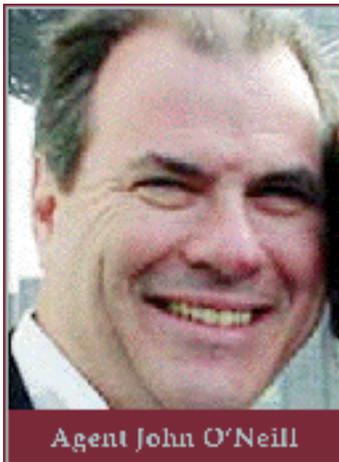

In October of 1990, the soulful, strikingly beautiful Nurse "Nayirah" (Nijirah al-Sabah) of Kuwait, was summoned to America to testify before the United States Congress about the horrors she had witnessed in a maternity ward at the hands of the invading Iraqi Army. “Nayirah” was only 15 years old at the time.

The abduction -- and subsequent beheading -- of reporter Daniel Pearl in Karachi, Pakistan in January of 2002 was a crime condemned throughout the western world as "beyond... comprehension," "senseless and pointless... an outrage," "an act of barbarism," and, for good measure, as foolishly "working counter" to the "goals" of the perpetrators. But was it? Astute observers, though reluctant to comment, could easily see how such a murder made sense -- if it were true, as time would make clear, that Mr. Pearl's commitment to uncovering hidden relationships in inconvenient places was getting perilously close to revealing the clandestine role of Pakistan in the horrors of 9/11.

In San Francisco, on February 14, 2003 (Valentine's Day) the web portal <http://www.insanereagan.org/> announced that scientists had finally discovered the long debated "missing link" between Saddam Hussein and Usama bin Laden.

Agent John O'Neill

In the late summer of 2001, FBI Agent John O'Neill, the bureau's leading expert and most effective investigator of Al-Qaeda, made his last public appearance at a counterterrorism conference held at a three-star hotel in the Spanish resort town of Salou. A few days later, hijacker-in-waiting Mohamed Atta checked into the same hotel. O'Neill returned to the states to find that someone in the FBI had leaked information about him that would immediately end his long and formidable career. Luckily, through his contacts in the intelligence community, another job opened up. On September 11, 2001, O'Neill reported for his second day of duty as the Director of Security for the World Trade Center. He never made it home.

"Sources" within the intelligence community claim that the "unnamed" former Secret Service Agent who had "begun to buckle" and took his own life in 1968, was in fact Emory Roberts, who'd become the subject of dark speculation as the man in charge of John Kennedy's security detail on November 22, 1963 in Dallas.

First he was surprised. Then he was annoyed. The Port Authority had notified its tenants, including Fiduciary Trust, where Scott Forbes was a Senior Database Administrator working on the 97th floor of the South Tower of the World Trade Center, that all power above the 50th floor would be shut down over the upcoming weekend, for a period lasting 36 hours. Such a thing had never before happened in the three and a half years that Scott, an Englishman, had worked in the tower. It was, in his words, "extreme and unprecedented." It meant carefully and methodically shutting down a computer network that was always up, thereby cutting off Fiduciary's connections to all clients and vendors, certifying that backup data stores were 100% valid before taking them offsite for security, and then standing by at the end of the 36 hours to bring everything back online in time for the opening of business on Monday. A similar "pain in the ass" process would have to be carried out by various other IT guys in various other offices up and down the tower. The official explanation for this widespread inconvenience was that the building needed to be "re-cabled." The weekend arrived. Around noon, normal lighting was suspended, security cameras stopped functioning, and electronic locks became non-operational, allowing unusually fluid access throughout the building to the men in jump suits now populating the place, their gear and toolboxes in hand. As the hours progressed and the workers went about their business, Scott paid them little mind. The date of this unprecedented suspension of security -- was Saturday, September 8th, 2001. It lasted through the night, and finished up sometime in the afternoon on Sunday.

The common thread running through the brief narratives above is that each introduces elements of a story that someone somewhere sometime has described as evidence of a conspiracy. Another thread running through them is that sometime somewhere and by someone -- if not by nearly everyone -- the very idea that any of these stories signaled even the possibility of any such underlying conspiracy has been attacked as ludicrous.

And on the last day of the sovereignty of the American Republic, if the last patriots who mourned her passing are able to gather to watch the sun go down, there will most probably still be disagreement among them about much of what actually happened -- as opposed to what merely seemed to have happened -- as she teetered through the last difficult days of her betrayal, and surrendered to the calming call of the long night.

It's in the nature of human beings, it seems, to perceive the meaning of things differently from one another, each of us filtering our sense of reality through a unique combination of direct experience, reverie, contemplative reasoning, fantasies born of pleasure and pain, joy and fear -- and perhaps most powerfully -- through well designed and carefully communicated stories, which may, if absorbed widely and deeply enough, take on the weight of myth. A weight which suffocates our capacity for thought.

Shunning the urge, then, to jump to absolutes, let's spend a few moments rummaging through the stories above with an eye toward measuring such judgments of their "conspiratorial bona fides" as history has rendered against them.....

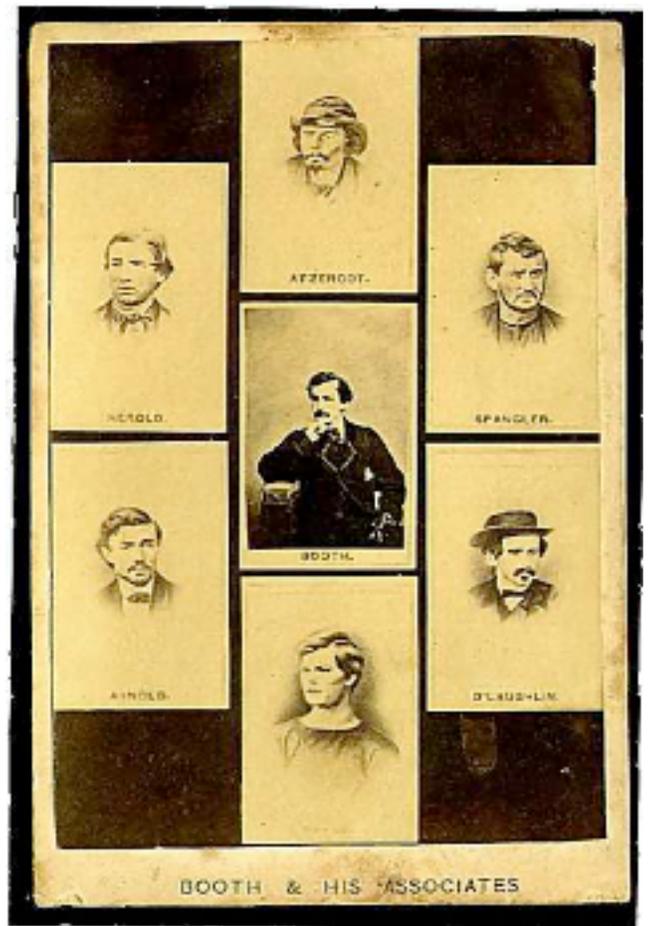

Given that he administered the gunshot as a paid member of the audience at Ford's Theatre -- before breaking his leg in a dramatic leap from the Presidential Box to the stage below -- John Wilkes Booth was no doubt the driving force behind the act which ended Abraham Lincoln's life. Without Booth's passion, the ambitions of the eight men who were hanged or imprisoned for assisting him would likely have died short of action. Dave Herold, for example, was known as a thoroughly ineffectual fellow. Though the details have been in contention from time to time -- regarding the identity and numbers of the plotters who may have escaped discovery in the aftermath -- there is no debate among historians that the actor, for all his grit and grandeur, had a lot of help. If they doubted her veracity, there were precious few voices among the members of Congress who listened to Nurse Nayirah's chilling tale with the courage to say so. She told of watching in horror as the occupying Iraqi Army stormed the maternity ward of Al Adan hospital in Kuwait City, where she -- a refugee -- was working as a volunteer. The rampaging soldiers dumped Kuwaiti infants out of their incubators and "on to the cold floor to die." Nayirah's testimony -- replete with heartfelt tears -- so outraged her audience that six Congressman and seven Senators referenced it as they debated whether to commit America to the Gulf War with Iraq. The resolution to do so passed the Senate by a vote of 52-47.

Someone somewhere, however, smelling something amiss in the timing of Nayirah's stellar performance, "theorized" an alternate version of reality. Upon research, it became apparent that she was actually only a "refugee" -- from the truth. She'd been in Paris at the time she claimed to have witnessed the Iraqis' barbarity in Kuwait City.

"Citizens for a Free Kuwait," it turned out, organized by the exiled Kuwaiti government, had hired the American public relations firm of Hill & Knowlton to create a campaign to gain support for a US counter strike against Iraq. (The same Hill & Knowlton, by the way, that until recently provided gainful employment for the wife of Senator and former Democratic Vice-Presidential candidate Joe Lieberman.) The firm's tab for its effective "Intervene in Kuwait" campaign was a cool $10.8 million, and the image of a tranquil, "just minding our own business" Kuwait -- devoid of any whiff of its heinous reputation for human rights abuses and its aggressive subjugation of women (which would have made Iraq look like a feminist paradise by comparison) was totally absorbed at all levels of American society. It was not revealed until later that the lovely young “Nurse Nayirah” was actually the daughter of the Kuwaiti ambassador to the United States. Two of the real maternity nurses in the ward, Frieda Construe-Nag and Myra Ancog Cooke, consequently explained to investigators that they had never seen the persuasive but fake nurse there and that the baby-dumping had never happened.

Credit for coaching Nayirah and inventing her heart wrenching story eventually came to grace the resumé of Lauri Fitz-Pegado, (left) later to become President Clinton’s Assistant Commerce Secretary. Ms. Fitz-Pegado also prepared Iraq-invasion testimony for the UN which was later discredited, and later still promoted a book about the “heroic” rescue of PFC Jessica Lynch. (1.2)

The fate of Mr. Presley provides a clear window into the enduring Power of Legend. If Legend were a boxer, it would always win the first few rounds of any fight with Reason.

I can still recall how happy it made me when the singer first cheated death -- that being the moribund state of his career in the mid-1960s after the Beatles-led British Invasion had revolutionized Rock. From the very edge of irrelevance, Elvis mounted an epically masterful “comeback” to Reclaim America in a national television special in December of 1968. The show was a slam-dunk triumph, both commercially and artistically, and people who had forgotten -- remembered. It launched a coast-to coast-tour of ecstatically received sold-out performances which proved beyond the shadow of any lingering doubt that the King Was Not Dead.

Time, of course -- and the King’s embrace of drug addiction -- would eventually kick back in and resume its deadly business.

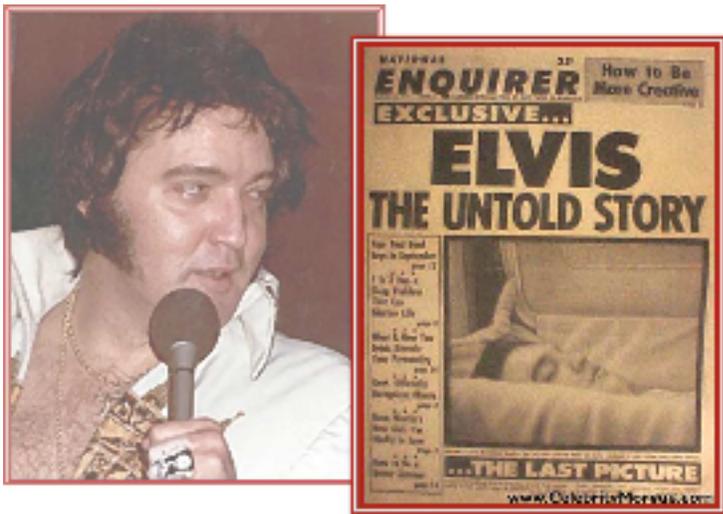

Optimistic by nature, I have always experienced difficulty when confronted by an ugly truth which seeks to undo the power of a cherished belief. It is a difficulty which is perfectly captured in this man’s story. And it is a difficulty which is very well understood by those in the communications industries whose job it is to nourish the cultural mythologies which mold our perceptions of reality.

Such myth-making work is accomplished in the shaping, withholding, and careful positioning of information. The deceptions inherent in this process are among the truths it seeks to obscure. Unpleasant claims about these deceptions, however, sometimes threaten to emerge from beyond the most carefully tended boundaries -- volatile ideas which, left unchecked, might prove to undermine the more comfortable assumptions that keep "the powers that be" so firmly empowered.

Dangerous, truth revealing ideas -- if they cannot be made to disappear -- must be deflected or discredited. It is in the process of associating them with other, more easily dismissible claims that ideas with such unwelcome truth in them are most efficiently rendered impotent. It is a tried and true technique -- known as the mounting and killing of a "Straw Man" in the parlance of the trade -- and anyone who wishes to better understand it would do well to investigate "logical fallacies" and "the art of debate."

When information first began to emerge that the Bush Administration had processed specific and detailed intelligence predicting 9/11 -- but failed to act on it -- Presidential Press Secretary Ari Fleischer was asked point blank to comment. Without even drawing an extra breath, Fleischer retorted that people who believed such information were no doubt members of the "Grassy Knoll Society" -- instantly equating doubts about 9/11 with those of the die-hard students of tragedy (mocked for decades as "Conspiracy Nuts") who've never quite made peace with the lies attending the 1963 murder of President Kennedy. Ari's instant deflection was not born of a lack of practice.

The fact that the administration was eventually moved to admit that such reports about 9/11 were true -- and retreated instead to a claim that there was simply "too much" intelligence -- put not the slightest dent in the highly calibrated machinery of such idea management. Attempts to discredit legitimate claims of deception by associating them with previously discredited claims -- or better yet, ludicrous ones -- continues unabated. For years, the nicely modulated flow of such Bad Brain Candy as "Elvis's Ongoing Secret Permanent Vacation" has played a small but dependable role in this process.

Amazing "facts" which have kept the King Alive include the observation that his coffin weighed some 900 pounds -- most likely explained by the presence of a wax dummy inside which could not be kept from melting except for the thoughtful inclusion of a very heavy electric fan to keep it cool.

And the "sightings" have never stopped. According to the testimony of a very lucky fan from Virginia, Mr. Presley's Legendary Generosity -- and his Excellent Taste -- have not wavered a bit since his passing. A Mr. Moon Duepre explained that he had surprised Elvis -- singing alone in an abandoned schoolhouse -- and that The King, in gratitude for Moon's promise not to blow his cover, had sent him off with instructions to visit his local car dealer the next day. There, his gift from Elvis -- a pre-paid Cadillac -- was waiting for him to drive away in. Which is exactly what he did, Moon said: "I put 214,000 miles on it before it quit on me."

Rumors that Ari Fleischer has taken a job at Elvisalive.com are probably not true, but it might be interesting to see who is manning the computers at the websites churning out stories that the US Moon Landing Was Staged, and the various hilarious reports (which no one of sound mind would ever believe, of course) that Space Aliens have taken to choosing sides in America's Presidential Elections.

It does get confusing for some, however, when they read of President Bush's decision to continue the decades-long US governmental policy of exempting Groom Lake -- more commonly known as Area 51 of "UFO Landing" fame -- from environmental laws which might force the release of classified documents pertaining to its history.

And the President only muddies the waters further when he labels an important passage in his budget proposal -- as he did in 2003 -- with the question: "Where are the Real Space Aliens?"

A certain symmetry eventually descends on all these tales, of course. With a sense of coming full circle, perhaps, we read that Elvis was actually abducted by the aliens our President seems to be looking for, but being the King, got even by impregnating them. Apparently Marilyn Monroe is out there among the aliens as well, so hopefully the King won't be lonely. (1.3)

All in good fun, of course.

Nothing To Be Taken Seriously.

One year after the first English translation of The Protocols of the Elders of Zion appeared in print, the London Times exposed it as a fraud -- and a clumsy one at that. In a three-part series of articles that ran from August 16 through 18, 1921, Times correspondent Philip Graves, acting on a tip from a gentleman by the name of Lucien Wolf, completely demolished any further claim to the Protocols' veracity.

The hate-stoking piece had been promoted as the stealthily acquired "minutes of a meeting" of Jewish leaders at the first Zionist Congress in Basel, Switzerland, in 1897, in which “the Jews” plotted to take over the world. Graves illustrated how the record of that “meeting” was actually lifted -- almost phrase by phrase -- from a book titled Dialogue aux enfers entre Machiavel et Montesquieu (Dialogues in Hell between Machiavelli and Montesquieu), by the French satirist Maurice Joly, which had been published more than fifty years earlier. Joly’s satire sought to draw attention to the excesses of Napoleon III by inserting the Emperor’s supposed strategies for domination and suppression into the mouth of an imagined Machiavelli. It had nothing to do with -- and made no mention of -- Jews. Though the piece remained obscure (and Joly was thrown in jail for having written it), its reincarnation as the leading document of worldwide anti-Jewish propaganda would be anything but.

Niccolò Machiavelli Master of the dark arts

An illustration of the lack of subtlety that defined the plagiarism of Joly’s original ideas would be...

Dialogues, p. 43:—

Machiavelli: “You do not know the unbounded meanness of the peoples... groveling before force, pitiless towards the weak, implacable to faults, indulgent to crimes, incapable of supporting the contradictions of a free régime, and patient to the point of martyrdom under the violence of an audacious despotism... giving themselves masters whom they pardon for deeds for the least of which they would have beheaded twenty constitutional kings.”

Protocols, p. 15:—

Jewish Leader: “In their intense meanness the Christian peoples help our independence—when kneeling they crouch before power; when they are pitiless towards the weak; merciless in dealing with faults, and lenient to crimes; when they refuse to recognize the contradictions of freedom; when they are patient to the degree of martyrdom in bearing with the violence of an audacious despotism. At the hands of their present dictators, Premiers, and ministers, they endure abuses for the smallest of which they would have murdered twenty kings.”

Though the Protocols had already been exposed as a hoax by the time Adolf Hitler received his copy, the Fuhrer pretended otherwise. Hitler, of course, never wavered from his stance, since the "Jewish problem" was the issue that disguised, impassioned and excused so much of his breathtaking epoch of terror.

The Protocols of the Elders of Zion is perceived by many to have been the first example of a modern conspiracy theory, and it is certainly the most egregious example of the horrific power of such a theory unchecked, and malignantly employed. This was a conspiracy theory that was proven to have been a heinous lie.

The flip side of the coin, of course, is that the conspiracy behind the creation of this conspiracy theory -- was very real.

Had there been, among the common populace of the day, the knowledge, will, energy and means to undo these real conspirators before their Big Lie metastasized into Enduring Legend -- eleven million lives might have been saved.

Philip Graves, the journalist who exposed the conspiracy, was eloquent regarding the unparalleled magnitude of the crime...

"The Protocols" was invented with the deliberate intent to instill an imaginary and racist view of what caused problems in the world. The fact that we simply do not have a word in English (or for that matter in Italian, German, or French, at least that we could think of) to describe this level of deceit is part of the reason that "The Protocols" could work. People simply do not expect to be lied to on such a scale.....

It is so hard to conceive, let alone believe, that we don't have words for it."

The nexus of this unprecedentedly vicious undertaking was embedded within the Imperial Russian Secret Service -- the dreaded Okhranka.

Sergei Nilus, whose name appeared as publisher of the Protocols -- and who told different versions of how he acquired it upon the occasion of each of its first three printings -- was a Tsarist Official in Moscow with ties both to the church and the secret service.

A woman by the name of Yuliana Glinka was an accessory to the plot. Ms. Glinka was the well-born daughter of a diplomat, and known to have been a fervent disciple of the legendary "occultist" Madame Helena Blavatsky (left). It was Ms. Glinka who was described in the "discovery story" as having "acquired" the Protocols in France, from whence she was said to have smuggled them back to Russia and delivered them to Sergei Nilus.

Russian historian Mikhail Lepekhine credits the work of the actual forgery to the double-agent Mathieu Golovinski, a then infamous mover in the world of espionage and political propaganda. Assistance in the process was credited to an Okhranka agent by the name of Pyotr Rachkovsky (described as Ms. Glinka's paramour), and to another Okhranka agent by the name of Ivan Manusevich. The efforts of this group were successful beyond their wildest hopes. Their Epic Lie would spur and nurture an irrational hatred that would eventually unleash a siege of barbarity beyond imagining.

*Enablers of the Holocaust Rachkovsky, Golovinsky, and

As fortune would have it, Golovinski had worked for a time in Paris at Le Figaro, where he was introduced to a colleague by the name of Charles Joly -- the son of the man who had written the original "Machiavelli in Hell" piece from which the "Protocols" would be plagiarized.

The younger Joly would later make a trip to Russia around the time of the first known public mention of the soon-to-be-launched scandal. Russian journalist Mikhail Menshikov, in his regular newspaper column, "Letters to Neighbors," mentioned having heard about "The Protocols" from Yuliana Glinka, and titled his article, "Plots Against Humanity." Within months of this "teaser," The Protocols of the Elders of Zion would be published and condemned, and history -- by way of the true conspiracy behind the false one -- changed forever. (1.4)

John Fitzgerald Kennedy
35th President of the United States
Sworn to Duty: January 20, 1961
Assassinated: November 22, 1963

As President John F. Kennedy's motorcade was leaving Love Field to drive into Dallas on November 22, 1963, Head Secret Service Agent Emory Roberts was reported to have pulled Agent Henry Rybka away from the rear bumper of the President's limousine, even though "Wanted for Treason" posters of JFK had been distributed throughout the city on the preceding day, death threats were in the wind, and the President was riding in an open convertible without the protection of a "bubbletop."

Moments later, when the shots that would end the President's life began ringing out, Agent Roberts ordered the President's sworn protectors "not to move." Agent Clinton Hill, who was assigned to Jackie Kennedy's detail, and was present only at her personal request, was the one agent to defy that instruction and move to the President's car.

Seconds later, as the Presidential Motorcade sped to Dallas' Parkland Memorial Hospital, Agent Roberts made a radio transmission to Vice-President Lyndon Johnson's car in which he stated, "They got him. They got him."

One Moment

Two Men / Two Cars

One Grabbing his Throat in the Throes of his Final Thoughts

It was not until years later that video surfaced to verify the foreshadowing event: Agent Roberts standing up from his seat in the moving follow-up car as it departed Love Field Airport, and commanding Agent Rybka to withdraw. The video images of Agent Rybka's pointed -- and repeated -- protests of this order seem all the more poignant in light of what we now know was to come. Though questions surrounded the actions -- and obvious failure -- of the US Secret Service on the fateful day, Agent Roberts was never interviewed by the Warren Commission. (2.1)

The Commission would conclude that Lee Harvey Oswald (who was himself murdered two days later while in the care of the Dallas Police Department) had plotted and carried out the assassination of President Kennedy without confederates, firing down (and through trees) with rapid, deadly accuracy on the President from his "Sniper's Nest" on the sixth floor of the Texas School Book Depository. (2.2)

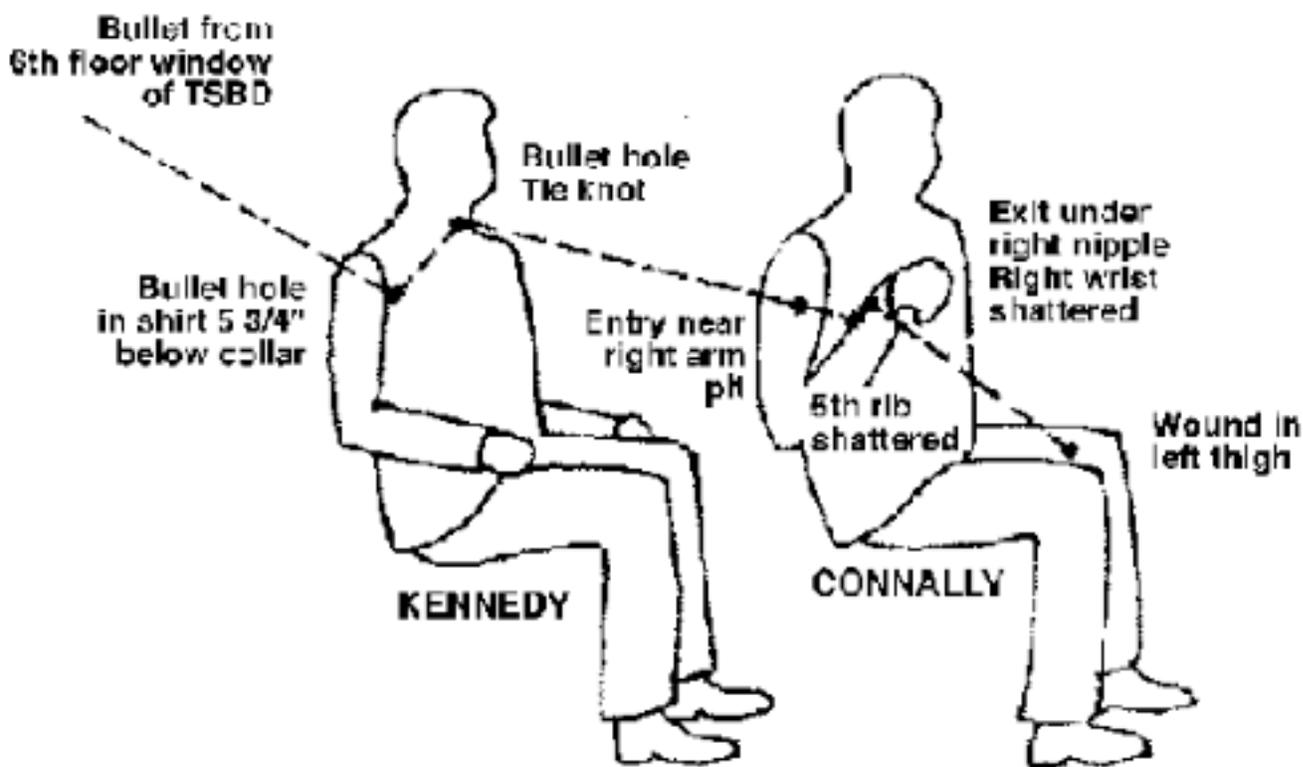

Among the Commission's more intriguing findings (reminiscent to some of Satam Al Suqami's passport turning up clean amidst the reeking muck that covered 9/11 Manhattan) was the loose bullet which was supposedly discovered lying on the stretcher of Texas Governor John Connally, who had also been wounded in the attack, as he was being admitted to Parkland Memorial. It was this bullet (below) that was later described by the Warren Commission as having entered the President's back, deflected upward out his throat, then veered downward again to penetrate Governor Connally's right armpit, plunging down to shatter his fifth right rib, then exiting below his right nipple and slamming into and out of his right wrist, shattering it in the process, then diving downward again to pierce his left thigh. Through all of which -- the bullet -- like no other similarly lethal (and acrobatic) bullet ever observed, retained its original shape perfectly.

Since all these wounds occurred close to simultaneously, had more than one bullet caused them, the concept of Oswald as the “lone assassin” would have collapsed. In truth, the Commission was hamstrung by its hidden mandate, which was -- as revealed by documents released many years later -- to conclude that Oswald acted alone.

An example of what the “thorough and impartial” investigation faced at its inception was the opening statement of this memorandum from Deputy US Attorney General Nicholas Katzenbach (2.3), written three days after the murder of Kennedy and one day after the murder of Oswald:

“The public must be satisfied that Oswald was the assassin; that he did not have confederates that are still at large...”

Hence, the Commission’s determination to cling to the fantasy of the “magic bullet.”

It was also this bullet that tied Lee Harvey Oswald to the cheap, mail-order rifle that he supposedly left behind a cardboard box as he fled his assassin’s perch. The gun, a Mannlicher-Carcano, was tested for accuracy by the FBI and found to be...

“Inaccurate from 15 yards... During efforts, supervised by the FBI – to duplicate the shooting accuracy allegedly achieved – no FBI, military or civilian (National Rifle Association) expert was ever able to match Oswald’s performance.”

And again, starkly reminiscent of the reviews offered of the 9/11 hijackers by their flight instructors (“Attention span of zero,” “Didn’t live up to standards,” “Incompetence at the controls,” “Advised to quit,” “English horrible... mechanical skills worse,”) it should be noted that Lee Harvey Oswald was a “Non-Qualifier” on the rifle range as a member of the US Marine Corps. (2.4)

In finding that Lee Harvey Oswald “acted alone,” the Warren Commission classified millions of pages of documents that pertained to the assassination investigation, and designated that they remain sealed. This raised an obvious question: Why? It fueled rampant speculation that the truth was being hidden, as to who and/or what was really behind the murder of the American President.

In 1975, after two more “lone gunmen” had ended the powerful lives and iconoclastic political careers of Robert Kennedy and Martin Luther King, and two more notably unconvincing “investigations” had come and gone, Congress yielded to insistent public pressure and convened its own inquiries.

The first, chaired by Senator Frank Church, looked into many long claimed abuses against the civil rights of American citizens on the part of the CIA and the FBI -- and found many of these accusations against the agencies to be true, noting that the checks and balances supposedly built into the American system of government were “failing to function.” (2.5)

The Church Committee eventually gave birth to the House Select Committee on Assassinations.

That committee uncovered evidence, among other damning information, that the CIA had suppressed knowledge of someone identified as “Oswald” making a late summer trip to Mexico City, during which he visited the Cuban and Soviet Embassies, purportedly in a vain attempt to secure a visa. Special Agent James Hosty, who headed the Oswald investigation for the FBI, admitted that the Bureau was aware that this Oswald character, while in Mexico City, had met with Valery Vladimirovich Kostikov, the Soviet Vice Consul. And that Mr. Kostikov was -- in the Bureau’s description -- the agent “in charge of assassinations” for the KGB. (2.6)

Further compromising the credibility of the original “investigation,” it was disclosed that Lyndon Johnson, the newly sworn President, had been informed by FBI Chief J. Edgar Hoover on the day after Kennedy’s assassination that the CIA had photographed and recorded this “Oswald” in Mexico City, only to discover that the man had somehow morphed into an impostor. It further developed that someone impersonating “Oswald” had been making himself memorable all around Dallas in the weeks preceding Kennedy’s murder -- shopping for guns, cashing big checks and the like -- at one point even sporting a very much pregnant-looking version of Oswald’s Russian wife, Marina. None of this, of course, was revealed in 1963, though known at the highest levels of government.

..... LBJ then asked, "Have you established any more about the visit to the Soviet Embassy in Mexico in September," an event of no little interest to the inner circles of government. Hoover replied, "No, that's one angle that's very confusing for this reason. We have up here the tape and the photograph of the man who was at the Soviet Embassy, using Oswald's name. The picture and the tape do not correspond to this man's voice, nor to his appearance. In other words, it appears that there is a second person who was at the Soviet Embassy down there." (2.7)

The CIA, Drug Traffic, and Oswald in Mexico
by Peter Dale Scott
(Former Diplomat and Lifelong JFK Researcher)

The CIA and FBI conspired to suppress a major clue to the existence of a pre-assassination conspiracy. This was that an unknown person had falsely presented himself as Lee Oswald in a phone call to the Soviet Embassy in Mexico City. The FBI initially reported that the person making the recorded call "was not Lee Harvey Oswald." Later the FBI and CIA conspired, swiftly and clumsily, to conceal both the falsity of the impersonation and the fact that FBI agents had exposed the falsehood by listening to the tape. The Warren Commission learned nothing about these two facts.

It is important to understand that this suppression was entirely consistent with intelligence priorities of the period. This important clue had been planted in the midst of one of the most sensitive CIA operations in the 1960s: its largest intercept operation against the telephones of an important Soviet base [Cuba]. One can assume that this clue was planted by conspirators who knew that the CIA response would be to suppress the truth. As a result the CIA protected its sources and methods (in accordance with the responsibilities enumerated in its enabling statute). The result was obstruction of justice in a crime of the highest political significance.

In an open society, all of the Oswald facts and allegations would have reached the Warren Commission, whether or not they were true. The absence of objective evaluation and review allowed these facts and allegations about Oswald in Mexico to become enabling instruments of power: first to create the Warren Commission, and later to curtail its investigations.

The power of these covert agencies to control US politics through the manipulation of truth is only one more reason for us to refer to them as kryptocracies, agencies of government which (in contrast to conventional bureaucracies) operate secretly and are not accountable for their actions and procedures. At this stage, I shall refer to kryptocracies in the plural, to make it clear that I am not talking about some single omnipotent Secret Team. On the contrary, we shall see... that different kryptocracies or intelligence agencies, and even different branches within these agencies, were in conflict with each other over the matters raised by Lee Harvey Oswald. (Emphasis added)

The point is rather that, in major powers like the United States, bureaucratic behavior, which in principle is publicly recorded and accountable, is in some respects determined by the kryptocratic behavior at its center, which is not. As we shall see in the following pages, one of the important sources of the kryptocracies' power is their ability to falsify their own records, without fear of outside correction...

Deep Politics III: The CIA, Drug Traffic, and Oswald in Mexico by Peter Dale Scott

Nor did the Warren Commission take a serious look at the web of “coincidental” relationships that ran like so much barbed wire from the US government Intelligence agencies, through angry international banking interests, and into and around the anti-Castro and anti-Kennedy movements of the day. These movements very obviously defined the nasty underbelly of political ferment raging against the President -- fueled by rich and powerful men in danger of losing position to Kennedy’s revolutionary plans for reform.

Lee Harvey Oswald was known by and/or connected to “players” in a shockingly high percentage of these elements. The story of his life, really, is a litany rife with random, criminal, covert implication, much of it poured out in the apparent service of inexplicably contradictory ideas and organizations of grand (though conflicting) political intent. As is so often the case with intelligence operatives, the question of which cross was the original -- and which the double (or triple) -- remains tantalizingly obscure. Clearly though, from the earliest days of his youth, the fatherless Oswald was living among people who were operating in the sphere of organized crime, most notably his uncle, Charles “Dutz” Murret, an ex-prize fighter and bookie beholden to Carlos Marcello (left) -- at the time the head of the Mafia in New Orleans.

The teenage Oswald’s membership in the Civil Air Patrol led to his recruitment into the Marine Corps at the age of 17. He soon became a radar specialist, and earned a security clearance. He was assigned to the Atsugi Air Base in Japan -- a highly secure location which functioned as the CIA’s Central Far East Station and was the base from which the United States launched its U2 surveillance flights over the USSR.

Oswald was mocked by his fellow Marines for his openly expressed “love of Marxism” and his diligent study of Russian. Seven months after the Marine Corps tested him for proficiency in the language -- he purportedly “defected” to the Soviet Union. (2.8)

These paradoxical dynamics continued to manifest during the course of his exile, which included such oddities as a less than convincing “suicide” attempt upon the KGB’s recommendation to deny his application for asylum; a public renunciation of his American citizenship at the US Embassy (which kept his passport out of Russian hands); interviews with members of the international press about his loathing for capitalism and his high level of valuable knowledge of US Military radar secrets which generated, according to their own records -- no particular interest on the part of the CIA.

Upon becoming “disillusioned” shortly thereafter by the drab routine of his work life in Minsk, Oswald (at left, chilling cool with his Soviet co-workers) managed to exit the country with his new Russian wife and return to the United States with relative ease.

Marina Oswald, near left, with Priscilla Johnson. Ms. Johnson was a State Department official at the American Embassy during Oswald’s stay in the Soviet Union.

She was the source of most of what the American press -- and public -- came to learn about the personal life of Lee Harvey Oswald. The House Select Committee on Assassinations noted her formal application, in 1952, for work with the CIA and her subsequent provision of “cultural and literary” information for the Agency. A declassified State Department memo to the FBI described her contact with Oswald in Russia as “official business.”

On March 22, 1978, before the House Select Committee on Assassinations, swore under oath that he believed Lee Harvey Oswald was a "regular employee" of the Central Intelligence Agency, receiving "a full-time salary for agent work, for doing CIA operational work," a belief corroborated by conversations with "dozens, literally dozens" of CIA employees. Wilcott testified that he was told by a CIA Case Officer that he (Wilcott) had personally disbursed funds for "the Oswald project or for Oswald." In the excerpt below, Wilcott is questioned by Representative (now Senator) Christopher Dodd. The full transcript of this testimony resides at www.jfklancer.com. It was withheld from public scrutiny for 20 years.

Former CIA Accountant James B. Wilcott

Mr. Dodd: [...] You were not aware at the time you made the disbursement that it was, in fact, an Oswald project?

Mr. Wilcott: That is correct, sir.

Mr. Dodd: It would have been a cryptonym and he was telling you, you had, in fact, made a disbursement?

Mr. Wilcott: Yes, sir.

Mr. Dodd: And this would have been, now, shortly after the assassination?

Mr. Wilcott: Yes, sir.

Mr. Dodd: Talking about hours afterwards or a day afterwards?

Mr. Wilcott: It was at least a matter of weeks and perhaps as much as three months after.

Mr. Dodd: After the assassination actually occurred?

Mr. Wilcott: Yes.

Mr. Dodd: When you were told all of this?

Mr. Wilcott: Yes.

Mr. Dodd: And it includes the information that Oswald was an agent?

Mr. Wilcott: Yes, sir.

Mr. Dodd: Was he described as an agent to you or was he described as an operative or a paid informant?

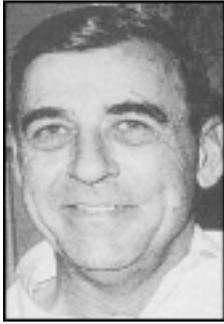

Mr. Wilcott: No, sir; he was described to me as an agent and I was led to believe, from the conversations that he was an agent.

Mr. Dodd: As a point of information, are people who work within the Agency fairly careful in their language in describing what the category of certain people are, who work for the Agency?

Mr. Wilcott: Generally so, I would say, at the time.

Mr. Dodd: And it is your clear recollection that he was described as an agent?

Mr. Wilcott: Yes, sir.

General Edwin Walker was an ultra right-wing activist who'd faced off against JFK over integration and whose hatred of the President was forged in Kennedy's subsequent termination of his military career. On April 10th, 1963, someone took a shot at Walker (left) from across the street outside his Dallas home. Though the General was a stationary target at the time -- sitting at his desk -- the shot missed. Marina Oswald would later claim that her husband had confessed to the crime. An eyewitness, however, noted that the two men who fled the scene that night left in two different automobiles. Lee had never learned to drive. (3.1)

Back in New Orleans for the summer, Oswald hooked up with a young cancer researcher by the name of Judyth Baker, whom he quickly introduced to his mentor, David Ferrie. (Ferrie had been the leader of the Civil Air Patrol Unit out of which Oswald became a Marine.) Baker and Oswald held cover jobs at the Reily Coffee Company during this time. With Lee acting as a courier and Ferrie consulting, Baker worked on a project to isolate a form of cancer virulent enough to function as an injectable -- and dependable -- bioweapon. The project, funded by the CIA, overseen by Dr. Alton Ochsner and run by Dr. Mary Sherman -- had Fidel Castro in mind. (3.2)

And yet -- the image of Oswald as a "Marxist" was continually tended. In August he visited a store managed by Carlos Bringuier, a Cuban refugee and leader of an avid anti-Castro group, and was reported to have expressed an interest in joining the struggle to topple the Communist dictator. Oswald supposedly boasted of his Marine Corps training in guerilla warfare and returned the next day to leave his Guidebook for Marines with Bringuier. A few days later, however, a friend of Bringuier saw Oswald on the street passing out pro-Castro "Fair Play for Cuba" leaflets -- in the presence of television cameras -- not far from Bringuier's store. When Bringuier arrived on the scene, he loudly confronted Oswald. The scene garnered a lot of local media attention, and got Oswald, Bringuier and his friends arrested for disturbing the peace. Immediately thereafter, at his own request -- Oswald was visited in jail by an FBI agent. (3.3)

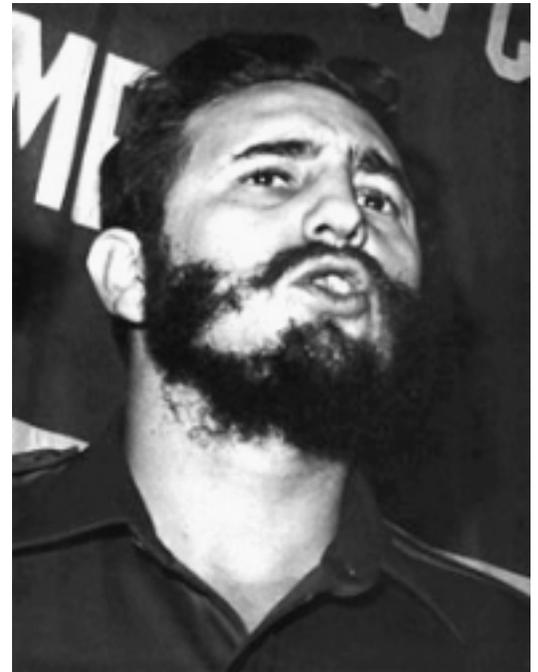

Within days of his release Oswald was debating the very same Bringuier (left) about Castro and Cuba on a local radio program. Days after that, he was back on the streets passing out his leaflets, this time in front of the International Trade Mart, which was run by the devoutly right-wing, anti-Castro businessman Clay Shaw, (3.4) whom CIA director Richard Helms, in 1979, admitted under oath had been a “contact” of the CIA. Among Oswald’s fellow Leaflet-Spewing “Castro Lovers” on this day was one Chauncey Holt, the Meyer Lansky-connected master forger who operated out of the CIA’s “Document Mill” in Los Angeles. (This same Mr. Holt would later be discovered hiding in a weapons-laden railroad car behind the Grassy Knoll in Dealey Plaza on the day of Kennedy’s assassination -- from which he was perp-walked into custody -- but released without being interrogated, photographed or fingerprinted by the Dallas PD.) (3.5)

Fidel Castro

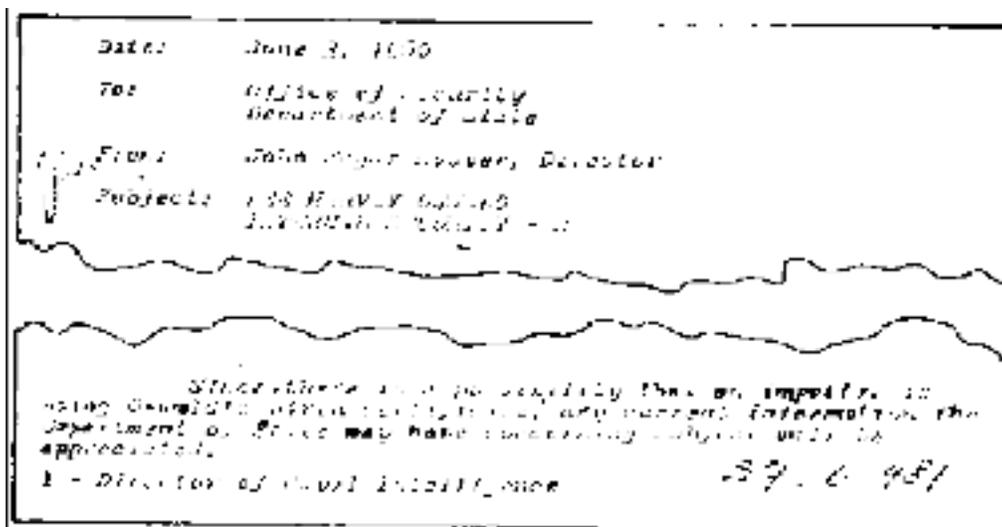

It was not until recently, with the further declassification of JFK related documents, that the full scope of the CIA’s obstruction of the Warren Commission and the House Select Committee on Assassinations (HSCA) would become clear. Though the agency had held otherwise whenever inquiries were made, internal memos revealed that it was in fact actively pursuing the assassination of Fidel Castro at the time of President Kennedy’s murder; and that the agency was financially responsible for the existence of Carlos Bringuier’s anti-Castro organization, the DRE (Directorio Revolucionario Estudiantil) at the time Oswald was doing his media drama with the group.

When the HSCA, trying to clarify Oswald’s true function among these people, sought to examine the CIA’s relevant files on the period, the agency, professing its willingness to “cooperate fully,” assigned one George Joannides to facilitate the task. The CIA’s cooperation, however, fell short of disclosing that this same Joannides had also been the agency’s point man with the DRE during the 1963 run up to Kennedy’s assassination.

Thus, after first lying to investigators by claiming the CIA had no relationship to this group at the time, it then brought (out of retirement) the man who was in fact conducting that very relationship -- and placed him in a position to control the Congressional inquiry. Needless to say, since this deception was not discovered at the time, there were no files on the DRE and Oswald's relationship to it to be found.

In another belatedly clarifying development, a memo from J. Edgar Hoover dated June 3, 1960, and titled: LEE HARVEY OSWALD -- INTERNAL SECURITY, revealed that the FBI was concerned that an "impostor" may have been using Oswald's birth certificate while the future assassin was busy being a defector in Russia.

Date: June 3, 1960

To: Office of Security
Department of State

From: John Edgar Hoover, Director

Subject: LEE HARVEY OSWALD
-- INTERNAL SECURITY

Since there is a possibility that an impostor is using Oswald's birth certificate, any current information the Department of State may have concerning the subject will be appreciated.

1 - Director of Naval Intelligence

This document speaks very clearly to the evidence that would later develop of two different men using the "Oswald" identity prior to the President's murder. (3.6) And, of course, given that it was written by the FBI Director himself, it also exposed the lie behind the Bureau's claims that Lee Harvey Oswald was of little or no interest to them at the time. Though the Warren Commission would later go out of its way to avoid the issue -- Oswald was in fact connected not only to the CIA, but to the FBI as well. (3.7)

His network of relationships was riddled with connections to others also identified to have been deeply involved with organized crime and covert intelligence activity. Beyond his family and anti-Castro connections to Carlos Marcello, Oswald was often observed socializing and working alongside and/or "against" such "dark ops" actors as the aforementioned Bringuier, Shaw, and Ferrie, and the well known Guy Bannister.

Bannister, tellingly -- who was a highly successful, rabidly reactionary, ex-management level FBI, anti-Communist, anti-Civil Rights Movement, John Birch Society-affiliated Castro Assassination Plotter -- somehow found it in his heart to give the dead broke, Puny Freak Loner Pro-Castro Marxist Leaflet-Passing-Out Oswald a break.

According to Dan Campbell, a senior investigator at Bannister's New Orleans Private Detective Firm, Bannister (left) immediately assigned Oswald an office in the firm's suite when the little man walked in off the street. Oswald used the back door to Bannister's offices as his address on the "Fair Play for Cuba" leaflets. (3.8)

District Attorney Jim Garrison's investigation of the role Oswald and these various other New Orleans based operatives played in Kennedy's assassination shone a great deal of light on the intelligence associations of the group -- and put a great deal of pressure on them. In February of 1967 a frightened David Ferrie admitted to Garrison's investigators that he had indeed done CIA contract work and revealed Clay Shaw's connections to the agency as well. Four days later Ferrie was found dead, two unsigned suicide notes beside his body. The cause of death was described as a "brain aneurysm." (3.9)

Clockwise from upper left: Bannister, Oswald, Ferrie and Shaw. Shaw, an ex-Major General in the U.S. Army, is the only one of these men who did not die young -- and abruptly.

The day after Ferrie's death, his friend Eladio Del Valle -- an exiled anti-Castro Cuban who was implicated in the assassination and whom Garrison had been trying locate for questioning -- was found murdered by a close-range gunshot to the head. (3.10)

Then there is the matter of the Dallas-based George De Mohrenschildt, the once wealthy, Russian born nobleman who became Oswald's "best friend" upon Lee's return to America from the Soviet Union, their lack of compatibility in terms of education, culture, and social standing notwithstanding.

De Mohrenschildt's resumé included a claimed part in a pro-Nazi plot to kill Joseph Stalin, and reported connections to both the German and French intelligence services (according to British intelligence, which warned US intelligence of these connections upon De Mohrenschildt's emigration to America). After the Second World War, he settled in Dallas and went to work for oil baron Clint Murchison.

De Mohrenschildt introduced the Oswalds to Ruth Paine, who became their landlady. A few weeks before the President's visit, Ms. Paine helped Lee get a job at the Texas School Book Depository. It's not clear whether Oswald knew of Ms. Paine's connections -- through her father and brother-in-law -- to the CIA.

Meanwhile, De Mohrenschildt had moved to Haiti. After Kennedy's murder, he was called as a witness by the Warren Commission, at which time he was moved to state under oath that he "believed he had discussed" Oswald prior to the assassination with Dallas CIA operative J. Walton Moore.

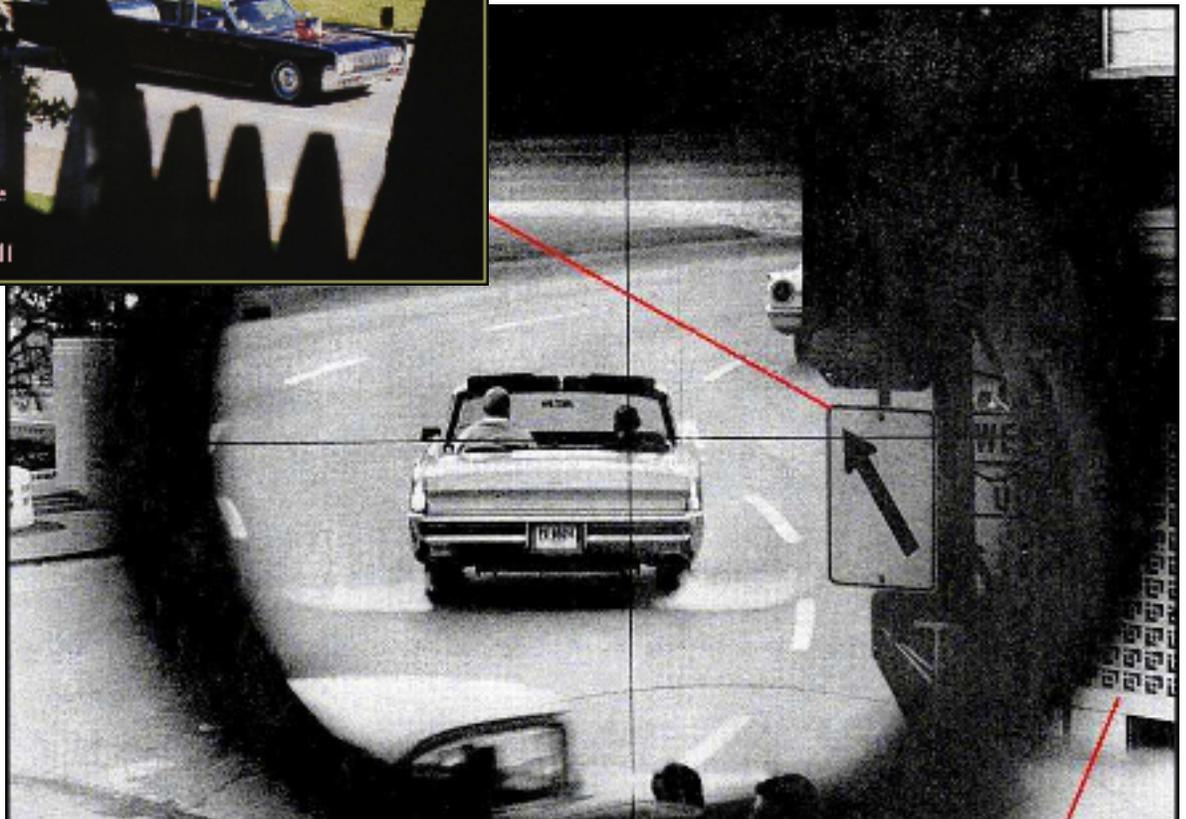

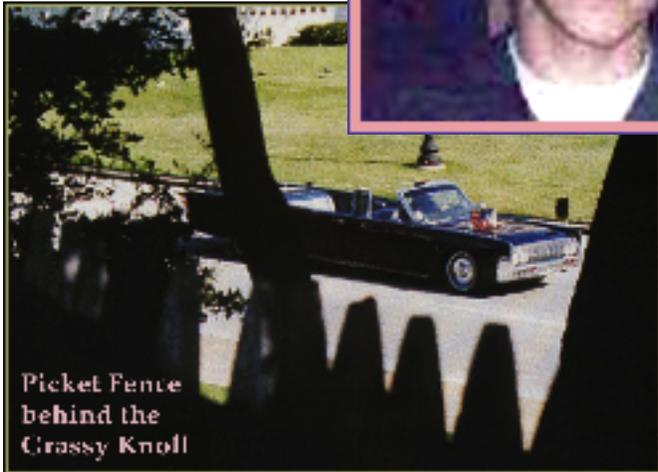

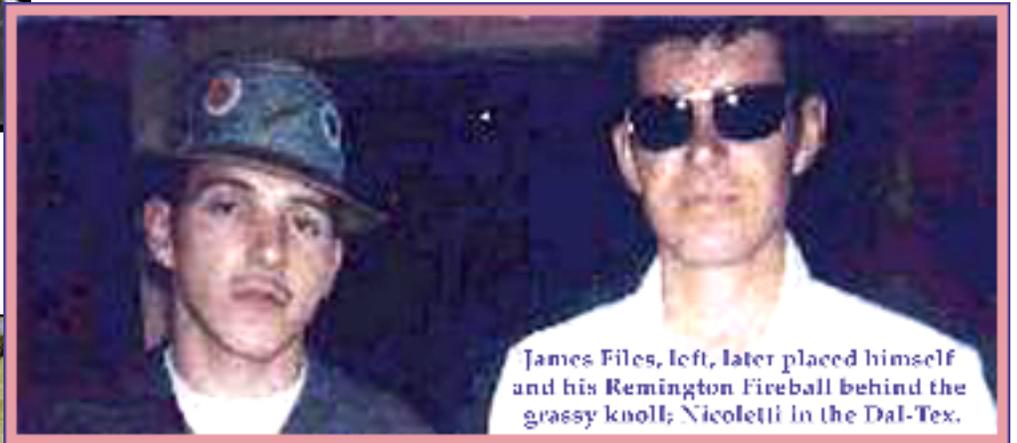

In 1977 he traveled to Belgium under the auspices of a foreign journalist who had arranged to interview him and had set up a meeting for him with an agent of the KGB. On the eve of that rendezvous, however, De Mohrenschildt slipped away and flew instead to the United States. In Florida now, claiming financial difficulty, he agreed -- in exchange for $4,000 -- to be interviewed by Kennedy researcher Edward Epstein about his unlikely friendship in the early sixties with the newly repatriated Oswald.

In the interview, De Mohrenschildt admitted to having approached Oswald originally at the behest of the CIA, who in turn had helped him with a business deal that he was negotiating with Haiti's tyrannical Head-of-State, Papa Doc Duvalier. (According to CIA Agent Herbert Atkin, however, De Mohrenschildt's underlying business in Haiti had more to do with his supervision of a CIA sponsored plan to overthrow Duvalier.)

Midway through De Mohrenschildt's recollections, on March 29th, 1977, he and Epstein broke for lunch and decided to meet again at 3:00 pm. The ex-nobleman returned to his room to find that a lead investigator for the House Select Committee on Assassinations had been there earlier looking for him, and had left word that he would return. George De Mohrenschildt's body was found later in the day. Though he left no note, he had apparently committed suicide by discharging a shotgun into his mouth. (3.11)

Charlie Nicoletti, (left) a notorious contract killer for Chicago mobster Sam Giancana, who was reported by numerous sources to have been a key part of the "A-team" in Dallas on the day, firing on the President from low in the Dal-Tex building -- directly behind JFK's retreating limousine and a markedly easier shot than was possible from the School Book Depository -- met his own grisly end. On the same day De Mohrenschildt died by shotgun in Florida, Nicoletti, in Chicago, took three bullets in the back of his skull. (3.12)

From the same building where Oswald lay in ambush, a telescopic lens constructs an approximate line of what the killer saw at the school of Texas. Texas School Depository

Having been subpoenaed to appear before the same House Select Committee on Assassinations, Nicoletti's old boss, Giancana, though depending on the "shelter" of the Federal Witness Protection Program, turned up dead in his kitchen the night before his scheduled testimony. A massive wound to the back of Giancana's head played in stark counterpoint to a circle of six bullet holes around his mouth -- Mafia symbology for having ignored the need for silence. (3.13)

Johnny Roselli was interviewed by Jack Anderson of The Washington Post in July of 1976. He told Anderson:

"When Oswald was picked up, the underworld conspirators feared he would crack and disclose information that might lead to them. This almost certainly would have brought a massive US crackdown on the Mafia. So Jack Ruby was ordered to eliminate Oswald."

Within a week of making this statement, Roselli left home in Florida to play golf. He never arrived at the first tee. Ten days later his body was found floating in an oil drum in Dumfoundling Bay. He had been garroted. His legs had been sawed off and squashed into the drum with the rest of his body. (3.14)

The House Select Committee on Assassinations -- provocative of all this bloodshed -- made a show of trying to arrive at a better understanding of the profound forces of antagonism at work against the Presidency of John Kennedy. Death, the passage of time, the political courage born of public insistence, and the release of millions of pages of previously concealed information made such a show impossible to avoid. The committee cited new audio evidence in support of the many eyewitness reports of frontal gunfire on the infamous day, originating from the "grassy knoll" and/or the upcoming triple underpass, simultaneous to the gunfire from behind the motorcade. This evidence was consistent with the "back right" quarter of the President's skull being blown out -- as was described by at least two dozen medical and security people who saw or attended the President's mortal wounds either immediately after the incident or at the autopsy, including Special Agent Clint Hill; Special Agent Roy Kellerman (the President's bodyguard); Dr. McClelland in the hospital Emergency Room; Dr. Carrico; Dr. Peters and Dr. Kemp, the presiding Director of Neurological Surgery -- and as was hauntingly etched by Jacqueline Kennedy crawling out onto the trunk to retrieve it.

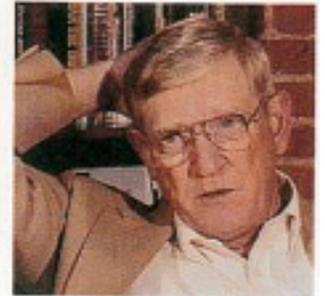

Paul O'Connor
 "[There was] an open area all the way across into the rear of the brain."

Dr. Robert McClelland:
 "It was in the right back part of the head—very large ... a portion of the cerebellum fell out on the table as we were doing the tracheotomy."

Nurse Audrey Bell:
 "There was a massive wound at the back of his head."

Aubrey Rike
 "You could feel the sharp edges of the bone at the edge of the hole in the back of his head."

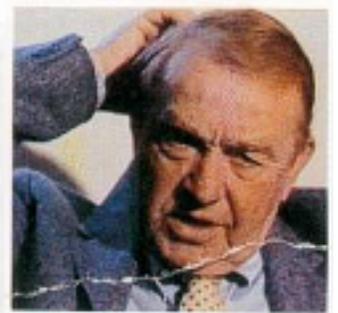

Dr. Paul Peters:

Dr. Charles Carrico:
 "There was a large — quite a large — defect about here [pointing] on his skull."

Dr. Charles Crenshaw:
 "The wound was the size of a baseball."

Frank O'Neill
 "... a massive wound in the right rear."

All of which supported the presence of -- at least -- a second shooter. As Kellerman, who was sitting directly in front of John Connally at the time, had originally put it to investigators: "...A flurry of shells came into the car." Kellerman, though, has remained a character of curious intent throughout the ensuing years. It was Kellerman, after all, who bore responsibility to command the driver, William Greer, to speed away at the first sign of trouble. Instead, the car began to slow as the attack commenced, coming to nearly a complete stop before the fatal head shot arrived. Nor was Kellerman ever moved to comment on the bullet hole in the car's front windshield, the fragmented exit side of which was no doubt staring him in the face as they sped to the hospital. (3.15)

Dr. McClelland's Drawing

He shepherded the President's body through the departure from Dallas (ignoring the orders of a local judge) and back home to Washington, and arranged for an ambulance to meet the plane upon arrival and take the President's body directly to Bethesda Naval Hospital. He was never asked to explain, however, why the coffin that was loaded onto the plane was not the one that debarked. (3.16) He stood watch over the autopsy; viewing the X-Rays alongside the doctors and was present at their discovery, well into the process, of the wound to the President's back -- six inches below his collar line. This wound did not yield an exit path (and could not, therefore, have accommodated the Warren Commission's "magic bullet" theory). He observed a "small finger" sized entry wound to the right side of the President's head, and an exit wound which had caused the absence of the right rear quadrant of his skull, consistent with what he had observed lying on the back seat of the open Limousine upon the President's removal from the vehicle in Dallas. He also described a wound to the President's neck, just below the knot of his tie, which the Emergency Room doctors in Dallas had documented as an entry wound before opening it further for purposes of a tracheostomy. Though the comprehensive photographs and X-rays of the skull wound that snuffed out the President's life were later widely reported to have been replaced (3.17) -- it wouldn't have mattered much in 1964. For during the course of its "investigation....."

the Warren Commission never looked at any of them.

Earl Warren,
Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, who had publicly blamed the murder on right-wing extremists, was blackmailed into presiding.

Gerald Ford,
later the only man non-elected as both Vice President (Spiro Agnew scandal) and President (Richard Nixon scandal).

Richard Russell,
Lyndon Johnson's foremost mentor in the US Senate.

John Cooper,
member of both Houses of Congress, twice elected to the Senate, delegate to the UN.

John McCloy,
ex-World Bank President. As German High Commissioner, released Nazi war criminals. Rumored to have attended the pre-assassination meeting at Clint Murchison's mansion.

Hale Boggs,
ex-Senate majority whip.

Allen Dulles,
ex-Director of the CIA, who had overseen successful right-wing coups in Guatemala and Iran. JFK fired him from CIA after Bay of Pigs disaster.

Arlen Specter,
chief mouthpiece for the "lone gunman/magic bullet" theory. Recently Chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

David Belin,
later Executive Director of the Commission on CIA Actions within the United States.

Many, however, among the millions who'd loved the President, resolved that his tragedy would not be brushed aside with such disdain. They pressed for truth. And slowly through time -- playing out like some haunted ballad of lament to the execution of the elected leader of the world's most powerful country -- it developed that...

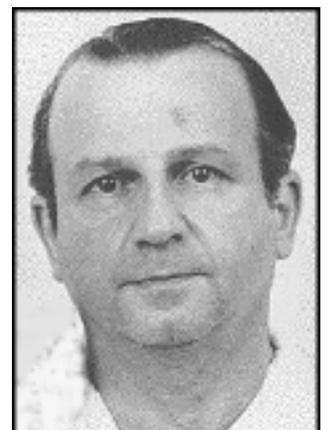

Lee Harvey Oswald had been carrying the home phone number of FBI Agent James Hosty in his wallet when he was booked for the murder. (3.18)

Though Oswald claimed to be a "patsy," and though he pleaded for two days with his wife, his mother, his brother and various members of the Dallas Police Department that he be granted access to his lawyer -- or any lawyer -- that access was denied him. (3.19)

Though the Dallas Police Department ran a paraffin test on Oswald's face to reveal the telltale traces of gunpowder residue that would surely testify to the three rifle shots he was purported to have squeezed off -- eyeball to scope -- the test came up clean. (3.20)

Jack Ruby was mob-connected and well known to the Dallas PD, as officers who visited Ruby's strip joint, "The Carousel," drank for free. Oswald is said to have known him by his nickname: "Sparky." Ruby was a continuous presence during the two days of Oswald's detention, hovering around headquarters and asking about the prisoner's whereabouts. In a room full of cops and cameras, he finally made his move.

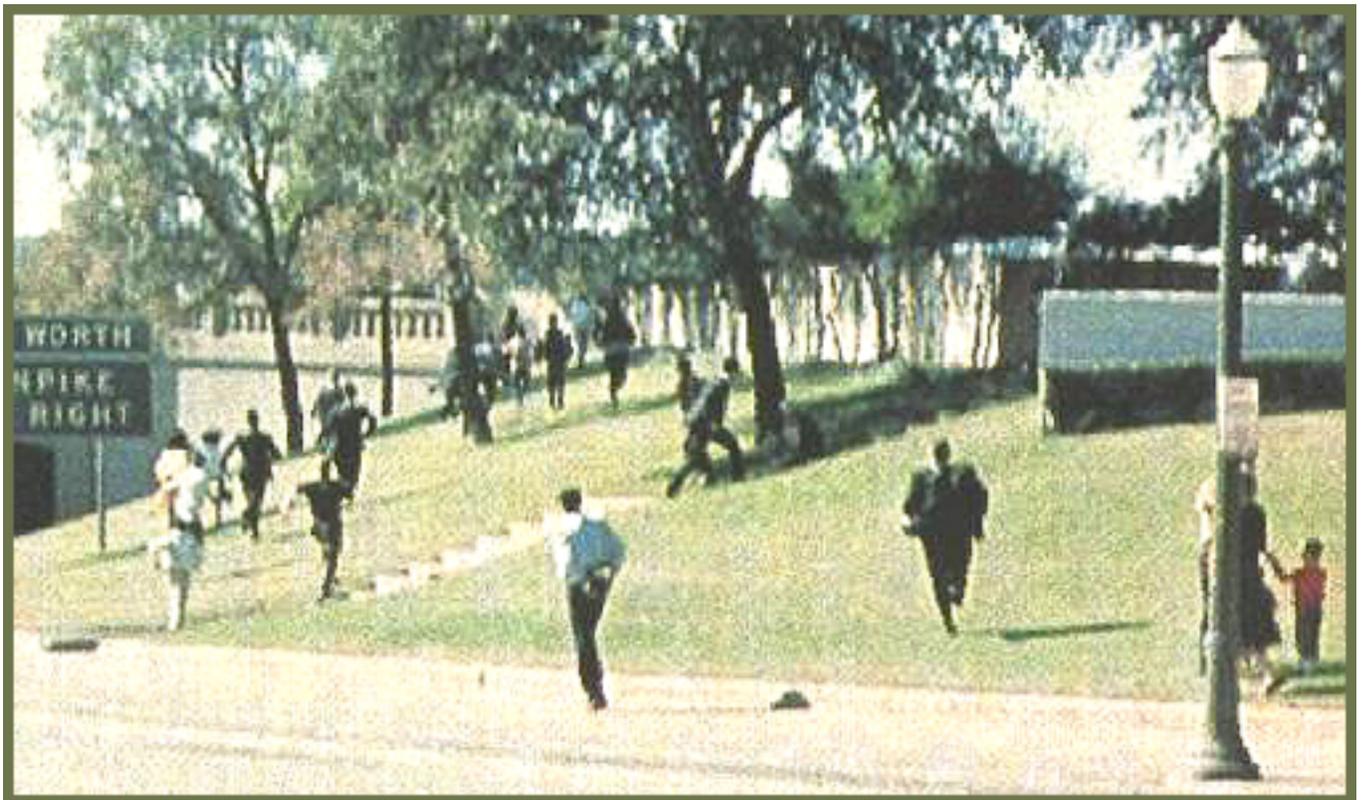

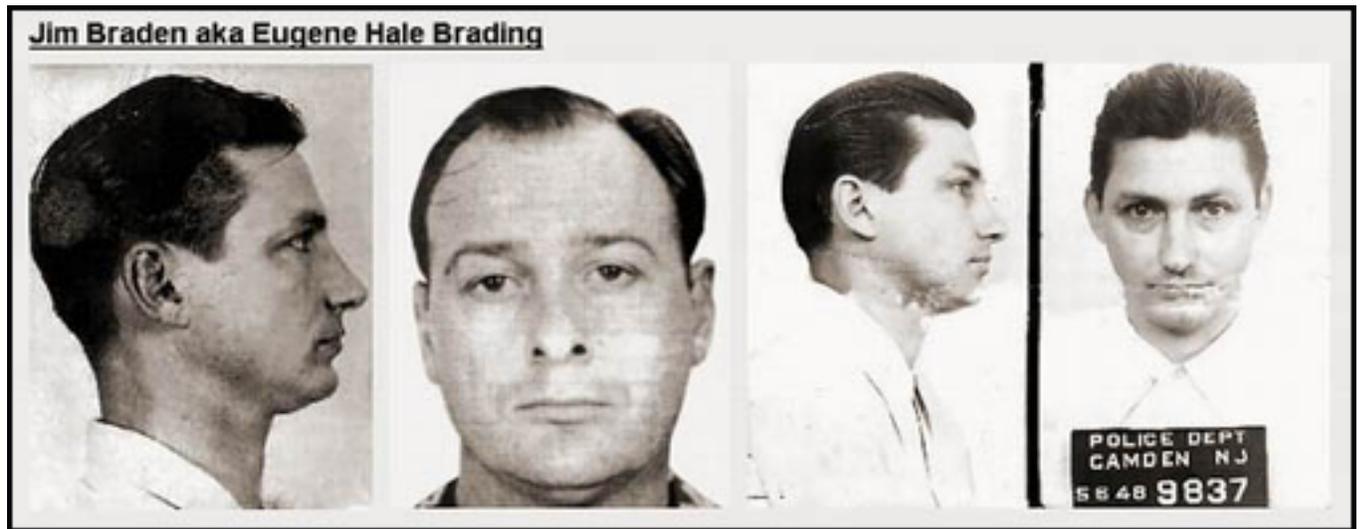

The murder was performed on national television.

Two days previously, Dallas Policeman J. M. Smith, smelling gunpowder immediately after Kennedy's assassination, had confronted a man behind the "grassy knoll" (below). Though every US Secret Service Agent in the vicinity was, at that moment, strapped to the Presidential motorcade speeding its way to the hospital -- the man behind the knoll flashed very convincing "US Secret Service" identification at Officer Smith, who allowed him to walk away.

The ID -- which was expressed both as booklets and as specifically marked lapel pins -- had been ordered only seven days before, according to CIA document specialist Chauncey Holt, and presented a challenge that marked a new level of achievement for his outfit. Holt, the oldest of the legendary "three tramps," would be roused two hours later from a boxcar on the railroad tracks a hundred yards behind these trees. (4.1)

Jim Braden, a Mafia enforcer with more than thirty arrests on his record (and long ties to Carlos Marcello, Santo Trafficante and David Ferrie) had arrived in Dallas the previous day and checked in to the Cabaña Motel, after which he visited the offices of billionaire oilman H. L. Hunt. Jack Ruby, that night, chose the same Cabaña motel for a midnight meeting with some friends who'd just come in from Chicago. Though Braden was arrested for "acting suspiciously" in the Dal-Tex Building overlooking Dealey Plaza immediately after the assassination, he was released. (4.2)

Four years later Braden would turn up in Los Angeles upon the occasion of the killing of the President's brother, newly crowned Democratic Presidential frontrunner Robert Kennedy. Again, Braden -- though questioned by police -- would walk away.

Bobby Kennedy, who had just become the frontrunner for the Democratic Presidential nomination following his victory in the California primary, ended up murdered on a greasy kitchen floor in the Ambassador Hotel of Los Angeles. Though evidence and eyewitnesses screamed otherwise, a "lone gunman" was blamed.

Steelworker Richard Carr, who'd watched the JFK motorcade from the seventh floor of a construction project overlooking Dealey Plaza, told the police that he'd noticed a stocky man in a tan coat and tie, wearing horn-rimmed glasses and a hat, standing in a window of the Book Depository shortly before the assassination. Carr stated that after the gunfire, most of which came from the grassy knoll (and drove the people on the knoll to the ground) he saw three men run out from behind the Depository and scramble into a Rambler station wagon which was parked facing the wrong way in front of the building. They sped away so quickly that one of the car's doors was still open. After which, Carr saw the man in the horn-rimmed glasses walking quickly away from the scene in his direction, repeatedly looking over his shoulder. The FBI told Carr he was confused and to "keep his mouth shut." Upon his reluctance to do so, he was threatened, arrested and told to leave town. He moved his family to Montana. Despite discovering three sticks of dynamite wired to the ignition of his car one morning, Carr made plans to testify in the New Orleans JFK conspiracy trial of Clay Shaw. Fifteen days before it began, he was shot at on his front porch. He testified anyway and moved to Atlanta. He was attacked by men wielding knives, who stabbed him in the back and arm. He reciprocated by pulling a gun and blowing one of them away. A grand jury refused to indict him. Rumored to still be living, he no longer answers his phone. (4.3)

Four days after the assassination, Grant Stockdale, a close friend of the Kennedys -- but not a steelworker -- flew to Washington and met with JFK's brothers Robert and Edward. On his return home Stockdale told several of his associates that "the world was closing in." On December 1st, he spoke to his attorney, William Frates, who later recalled: "He started talking. It didn't make much sense. He said something about 'those guys' trying to get him." On December 2nd, Stockdale fell to his death from his office on the thirteenth story of the Dupont Building in Miami. (4.4)

CIA Operative Gary Underhill told his friend, Charlene Fitsimmons, that he was convinced that Kennedy had been killed by members of the CIA. "Oswald is a patsy. They set him up... I've been listening and hearing things. I couldn't believe they'd get away with it, but they did." Underhill expressed fear for his life. "I know who they are. That's the problem. They know I know." On May 8, 1964, the right-handed Underhill died from a gunshot wound to the left side of the back of his head. (4.5)

On November 24, 1963, journalists Bill Hunter of the Long Beach Press Telegram and Jim Koethe of the Dallas Times Herald interviewed Jack Ruby's roommate, George Senator. Earlier in the day Senator and attorney Tom Howard had visited Ruby in jail. That evening Senator arranged for Koethe, Hunter and Howard to search Ruby's apartment. It is not known what they found.

On 23rd April 1964, Hunter was shot dead by policeman Creighton Wiggins in the pressroom of a Long Beach police station. Wiggins called it an accident. Koethe, having begun work on a book about the assassination, died on September 21, 1964. A man had broken into his Dallas apartment and killed him by a karate chop to the throat. Tom Howard died of a heart-attack, aged 48, in March, 1965. (4.6)

Mary Pinchot Meyer, the sister-in-law of CIA connected journalist Ben Bradlee (of Washington Post Watergate era fame) and the ex-wife of Cord Meyer, a senior figure in covert operations for the CIA, was also rumored to have been intimately involved with the President. On the day after Kennedy's death, she called her friend, Harvard LSD researcher Timothy Leary and said, of JFK, "They couldn't control him any more.... They'll cover everything up. I gotta come see you. I'm afraid."

On 12th October, 1964, Mary Pinchot

Meyer was shot dead as she walked along the Chesapeake and Ohio towpath in Georgetown. (4.7)

Winston Scott was the CIA's station chief in Mexico. Scott retired in 1969 and wrote a memoir about his time in the FBI, the OSS and the CIA. He completed the manuscript, It Came Too Late, and made plans to discuss the contents of the book with CIA director Richard Helms in Washington on 30th April, 1971. Four days before the agreed meeting, Scott died of a heart attack, and CIA counterintelligence chief James Angleton personally removed Scott's manuscript from his family's possession. (4.8)

Dorothy Kilgallen (right), of television's "What's my Line?" fame, was also a leading crime reporter for the New York Journal. As tenacious as she was glamorous, Kilgallen obtained a private interview with Jack Ruby, and told friends afterward that she had information that would "break the case wide open."

Aware of what had happened to Bill Hunter and Jim Koethe, she turned over her interview notes to her friend Florence Smith for safekeeping. On the 8th of November, 1965, Kilgallen was found dead. It was reported that she had committed suicide.

A cerebral hemorrhage claimed Florence Smith two days later. (4.9)

Dallas Deputy Sheriff Roger D. Craig was on duty in Dealey Plaza on the 22nd November, 1963. Fifteen minutes after Kennedy's assassination, Craig claimed to have seen Lee Harvey Oswald picked up by a dark complected man in a station wagon. Oswald, when confronted by Craig about it, described the car as owned by his wife's landlord, Ruth Paine, who had helped Oswald land his job at the Texas School Book Depository. Oswald asked Craig to "leave her out of this."

Deputy Craig (left) also insisted, as did fellow officer Seymour Weitzman, that the rifle found in the sixth floor "sniper's nest" was a 7.65 Mauser and not a Mannlicher-Carcano, like the one that had been tied to Oswald. (Certain gun-savvy citizens may wonder why Oswald would have purchased so cheesy a weapon as the Mannlicher-Carcano -- which necessitated that the shooter remove his eye from the scope each time he threw its bolt -- when the Mauser could be had for pretty much the same price.) Unlike Weitzman, however, Craig could not be persuaded to "change his mind" about what he had seen. He became unpopular with senior police officers in Dallas when he testified before the Warren Commission -- even though the Commission discounted his testimony -- and lost his job.

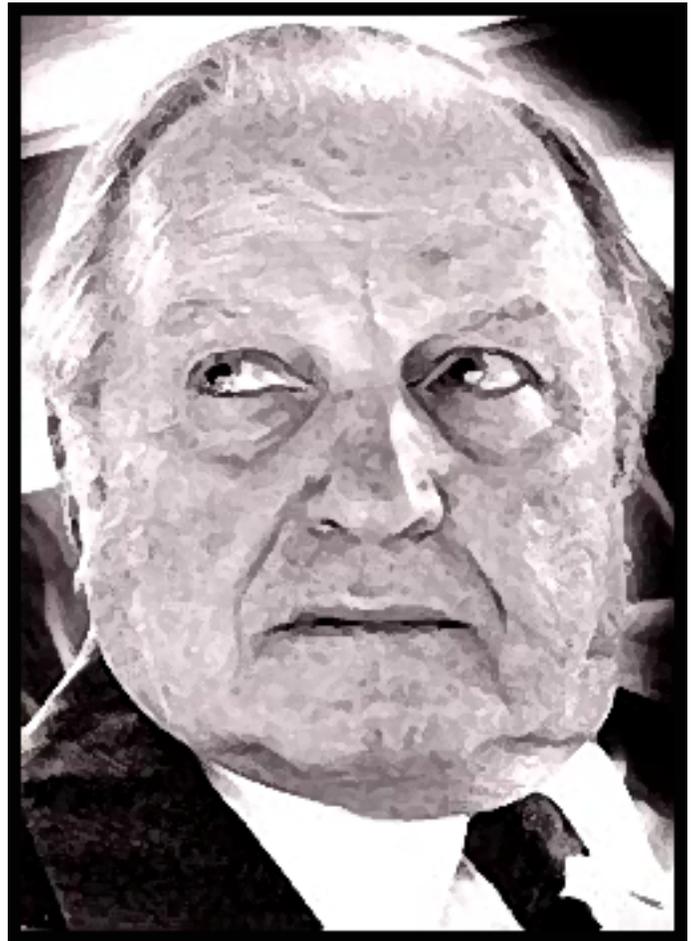

In 1967, Craig traveled to New Orleans to testify as a prosecution witness at the conspiracy trial of Clay Shaw. Later that year he was shot at while walking to a car park. The bullet grazed his head. In 1973 a car forced Craig's car off a mountain road. He was badly injured but survived the accident. In 1974 he survived another shooting in Waxahachie, Texas. The following year he was seriously wounded when his car engine exploded. Craig told friends that the Mafia had decided to kill him. He was found dead on the 15th of May, 1975. It was decided that the good deputy had died as a result of multiple self-inflicted gunshot wounds. (4.10)

Shortly before his own death, David Ferrie called Judyth Baker and warned her that she would be killed if she spoke about the CIA-financed cancer-as-a-weapon project they'd worked on with Oswald, alluding to the fate of their supervisor in the work, Dr. Mary Sherman, who had been murdered earlier in New Orleans. Sherman had been stabbed in the heart, arm, leg and stomach, and her laboratory set on fire.

And Jack Ruby himself finally met the demise he had predicted for so many years. Preparing to testify before Congress, he was visited in his cell by doctors who injected him against his will. Three weeks later he died of a "galloping" lung cancer of a type not previously observed to have generated in the human respiratory system. (4.11)

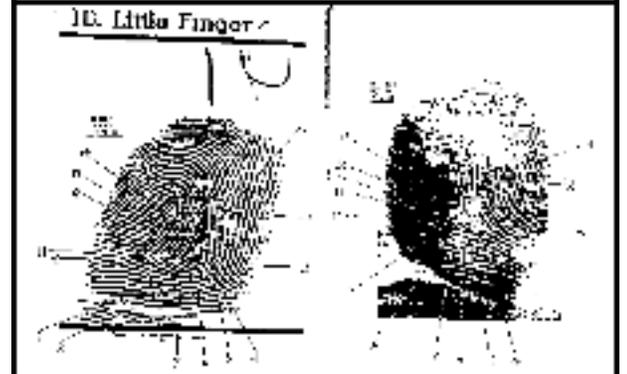

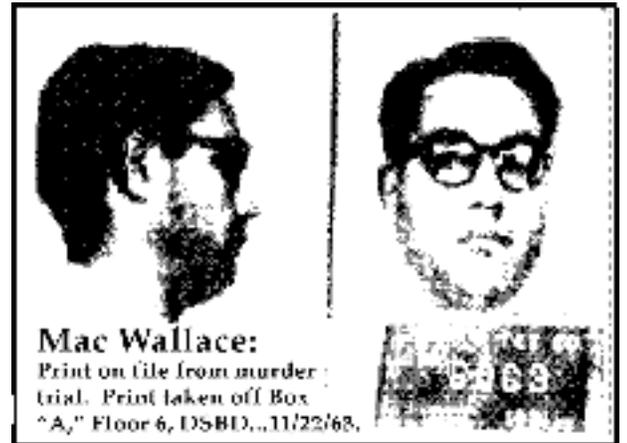

Unlike these and others of the dozens of less fortunate figures in the grand drama that overthrew the government of the United States, Mafia godfather Santo Trafficante died peacefully. On his deathbed, he was said to have left his longtime lawyer Frank Ragano with a simple, remorseless observation. "Carlos fucked up. We should not have killed Giovanni (John). We should have killed Bobby." (4.12)

Santo Trafficante and Carlos Marcello

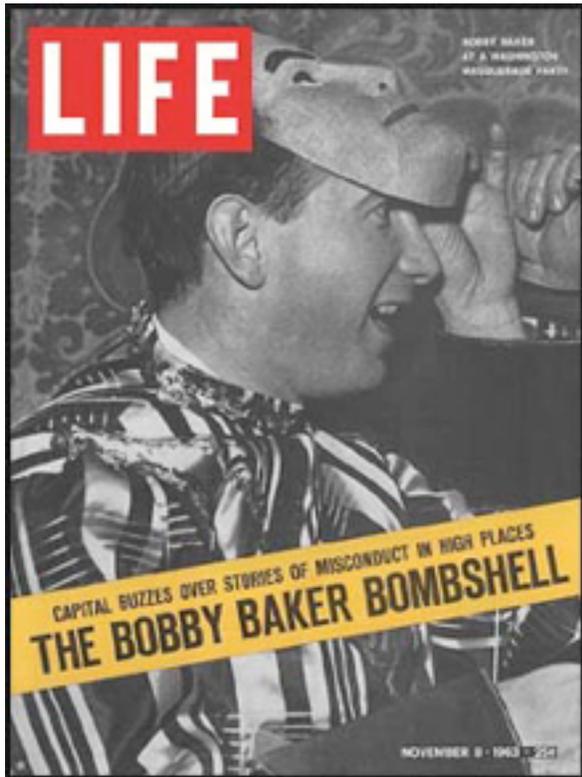

On June 19, 1992 -- in what can only be described, under the circumstances, as the typical courage and integrity attending his training -- former US Marshall Clint Peoples told friends he had discovered documentary evidence that an associate of Lyndon Johnson had been one of the team of "shooters" in Dealey plaza on the day Kennedy perished. Four days later Clint Peoples was killed in a one-car automobile accident. (4.13)

On March 12, 1998, the lone “unidentified” finger print found in the Dallas School Book Depository’s sixth floor “Sniper’s Nest” was finally attributed to its maker. It was proven to belong to Mac Wallace, the convicted murderer and long time, widely known in Texas political circles “wet man” -- street speak for assassin -- of Lyndon Baines Johnson. (4.14)

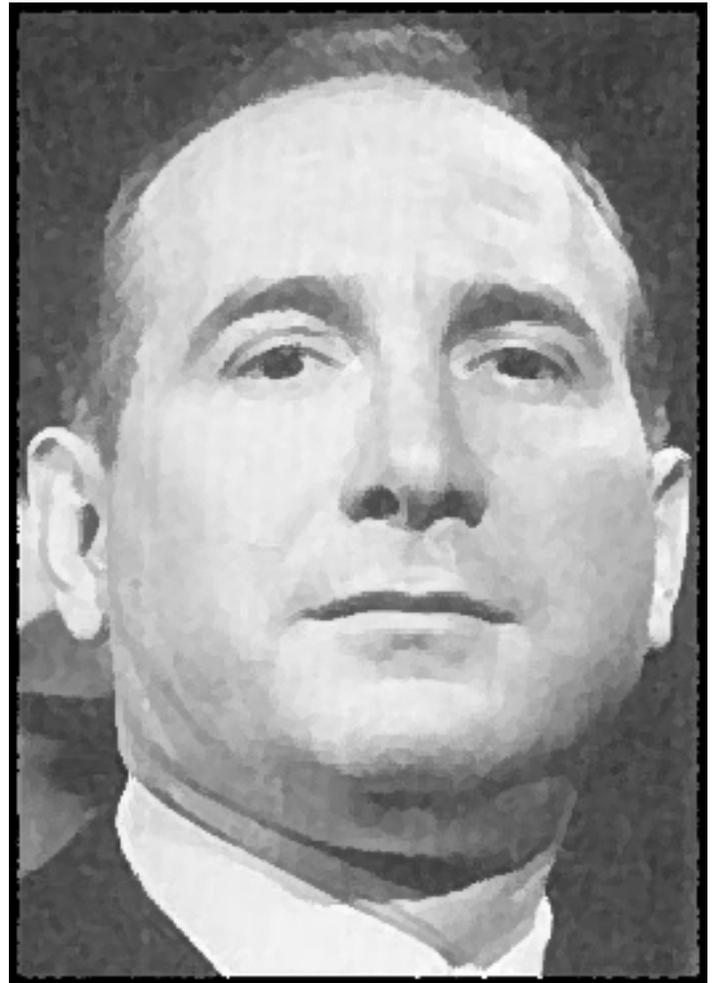

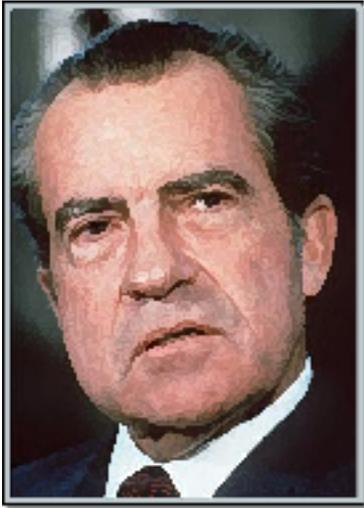

Among the many powerful, troubled and angry men who benefitted from the spilling of Kennedy's blood, Johnson, perhaps, can be said to have gained the most.

published 14 days before Kennedy's assassination*

As Dallas approached, Lyndon Johnson was facing a reckoning. Bobby Baker, his protégé, former secretary and eventual political advisor from Johnson's days as Senate majority leader, was about to be indicted -- and he would be taking Johnson down with him. Baker's numerous corrupt business dealings with the likes of mobsters Meyer Lansky, Sam Giancana, Ed Levenson and the Jimmy Hoffa associate Benny Siegelbaum -- too outrageously lucrative not to show up in Baker's lifestyle -- had finally exposed him. And Baker, as everyone knew, had learned his trade at the feet of the master and had always been Lyndon's boy.

Johnson's own corrupt connections to the underworld, and the lethally amoral tactics he'd always employed to smooth out any incriminating "kinks" that popped up, would prove impossible to separate, once the gathering storm began to break. (4.15)

Richard Nixon, whom Kennedy had defeated for the Presidency in 1960 -- also happened to be in Dallas on assassination week (and would later offer conflicting versions of when he left town and how he got the "terrible news"). Between meetings with associates, Nixon made time to talk to local reporters about Kennedy's plans to contain the coming "Bobby Baker" political damage by dumping Lyndon Johnson from the Democratic ticket. The Dallas morning papers ran headlines on November 22nd quoting Nixon to the effect that LBJ's head was already on the chopping block, and Kennedy had lifted the ax. (4.16)

Johnson, however -- as ruthless a player as the ultimate bloodsport of Texas politics has ever produced -- kept faith in a kinder fate: Kennedy, after all, had come to Johnson's home turf, and everywhere Lyndon looked he saw powerful men who hated the President, men who had suffered for his new ideas and were in the process of being diminished by him. Though he lost his last battle with Kennedy -- over where John Connally (LBJ's friend) would ride in the motorcade (JFK wanted the popular Governor near him in the open Presidential Limo; LBJ wanted him in his own hard top trailing car) -- Johnson won the war.

Instead of being dumped from the 1964 Democratic ticket -- as the morning papers on that very day had headlined he would be -- his career brought to ruin; his indictment on Federal racketeering charges sure to come and prison time likely to follow -- Lyndon Johnson, instead, became the President of the United States.

Immediately thereafter, by Executive Order, he declared that his friend, J. Edgar Hoover would be the head of the FBI for life, and all investigations into Johnson's past crimes were quietly abandoned. (4.17)

The House Select Committee on Assassinations noted among its many regretful findings that on November 22, 1963, certain unnamed members of the United States Secret Service had been "deficient" in their sworn duty to protect our nation's leader.

Though a poll three years earlier in the Detroit News reported that 87% of the American public did not believe that Lee Harvey Oswald had acted alone, it was not until 1979 -- sixteen years after his death -- that the panel concluded that President John Fitzgerald Kennedy had most likely been murdered at the hands of a "conspiracy." “When I think of President Kennedy, I think of what Shakespeare said in Romeo and Juliet.

‘When he shall die, take him and cut him into the stars and he shall make the face of Heaven so fine that all the world will be in love with night and pay no worship to the garish sun.’”

That Dudley Do-Right was indeed as square-jawed a hero as has ever stood for "Truth, Justice and the Canadian Way" is not in contention here. And that "The Mounties Always Get Their Man" is -- what? A Rallying Cry that was probably true at one time? Possibly true, at least? It sure did sound good.

Maybe the Mountie Mojo was better suited to a simpler time -- when the bad guys were more easily distinguished from the good. Or maybe a "gentlemen's agreement" to "forgive and forget" regarding the apprehended "assets" of one country's intelligence agencies and another's was in place long before Dudley ever mounted a moose.

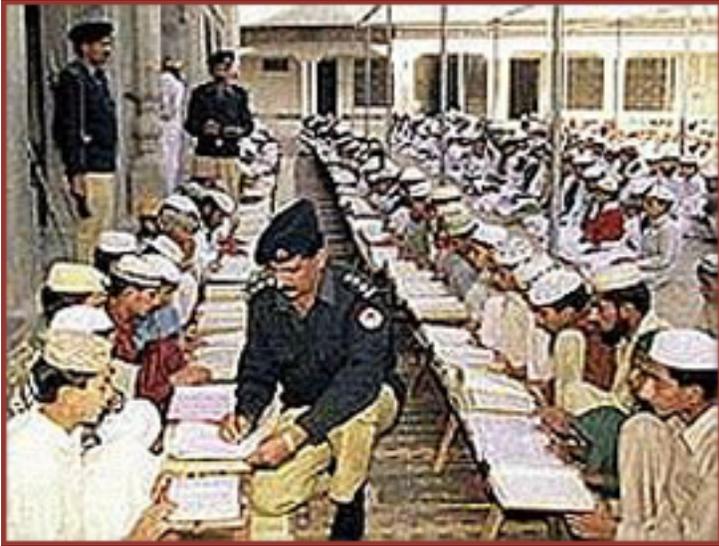

In any case, we can say, regarding their release of Ali Mohamed, that the Mounties had a lot of company when it came to keeping this player in play. Their part in his twisting journey was only one early chapter of the great unwritten novel about the man's exploits. Over the course of his career Mohamed has slithered so effortlessly between the contending political organizations of the west and Radical Islam that one might be forgiven for thinking he was simply working two branches of the same job.

For example -- he was a major in the Egyptian Army in 1981 when he joined the Islamic Jihad and left to begin training in the US Army Special Forces School at Fort Bragg, North Carolina. While Ali studied Covert Ops and Terrorism 101 in the US, colleagues in his Army unit back home were busy carrying out the assassination of Egyptian President Anwar Sadat.

In 1985 Mohamed conducted a whirlwind six-week courtship of an American woman he'd recently met on a plane, marrying her in Reno and setting up house in her hometown of Santa Clara, California. A year later, moving back to North Carolina alone, he officially joined the US Army and began teaching classes to US soldiers about the culture and politics of the Mideast. Among his supervisors at Fort Bragg was Col. Norvell De Atkine, an expert on "the political aspects of military operations" and a contributing author to the Middle East Forum, the aggressively neoconservative journal edited by Neo-Con scribe Daniel Pipes. De Atkine would later speak in defense of the US Army's relationship with Mohamed -- thoughtfully pointing out that the intriguing young man was "not a bomb thrower."

Though reported to have stolen top secret documents and passed them to Islamic Militants while he was producing and appearing in US Army training videos about combating Islamic Militants, Mohamed soon made a successful transition, as the story goes, to a new career as an operative for the CIA. Over the course of most of two decades, he moved around the United States and throughout the Mideast, staying in regular touch with and providing "western" training to various Radical Muslims.

He had a front row seat to the massive worldwide program of recruitment, indoctrination and training of Islamic Jihadis that was overseen and financed by the CIA and MI6 (British Intelligence) beginning in 1979. (5.1)

This effort, during which CIA expertise and US dollars stoked the aggressive expansion of the virulently anti-Western madrasas in Pakistan, first brought the US into a working relationship with Usama bin Laden.

One of the ensuing high points of Mohamed's resumé was his 1994 trip to the Sudan where he not only provided US military-style training for the personal body guards of Mr. bin Laden, but is also credited with having arranged an introductory meeting between bin Laden and Imad Mugntyah -- at the time the security chief for Hizballah.

It was not until 1998 that Mohamed was finally arrested by the United States -- for his purported role in the bombing of the US Embassies in Kenya and Tanzania -- and not until 1999 that he was indicted. Though expected to testify at the trial -- he did not. And though his "co-conspirators" were sentenced -- he was not. His whereabouts remain unknown, and the Associated Press reported on New Year's Eve, 2001, that his sentencing had been "postponed indefinitely."

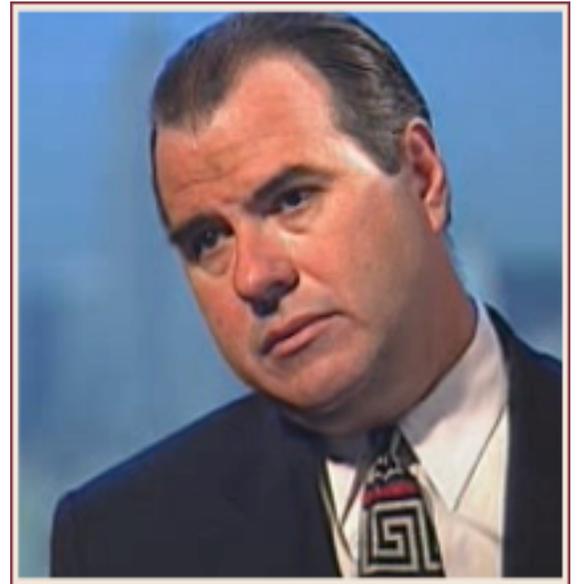

Larry Johnson, a former CIA agent and the State Department's Director of Counterterrorism during the elder Bush's administration, had this to say about Mohamed: "The reason he didn't testify was so they wouldn't have to face uncomfortable statements on the FBI. They are more interested in covering their ass."

and former CIA analyst Jim Marcinkowski, (right)*

Mohamed was the subject of several articles after 9/11, but by the time the 9/11 Commission issued its final report in 2004, the scope of his far-reaching and widely observed activities had been reduced to a couple of references to his connections to the bombings of the embassies and the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center. No mention whatever was made of his years of collaboration with the CIA and the FBI. (5.2)

Eager, as always, FBI Agent John O'Neill left Chicago and drove straight through to Washington in February of 1995 to begin his new assignment as a counterterrorism specialist in the bureau's national headquarters. He arrived in town on Saturday, and reported to the office on Sunday. With few people around, it was O'Neill who answered the phone that morning when Richard Clarke, head of counterterrorism for the Clinton Administration, called from the White House.

Sources within Pakistani Intelligence had tipped the administration that Ramzi Yousef, the man deemed responsible for the 1993 terrorist attack on the World Trade Center, was about to make a move. Yousef would briefly abandon his deep cover in Pakistan in the process of relocating to Afghanistan. This might prove to be the last chance to apprehend him for a very long time. "Can you help?" asked Clarke.

O'Neill, though brand new to counterterrorism, brand new to his office and brand new to the culture of Washington, answered, "I'll see what I can do."

With nothing but a telephone at his disposal, he went to work with a "don't even think of turning me down" tenacity that proved impossible to deny, quickly establishing a hierarchy and cobbling together a network of elements from half way around the planet, pressing with the brilliant brute force of his prodigious persuasive powers to inspire commitment and coordinate the efforts of his many new "friends" into a cohesive strategy. Forty-eight hours later Ramzi Yousef was in prison. (5.3)

O'Neill threw himself into his new position with the same energy -- a ferocity rarely witnessed within the confines of a bureaucracy. He took the job home with him, spending his nights rubbing elbows with his fellow restless spooks, networking, bonding and "getting his Irish up" in the company of a wide swath of the intelligence community, establishing the kind of valuable friendships that sped his education and quickly broadened his reach. It was a fact as well -- according to every one who knew him -- that he did not suffer fools.

He saw the depth of the challenge ahead with a clarity that escaped the majority of his colleagues, and began making noises about the need for better technology and better thinking; pushing for a paradigm shift that would move the organization's focus from solving domestic crime toward a more global and long term analytical posture.

People at the very highest levels of the national intelligence apparatus began to mutter about his "sharp elbows" and his "intensity." His warnings about the gathering challenges posed by the rise of Islamic fundamentalism earned him the mocking title of the "Prince of Darkness." He was said to be "pushing too hard."

The Khobar Towers in Saudi Arabia were bombed in June of 1996, killing nineteen Americans, and a high-level contingent from the FBI was dispatched to investigate. On the 14 hour flight to Saudi Arabia, O'Neill sat beside FBI Director Louis Freeh and gave him a crash tutorial on what he had learned about Islamic Terrorism.

King Abdulaziz bin Abdelrahman Al-Saud, founder of Saudi Arabia; Louis Freeh, former Director of the FBI (lower right)

The investigation proved profoundly frustrating, with the Saudis speaking reassuringly of their desire to get to the bottom of who might have been responsible for the attacks, but having difficulty providing the American team with the kind of information they were seeking. The Saudis prevented the bureau's agents from interviewing civilians who'd witnessed the bombings, even as they professed their desire to produce them. On the way home, FBI Director Freeh was circumspect about the experience; willing to give the Saudis the benefit of the doubt as to the depth of their sincerity. O'Neill was outraged, and blunt: "They were blowing smoke up your ass." (5.4)

The Saudis later stipulated that they had in fact been obstructing the investigation (though their cited reason: "a desire to maintain calm" with Iran did not necessarily ring true) and O'Neill's observation was thereby vindicated. It soon developed that certain high ranking American government officials began to regard John O'Neill as the "go-to guy" on questions of terrorism. Attorney General Janet Reno began calling him directly for advice, bypassing the normal protocols of communication.

It was around this time that O'Neill began to communicate among colleagues his conviction that Saudi Arabia was not only the key to understanding the mechanics of international terrorism, it was also deeply implicated in its spread. He expressed dismay at our government's obvious appetite to continually "look the other way," when it came to our decades-long partners in the oil business -- the Saudis. And this opinion was formed more than five years before 9/11, when the presence of 15 Saudi Passports among the 19 purported hijackers would bring the idea into clearer focus -- for the few people in the United States inclined to publicly comment on the import of such simple, glaring facts.

O'Neill was hearing things from his now well-developed network of international contacts, and began pushing hard to get the intelligence agencies to allocate more resources toward investigating the activities of a handful of Jihadist operatives known to have emigrated to the United States. His repeated entreaties, however, fell on consistently deaf ears.

When the US Embassies in Kenya and Tanzania were bombed simultaneously in 1997, O'Neill made immediate preparations to fly overseas and jump the trail of the perpetrators. He knew that the most important aspect of investigating is to begin quickly, before people disperse and leads begin to cool. Amazingly -- though John O'Neill was widely understood to be among the most knowledgeable and effective people on the planet when it came to these exact matters -- the bureau, after considering its options, told him to stay home. (5.5)

US Embassy in Nairobi, Kenya (right)

It was not until the great crisis of confidence that came with the celebration of the millennium that O'Neill got a chance to reposition himself. He and his team jumped all over the arrest of Ahmed Ressam at the Canadian border in Vancouver. The discovery -- thanks to an alert Peace Officer -- of Ressam's plans to do damage in America was strongly supportive of O'Neill's instincts, and had come without the spilling of blood on American soil.

When the USS Cole was bombed, there was no doubt that O'Neill would be heading up the team of 200 FBI Agents that immediately mobilized for Yemen. And there, his fate began to take what would prove to be a terminal turn for the worse. His aggressive leadership generated leads, every one of which was explored under great pressure and deplorable conditions. O'Neill and his men had come to a Muslim country -- the birthplace of bin Laden himself, no less -- to try to arrest Muslims. They were sleeping on floors and struggling to get enough to eat, and they were hated out of hand by dangerous Yemeni security forces. In Survival Mode, they took to traveling together in fast driving caravans and posting their own armed guards around any perimeter they were forced to establish in the course of their queries.

Though it was obvious that to investigate with timidity was to invite attack, the US ambassador to Yemen, Barbara Bodine (right), chose to counter her own country's declared goal -- which was, supposedly, to solve the crime. Ignoring the centuries-old wisdom that law enforcement cannot function in a hostile environment without a projection of its own power -- she went after O'Neill for doing his job.

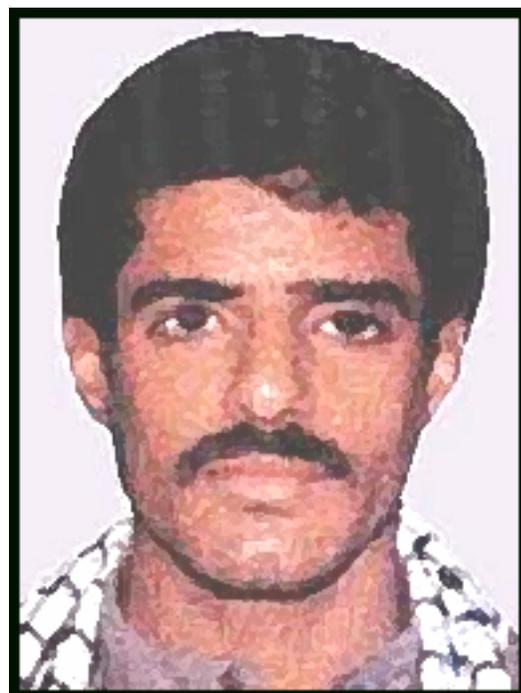

But even then -- as always -- the strength of the man's character was impossible to resist. He won converts to his cause among the Yemeni police and began to make progress. By the time he took a desperately needed sabbatical around the holidays, returning home having dropped twenty-five pounds, he could count many among his Muslim counterparts as friends. He brought some of them with him back to the states. He was excited to "show them New York." They had taken to calling him "brother."

Ambassador Bodine, meanwhile, had taken to calling the White House.

October 18, 2000, Norfolk, VA. President Clinton consoles a sailor injured in the Cole attack, in which 17 US servicemen died. Tawfiq bin Attash (below), who lost a leg to the Soviets in the eighties, and had attended the CIA-monitored January Al-Qaeda "summit" in Malaysia -- was purported to be the mastermind.

When John O'Neill prepared to return to Yemen after the holidays, he was told he'd been barred from the country. According to the official version of the impasse, his investigation -- an operation described as crucial to our nation's security -- was curtailed because the local ambassador didn't approve of the FBI's "bad manners." Few people in America even noticed. Again, the "bad guys" would walk. (5.6)

O'Neill had long since grown frustrated at the great disparity between the United States government's officially proclaimed strategies for countering terrorism -- especially as related to Usama bin Laden -- and the actual performance of those strategies.

The man was wholly convinced to the day he died that the key to dismantling Al-Qaeda -- should such dismantling of the "great threat" truly be a goal at the highest levels of corporate financed American power -- was staring everyone in the face.

As he put it to French Journalist Jean-Charles Brisard, who interviewed him for the book Bin Laden: Hidden Truths -- "All the answers, everything needed to dismantle Osama bin Laden's organization, can be found in Saudi Arabia." (5.7)

Which was, after 9/11, the righteously vengeful focus of the leaders of our government. (5.8)

For almost six whole months.....

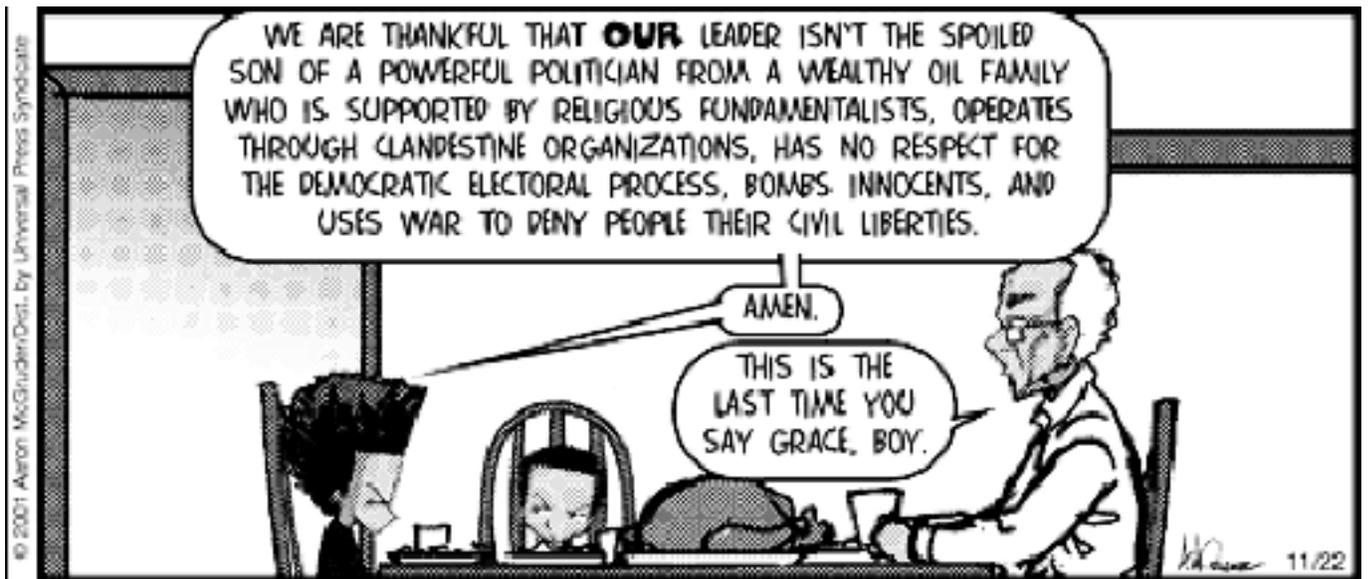

"The most important thing is for us to find Osama bin Laden. It is our number one priority and we will not rest until we find him."

- G.W. Bush, 9/13/01

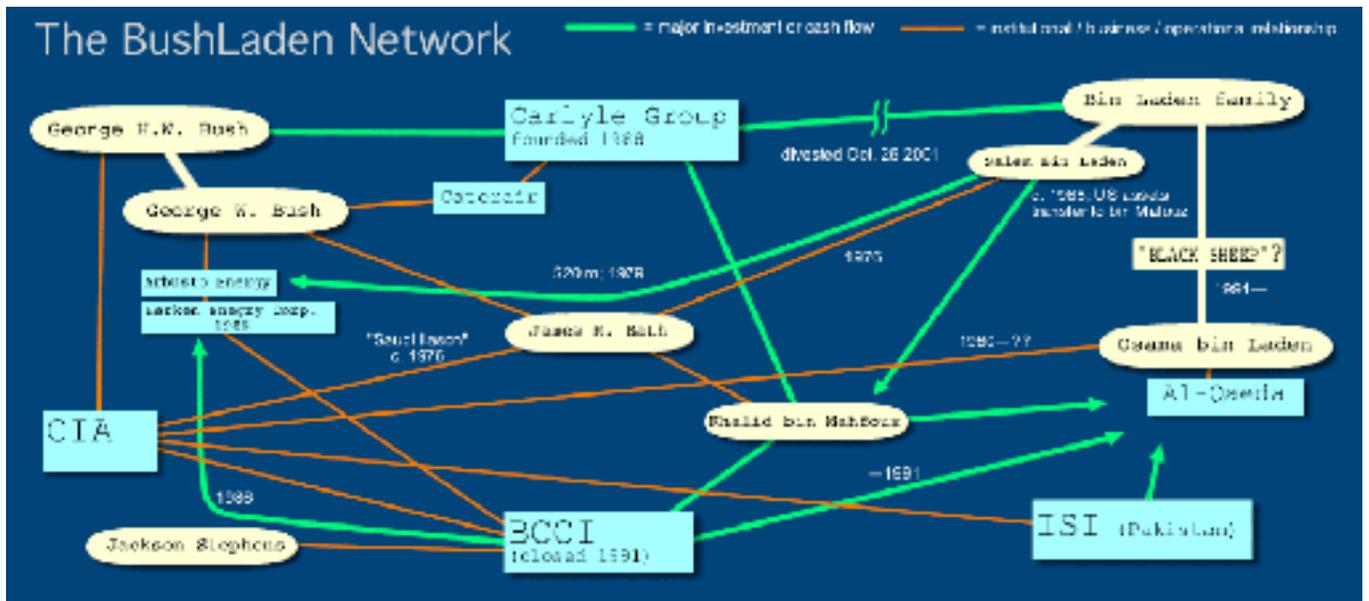

"I don't know where bin Laden is. I have no idea and really don't care. It's not that important. It's not our priority."

- G.W. Bush, 3/13/02

In reality, however, effective investigations into bin Laden were consistently thwarted from above by senior American government officials and oil interests who didn't want to embarrass the Saudis or those American officials and companies tied to the Royal Family. These same officials and their interests, of course -- are also tied to bin Laden.

Where was anyone in the American press with the political courage to step up and expose the lies required to sustain such duplicity?

Where was anyone anywhere with the political courage to speak of the multiple examples -- one after another after another after another -- of elements within the United States government intervening against its own supposed efforts to close the deal on these bad guys?

O'Neill could cite chapter and verse of such glaring examples (among dozens) of the vast difference between what we say about our "enemy" and what we actually do, as...

- Ø The Clinton administration's February, 1998 rejection -- over the protests of the FBI -- of an offer from Gutbi al-Mahdi, the head of Sudan's intelligence agency, to hand over the comprehensive Sudanese intelligence files on bin Laden and his associates (then living in Sudan) that could have prevented the Embassy attacks in Kenya and Tanzania that killed hundreds of people.
- Ø The Clinton administration's answer to an inquiry from Qatar later in 1998 upon the occasion of bin Laden, having left Sudan on a chartered jet with 150 of his family and associates onboard, preparing to land in Qatar for refueling on his way to Pakistan. The question from Qatar: "What should we do about this guy?" The answer: "Let him go."
- Ø The unilateral decision of CIA Director George Tenet to cancel a May 29, 1998 CIA operation poised to capture bin Laden in Afghanistan, citing concerns for the "quality of intelligence." This intelligence had been coordinated -- and was vigorously defended -- by the head of the agency's own bin Laden unit.
- Ø The failure of US Naval commanders to maintain the element of surprise in their August 20, 1998 Cruise missile attacks on bin Laden -- tipping their hand hours before the launch by moving multiple destroyers into position rather than relying on submarines, as they supposedly had been ordered to do.
- Ø The Bush administration's decline of a March 2001 offer from Taliban Minister Sayed Hashimi to "hold bin Laden in one location" long enough to effect his capture or demise.
- Ø The Bush administration's intervention in the summer of 2001 that stopped dead in its tracks an FBI investigation into two of Usama bin Laden's brothers -- Abdullah and Omar -- for their ties to the World Assembly of Muslim Youth; an organization that had previously been prosecuted for terrorist activities in the Philippines, Pakistan and India -- and operated out of a building situated three blocks away from the apartment of four of the purported 9/11 hijackers.
- Ø The 10-day kidney disease-related stay of bin Laden in the American Hospital in Dubai, during which he was visited -- on July 12, 2001 -- by local CIA agent Larry Mitchell, yet allowed to leave in peace.
- Ø The midnight journey on November 10, 2001 -- which lasted hours -- of the top leadership of Al-Qaeda and the Taliban from Kabul, the capitol of Afghanistan, to Jalalabad, under skies owned by the US Air Force. Said an eyewitness, upon their safe arrival: "We don't understand how they weren't all killed the night before -- because they came in a convoy of at least a thousand cars and trucks."
- Ø The midnight journey on November 14, 2001 -- again lasting hours -- of the top leadership of Al-Qaeda and the Taliban from Jalalabad to the mountain caves of Tora Bora. This time, the convoy was comprised of many hundreds of vehicles and was judged by American Intelligence sources to have been joined in Jalalabad by bin Laden. As it proceeded -- the US Air Force was kept busy bombing the Jalalabad Airport, but left the convoy unmolested.

- Ø The airlift on November 25, 2001, which involved dozens of aircraft in a tightly scheduled and systematic evacuation of thousands of Al-Qaeda and Taliban officials from Konduz into Pakistan. This operation, which unfolded over the course of the entire night, remained undisturbed by United States Forces. (5.9)

All of which pre-dated the preposterous closing gambit of our fiercely bloodthirsty quest for justice in the immediate aftermath of 9/11, wherein the United States Army, having isolated and trapped Mr. bin Laden in Tora Bora, refused to allow its own elite 10th Mountain Division troops to move against him. The US chose instead to delegate his capture to the very same Afghan Warlords for whom the legendary Usama has towered for years as the greatest Muslim hero since the prophet Mohammed himself.

Meanwhile, American military leadership was content to have surrounded Tora Bora -- on three sides. The fourth side features two centuries old footpaths that lead from the mountains down into Pakistan. The US Air Force bombed the holy living hell out of one of these footpaths. The other, inexplicably, completely escaped their attention.

In light of this indefensible "error," Mr. bin Laden and his colleagues -- in yet another example of their "terrifying and diabolical brilliance" -- simply walked away. (5.10)

“.... Brig. Gen. James N. Mattis, the commander of some 4,000 marines who had arrived in the Afghan theater by now. Mattis, along with another officer with whom I spoke, was convinced that with these numbers he could have surrounded and sealed off bin Laden's lair, as well as deployed troops to the most sensitive portions of the largely unpatrolled border with Pakistan. He argued strongly that he should be permitted to proceed to the Tora Bora caves. The general was turned down.”

President Clinton's new $165 million library... was funded in part by gifts of $1 million or more each from the Saudi royal family and three Saudi businessmen

That John O'Neill was not going to look the other way or keep his mouth shut with the fires of such hypocritically stoked rage engulfing him was obvious.

Plans were made to “smear” his reputation, thereby destroying any possible future for the man at the FBI. That much is very clear. What plans might have been made for his post-FBI retirement years are less clear.

What is most telling, perhaps, is the degree to which the “transgressions” that caused Mr. O'Neill to finally resign in protest from a thirty-year career -- his “overly aggressive” relations with authorities in Yemen; and a briefcase of classified documents he had briefly misplaced eighteen months earlier at an FBI conclave in Tampa -- were suddenly deemed worthy of news coverage immediately before his death.

For years, O'Neill had enjoyed a vivid reputation and the respect of colleagues within the Intelligence community and elsewhere in government, and had been interviewed on occasion, but he was far better described by his excellent work than his public profile.

Somewhere within the powers that be, however, someone saw a need to put an end to his obscurity.

Out of the blue, stories about his previous “deficiencies” as an agent -- followed the very next week by the relatively unimportant news of his retirement -- were covered extensively by both the Washington Post and the New York Times.

Among his legions of friends, the coincidence of the unwelcome attention and the tragedy that would follow proved difficult to fathom.

It was as if the amazingly ironic circumstances of the imminent death of Mr. O'Neill.....

- Ø among the most thoroughly knowledgeable anti-Usama bin Laden operatives the United States had produced;
- Ø the most aggressive and most successful in his approach to al-Qaeda;
- Ø who is suddenly singled out for reputation-destroying attention in a high-profile, "FBI sourced" PR campaign to force his retirement;
- Ø who immediately thereafter lands beneath the tailor made "golden parachute" of the high-paying Director of Security for the World Trade Center gig;
- Ø but who dies within days at the hands of his "prey" in the rubble of 9/11.....

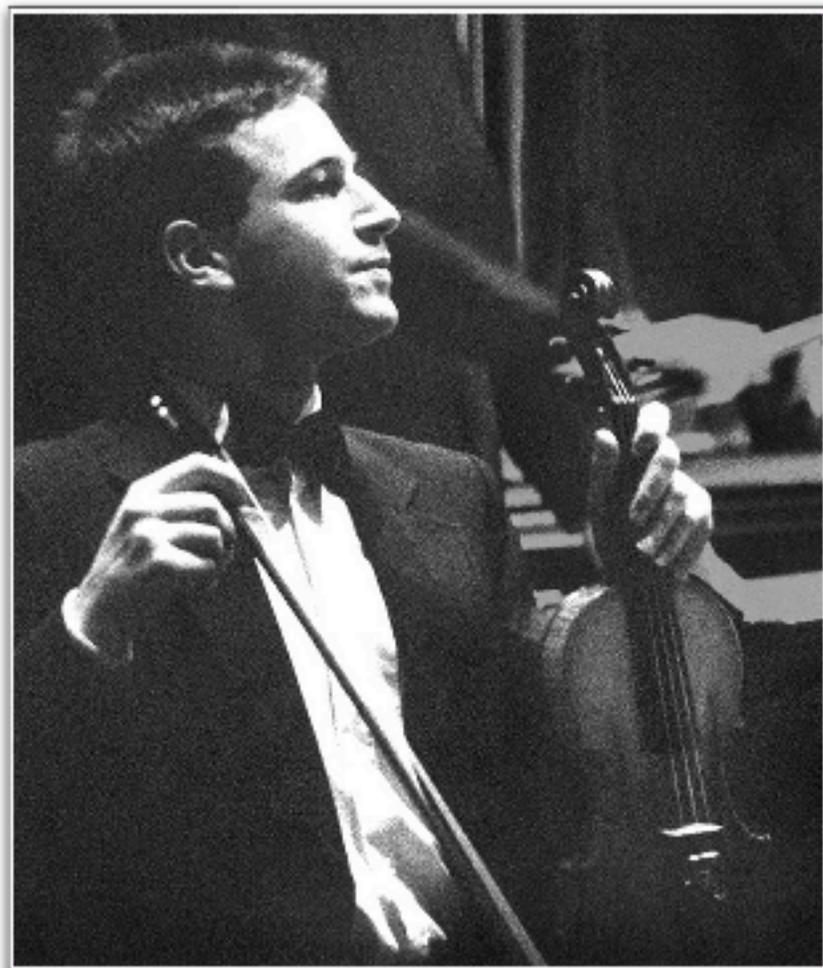

..... had demanded a published preamble.

In Chaim Kupferberg's riveting article about the questions raised by John O'Neill's death (<http://globalresearch.ca/articles/KUP206A.html>), we are offered astute observations on the long campaign of storytelling that prepared the American public to react to the horrors of 9/11 along pre-inscribed lines. Kupferberg has been paying attention, and reveals an overview of many widely, but randomly reported pieces.

He points out that it is a very small circle of people who have actually reported almost everything that is "known" in the west about Mr. bin Laden -- all the "facts" on which his Legend is based. Most of these stories have been re-configured and repeated ad infinitum in a "top down flow" by other "reporters," as the Specter of His Myth has come to be taken as a nightmare completely divorced from the rarely reported efforts of our Government to empower him in the first place. And to sustain him -- purposefully and indefinitely -- as our Great Enemy.

It is in the more complicated dance between the "terrorist mastermind" and the CIA, the ISI and MI6, that a truer picture of Mr. bin Laden's role as a mechanism for imposing control in the west might be gained. But to form useful thoughts about that dance requires some reading, and a little dispassionate thought. Mr. Kupferberg's writing for the Centre for Research on Globalisation is an excellent place to begin. (5.11)

Young Danny

Among his peers, Daniel Pearl was not only considered an excellent reporter, but one of the all-time "great guys," his singular brilliance underscored by grace and humor in dealings with competitors and friends alike. In the end, it was the man's straightforward appetite for the truth -- in a covert culture where deceit is the common currency -- that cost him his life.

To comprehend the dark beast that consumed him, it's necessary to back track a bit, and make ourselves familiar with another remarkable young man -- a thug/terrorist/freedom fighter by the name of Omar Saeed Sheikh. In the words of the London Times, Omar Saeed is "a man who has connections that reach high into Pakistan's military and intelligence elite and into the innermost circles of Usama Bin Laden and the al-Qaeda organization."

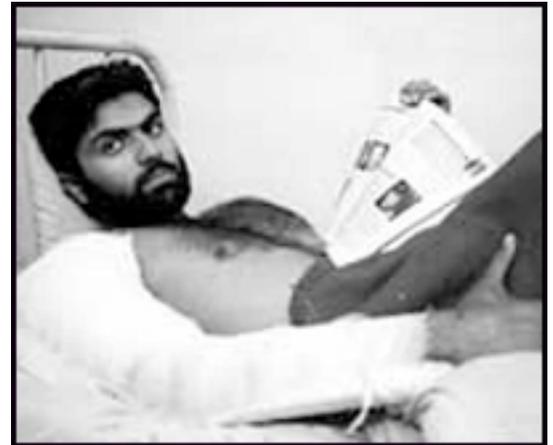

Saeed grew up in London, the son of a wealthy Pakistani clothing manufacturer, and developed early into a man of superior mental and physical powers. While still a student at the London School of Economics -- specializing in statistics and mathematics -- he founded a successful shares and equities business and distinguished himself as a world class arm wrestler and expert in the martial arts. His chess was of championship caliber. (6.1)

Radicalized by charity work during the Bosnian War in 1992, where he witnessed Serbian atrocities perpetrated on Bosnian Muslims, Saeed emerged in Pakistan as a new and gifted player in the world of Jihad. His skills in economics and mathematics, his physical prowess, his command of English and the intricacies of Western Culture -- and his fanaticism -- were not lost on recruiters for the Inter-Services Intelligence organization, better known as the ISI. In 1993, Saeed became an asset of the ISI -- the CIA-spawned "government within the Pakistani government" -- which had given birth to the Taliban. The ISI immediately sent him to Al Qaeda's Khalid Bin Waleed training camp in Afghanistan. In short order, Saeed was teaching the classes he had come to take, and had caught the eye of bin Laden, who took to calling him "my special son." Saeed returned to Afghanistan a second time in December 1993 to study "surveillance techniques, disguise, interrogation, secret codes, and how to mount attacks and night ambushes” at a camp run by the Pakistani Army's Special Services Group. (6.2)

In 1994, Saeed set up a kidnapping operation in India that netted three British tourists and an American, whom he attempted to trade for the freedom of Kashmiri separatists. Indian police foiled the proposed deal and arrested the kidnapers after a counter attack in which Saeed was wounded. Though the ISI interceded, offering to post his bail, Saeed was convicted and began serving a long sentence in India's Tihar prison. Ever the player, he was soon the “emir” of the mostly Muslim prison population, and described by his keepers as a “model inmate.” In 1999, Great Britain offered Saeed asylum and forgiveness of his crimes if he would return to England and reveal his working knowledge of Al-Qaeda. He apparently refused.

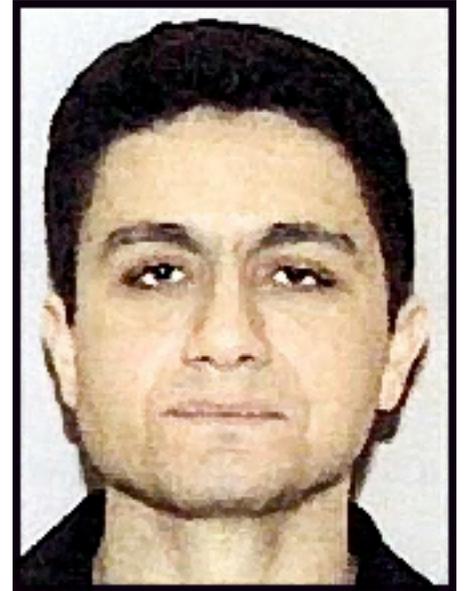

In December of 1999, Muslim radicals hijacked an Indian Airlines jetliner and negotiated a ransom deal with the government of India whereby the 154 passengers they had taken hostage would be freed in exchange for the release of Omar Saeed and two others. Free again, Saeed was taken to a guest house in Kandahar where he was visited by Usama bin Laden and Mullah Omar, the leader of the Taliban. (6.3) A few days later, Saeed returned to Pakistan and got busy.

While living, according to Newsweek, “openly, and opulently, in a wealthy Lahore neighborhood” -- in a house given to him by the ISI -- Saeed divided his time between a variety of tasks: In Afghanistan he worked as a trainer with men later connected to the 9/11 hijacking crews and assisted in the development of an encrypted communication system for Al-Qaeda; in Pakistan he worked as a planner on various projects that would eventually play out as deadly terrorist attacks in India, Kashmir and Calcutta. Notably, he helped set up another kidnapping scheme which generated ransom money that would eventually turn up in the American bank accounts of the 9/11 hijackers.

Around this time, sources in the US Government first declared the obvious: that Saeed was a “protected asset” of the ISI, noting that he did little to hide his connections to terrorist organizations, even while attending swanky parties thrown by senior Pakistani government officials. Others in the Pakistani government, meanwhile, were muttering another tune, speculating that Saeed's brazen demonstration of his power -- he visited England twice in this period and was untouched -- was due to his more formidable connections to the CIA, be they reflective of bin Laden's own history of assistance to American Intelligence, or something more recently and independently configured.

In any case, as 9/11 descended, the untouchable charm within Omar Saeed's viciousness began to falter. Within days of the attack, the western press -- working from the same script -- began to "chase the money," and Saeed's aliases were picked apart by MSNBC, The London Times, the Guardian, and eventually, by Newsweek, who finally identified him as the Jihadi released from prison in the 1999 hijacking exchange.

The role of "Usama bin Laden's 9/11 Paymaster," thereby, was formally cast, and just in the nick of time -- given bin Laden's public denial of complicity in the attacks and the urgent need to justify the invasion of Afghanistan. Omar Saeed, after all, was one of bin Laden's favorites -- his golden boy -- and it was Saeed (near left) who had wired $100,000 to lead hijacker Mohammed Atta on the day before the tragedy. It was Omar Saeed who'd been sending such money for months. Therefore, the story went, the money must have come from bin Laden.

Unfortunately, the tidy symmetry of this "smoking gun" connecting The Evil Usama to 9/11 was obliterated within days by further revelations about the amazing Omar.

While Saeed's extensive history as a thug and terrorist and "known associate" of bin Laden was flooding the media-driven new mass consciousness -- his equally extensive history as an accomplished and "untouchable" intelligence asset was not.

Oops.

Enter General Mahmood Ahmed, the Director of Pakistan's ISI, and one of Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf's closest allies. It was General Mahmood's pivotal support that allowed Musharraf to oust the elected Pakistani government in the 1999 Coup d'Etat in which he seized power, and Musharraf had installed General Mahmood as the head of the mega-powerful ISI in return. (6.4)

Musharraf, left, shakes the hand of General Mahmood

It so happens that General Mahmood had come to America one week before 9/11 for the purpose of continuing a series of high level meetings with members of the US government that had been going on for months. In May, CIA director George Tenet and Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage had visited Pakistan, where Tenet had conducted "unusually long" consultations with President Musharraf. (Armitage is well known to politically aware Americans for his connections to the Iran-Contra crimes -- and to DBT/Choice Point, the company whose "80% accurate" data on the identity of supposed felons empowered Jeb Bush to kick almost a hundred thousand law-abiding blacks and hispanics off the Florida voting registries on the eve of his brother's 537 vote "victory" in the 2000 Presidential election. Within the US government, Armitage is also very well known for his "large circle of friends in the Pakistani military and ISI.") (6.5)

In August a delegation of high ranking US Congressional leaders met with General Mahmood in Pakistan, "discussing terrorism," and no doubt taking advantage of the ISI's exceedingly intimate knowledge of all things Bin Laden and Al-Qaeda. Back in Washington now, as the days to 9/11 dwindled down to a precious few, General Mahmood's calendar was literally crammed. He took meetings at the Pentagon and with the National Security Council, as well as meetings with CIA Director Tenet, (right), unspecified officials at the White House and still others at the Pentagon, and a "most important meeting" with Mark Grossman, US Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs. During this week, warnings about an imminent attack against America were pouring in from many countries -- but Pakistan was not among them.

It is worth noting, however, that the good General's flurry of activity did not go unnoticed at home. On September 10, an article in a leading Pakistani newspaper noted that the last time [Mahmood's predecessor] spent so much time in Washington, "domestic [Pakistani] politics turned topsy-turvy within days [a reference to Musharraf's Coup]. That this is not the first visit by Mahmood in the last three months shows the urgency of the ongoing parleys." (6.6)

The pre 9/11 meetings between General Mahmood and US Undersecretary of State for Political Affairs Mark Grossman, left, were cited as particularly important in an article which appeared in The News International, Karachi, Pakistan, on September 10, 2001.

Indeed.

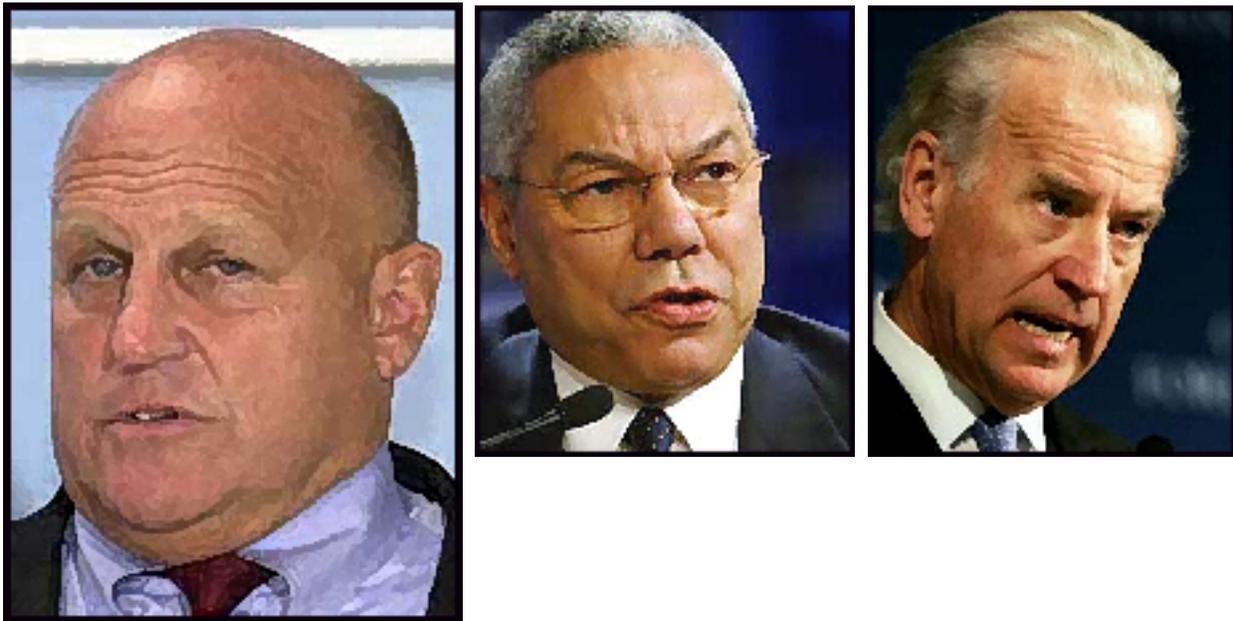

The world certainly did flip upside down on the following day.

On September 11, General Mahmood made his way to Capitol Hill, where he sat down to breakfast with Representative Porter Goss (R) and Senator Bob Graham (D), the chairmen of the House and Senate Intelligence Committees, respectively. The meal ended at the moment the second plane hit the second tower. (6.7)

Within weeks of this most memorable breakfast with Mahmood, the same tandem of Goss (near left) and Graham would go on to head the joint House-Senate investigation into the September 11 attacks. Mahmood, for his part, instantly segued into a key role as the official coordinator of Pakistan's post 9/11 assistance to America in the newly proclaimed "War on Terror." On September 12 and 13, Mahmood met -- again -- with Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage, Senator Joseph

At this point, with President Bush championing the "extraordinary cooperation" of our new strategic partners, the Pakistanis -- as negotiated by General Mahmood -- and Omar Saeed, though publicly outed as the "9/11 Paymaster," still moving without hiding from Dubai through Pakistan and into Afghanistan -- an odd thing happened.

Someone decided to look a little more closely at the mechanics of these relationships.....

Unfortunately for those who work so diligently to obscure disturbing truths, reporters for several newspapers in Pakistan and the Times of India had been nosing around and came to discover that it was not Usama bin Laden after all who had ordered Omar Saeed to send the last $100,000 payment to the hijackers.

It was General Mahmood.

In other words, the same man who had been conducting these feverish negotiations for months with multiple officials at the highest levels of the US government -- and who had directly represented Pakistan in the establishment of that government's new "pro-American" role immediately after the murder of three thousand Americans -- had quietly made time to cover the less lofty business at hand. He made sure the lead murderer -- Mohamed Atta -- got paid.

And Congressmen Goss and Graham, the same two men with whom he'd been eating breakfast on 9/11, would soon be leading the official congressional investigation into the same murderous crime which Mahmood had facilitated.

What is more surprising -- and profoundly more unsettling for what it implies about the integrity of the supposedly "free" western media -- is that the complete coverage provided to the American people of this hideously ominous complication of the "Official 9/11 Story" was a single item buried in the online version of the Wall Street Journal, which mentioned, in passing, that "US authorities ... confirm[ed] the fact that $100,000 [was] wired to WTC hijacker Mohammed Atta from Pakistan by Ahmad Umar [Saeed] Sheikh at the insistence of General Mahmood." (6.8)

Pakistan, of course, cannot be passed off as a band of crazies lurking in caves. Pakistan possesses nuclear weapons and its scientists have been prone to selling nuclear secrets to rogue states like North Korea. Pakistan teaches Radicalism on a scale unsurpassed on the planet, and has been doing so for years in close cooperation with the United States. (6.9) As is the case with Intelligence agencies the world over, the CIA was present at the birth of the ISI, and promoted Islamic Jihad largely through the offices of the ISI.

Despite which -- and equally indicative of the widespread acquiescence to domestic disinformation among the owners of the mainstream western media -- the concept of Pakistan, rather than Afghanistan -- or Iraq -- bearing responsibility in the greatest crime ever perpetrated against the United States has been left virtually unexamined.

And in keeping with this theme, the amazing Omar Saeed was also abruptly flushed into media oblivion. Immediately and almost without exception, the roguish, colorfully brazen “9/11 Paymaster,” having been perp-walked throughout the western world only days before -- the “smoking gun” who supposedly connected Usama bin Laden to the “Attack on America” -- disappeared in the post 9/11 press as if he’d never existed.

For a while. In contrast to the murderous complicity of General Mahmood -- which was suppressed in the west from the moment it surfaced -- Saeed’s story had been promoted far too enthusiastically to escape the long-term curiosity of committed observers. His fate would have to be accounted for.

Enter Daniel Pearl.

In the months following 9/11, Pearl -- a notable non-coward -- had begun to focus on the obvious. A list of the projects Pearl was known or rumored to be working on (6.10) would include:

- Ø A published piece about the ties between the ISI and a Pakistani organization that was working on giving bin Laden nuclear secrets before 9/11.
- Ø A published piece about the curious fact that Jaish-e-Mohammad (a known terrorist group with which Omar Saeed was associated) still had its office running and bank accounts working, even after President Musharraf claimed to have banned the group.
- Ø An investigation into links between shoe bomber Richard Reid and Pakistani militants connected to the ISI.

- Ø An investigation into the protection provided to known terrorist and gangster Dawood Ibrahim by the ISI.
- Ø An investigation into the activities of purported 9/11 mastermind Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, on which Pearl was working with former CIA agent Robert Baer (the prototype for George Clooney's character in Syriana).
- Ø An investigation into US training and backing of the ISI.

It would be the kidnapping of Daniel Pearl which would provide for the "re-casting" of Omar Saeed, whose original prominence as the "9/11 Paymaster" had been almost -- but not quite completely -- expunged from the public consciousness.

Pearl was by this time in Pakistan, asking impertinent questions and seeking to meet with certain "likely suspects" in the world of Pakistani intelligence. As Pearl began to stir things up, Omar Saeed suddenly began to matter again to the United States government.

American authorities began to apply pressure, making no mention of 9/11 but finding it belatedly expedient to indict the terrorist for his 1994 kidnapping of the American citizen which had landed Saeed in the Indian prison, but which had been ignored by the US for nearly eight years.

FBI Director Robert Mueller flew to the Mideast, where he met with investigators in India who "told" him that they had evidence Omar Saeed had sent the $100,000 to Mohamed Atta on September 10, 2001.

This revelation was treated as "news," even though it had been reported in the press more than three months previously, at which time no effort had been made to arrest the freely circulating Saeed.

The date of Mueller's meetings in India was January 22, 2002.

The very next day, January 23, Daniel Pearl was kidnapped in Karachi, Pakistan.

The very next day, January 24, Mueller flew to Pakistan for a meeting with President Musharraf -- in which he was reported to have discussed the United States' renewed and keen interest in -- Omar Saeed.

On January 29, Daniel Pearl was murdered. Though his fate was kept secret for a month, and though his kidnappers had originally presented a list of political demands to the media, it was clear in retrospect that they had planned to kill him all along.

As President Musharraf himself would later opine.....

"Perhaps Daniel Pearl was over-intrusive. A mediaperson should be aware of the dangers of getting into dangerous areas. Unfortunately, he got over-involved in..... 'intelligence games.'"

With an unknowing world still waiting and rooting for Pearl's release, Saeed's name was leaked as the "mastermind" of his capture, and international outrage was appropriately galvanized. The Pakistani government -- which had pretended to be "looking for him" all through January at the request of the US, even while Saeed was regularly attending parties in the company of the many high-ranking government officials he counted as friends -- finally turned on him. They took his family into custody to force his hand.

Even now, however, Musharraf dissembled, claiming ignorance of Saeed's whereabouts during the eight days the "ex-Paymaster, newly charged Kidnapper" worked out a deal in the headquarters of his colleagues at the ISI. The deal defined the limits of how much Saeed would reveal of his knowledge of the activities of the ISI -- in return for a light sentence in the trial he must undergo in the Daniel Pearl affair.

Saeed was typically cocky at the outset, bragging that he would never be extradited to the US and that he was sure he would do no more than "three or four years" for his non-lethal "consulting role" in Pearl's abduction. He refused to discuss 9/11, and when pressed by the presiding judge, threatened that the jurist would be killed if he didn't adjust his attitude. The trial seemed to be going well for Saeed, since many of the witnesses the government needed to make its case against him were mysteriously unable to show up to testify.

What Saeed didn't seem to realize at the time, however, was that he himself had been maneuvered into sharing Daniel Pearl's fate. Like Pearl, Saeed had come to be identified as a high profile player in possession of knowledge considered unacceptably volatile to the carefully tailored requirements of the Afghan/bin Laden/Iraqi focused

“War on Terror.” In a departure from its normal timidity, the Washington Post went so far as to remark of his trial, “The [ISI] is a house of horrors waiting to break open. Saeed has tales to tell.”

President Musharraf thought so too, and moved to quash the possibility. The “three or four year” sentence Saeed had won in his deal with the ISI was summarily replaced by a sentence of death. Though he immediately withdrew his “confession” and demanded an appeal, he has not been heard from since.

On March 3, US Secretary of State Colin Powell, whose reputation was once centered on his supposedly unimpeachable integrity, officially denied any possibility of a link between the ISI and the murder of Daniel Pearl. London’s The Guardian was among the only public voices calling him out on this obvious lie -- given that the man convicted of the crime had been on the ISI payroll since 1993, a fact that even Donald Rumsfeld, perhaps inadvertently, had publicly acknowledged.

Powell (right) in the throes of his brilliant, unscripted Iraq-Invasion-Justification performance before the United Nations. “Saddam’s anthrax could be transported in a vial JUST LIKE THIS, etc etc etc!”

But again, what is even more remarkable in all of this is the way it was underplayed in the western press. Omar Saeed was, after all, not only the convicted murderer of Daniel Pearl and a known associate of Usama bin Laden and a brazenly untouchable agent of the ISI and a convicted criminal/terrorist/thug with an international rap sheet that included dozens of terrorist bombing related human deaths -- he had also been publicly proclaimed the “9/11 Paymaster” -- just four months previously. One would think that an examination of this man would make front page headlines all over the world.

But outside of India and Pakistan, most accounts of Pearl’s trial neglected to mention any of it.

Other accounts chose to mention one or two of Saeed’s roles but not the others, as if the obvious implications that would ensue by “connecting the dots” -- that this man was known throughout the US government and beyond to have been simultaneously involved in a damning combination of activities and associations that profoundly alters the official “Legend of 9/11” -- were better left unconsidered.

It was as if a directive that been handed down that specified each media outlet needed to make a choice: Report Saeed’s story through the prism of his ties to Al-Qaeda and 9/11; or report Saeed’s story through the prism of his ties to Daniel Pearl and the ISI -- but do not linger on both.

Taking this “better left incomplete” tack to the story were such stalwart repositories of the public trust as ABC News, the Boston Globe, the Associated Press, the Los Angeles Times, the New York Daily News, CNN, The Guardian, The Independent, Time Magazine, the New York Post, the Evening Standard, the Sunday Herald, USA Today, Cox News, the Observer, the Telegraph, Newsweek, the National Post, and MSNBC.

Take, for example, an October 6, 2001 broadcast on CNN during which correspondent Maria Ressa had officially unveiled Omar Saeed as the pseudonymous 9/11 money man: "He [Omar Saeed] is ... linked to the financial network feeding bin Laden's assets," she had informed us, "So therefore he's quite an important person ... because he transfers money between various operatives, and he's a node between al-Qaeda and foot soldiers on the ground ... It provides another key link to bin Laden as the mastermind of the overall [9/11] plot."

Yet just four months later, on February 6, when the network fingered that same Omar Saeed as the FBI's main suspect in the kidnapping of Daniel Pearl, CNN (and Maria Ressa) were stricken by a curious case of the same amnesia that infected news outlets throughout the west -- neglecting to mention that Saeed had been previously (and dramatically) outed by them as the 9/11 bag-man.

In all of the west, it was only the London Times and the Pittsburgh Tribune-Review which found the wherewithal to note that Omar Saeed had been connected simultaneously to Al-Qaeda and the ISI, and only the London Times -- on April 21, 2002 -- which had the simple courage to outline the whole of the story:

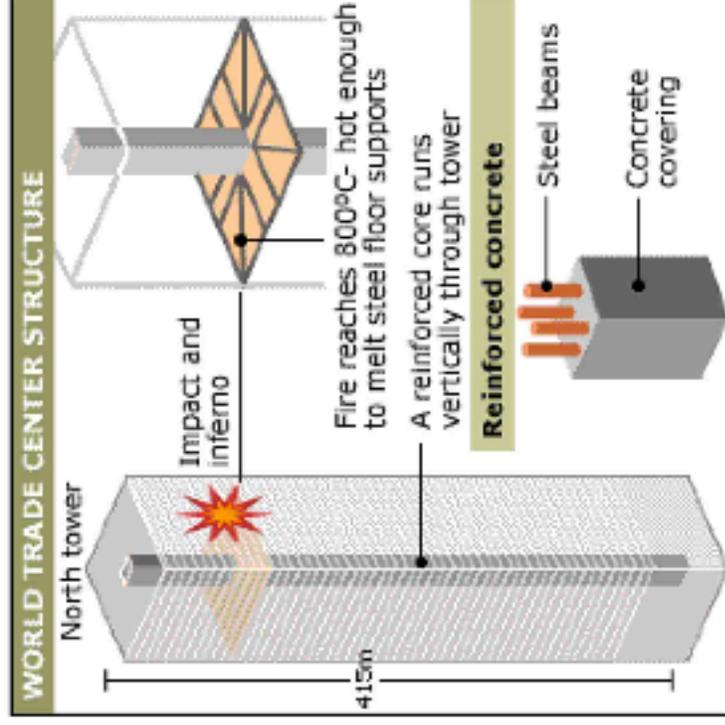

That not only had Omar Saeed been implicated in the training of the 9/11 “hijackers;” he was also working for the official Intelligence Agency of Pakistan, and acting on a direct order from its Director, General Mahmood Ahmed -- one of the highest ranking officials in the government and a man closely allied with Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf -- on the day he paid Mohamed Atta the “go-ahead” money that led immediately to the mass murder of three thousand innocent human beings.

Though it was a blatant, brutal, and outrageously incriminating indicator that the truly heinous demons beneath the 9/11 Legend have been shielded from justice, our nation’s leaders -- for reasons that remain unchallenged -- pretended not to notice.

To this day -- not a single one of them has ever been made to publicly speak this truth.

You can look it up. (6.11)

In the wake of 9/11, the illustration below was quickly produced by the BBC and distributed throughout the west. It is a remarkable study in lies -- featuring a misleading description of the size and nature of the Core Structures of the World Trade Center, the true construction of which (at right) featured 47 steel box columns, measured 87 x 133 feet and did not contain concrete, which, unlike steel, can spall in a fire. In addition, the document makes a false assertion about the fires, which did not sustain temperatures anywhere near 800°C (as evidenced by their black smoke; the videotaped presence of a doomed but hopeful woman waving from the impact hole; and the published findings of the National Institute of Standards and Technology). Finally, the BBC tells a blatant lie about the melting point of steel, which is -- in truth -- 1370°C.

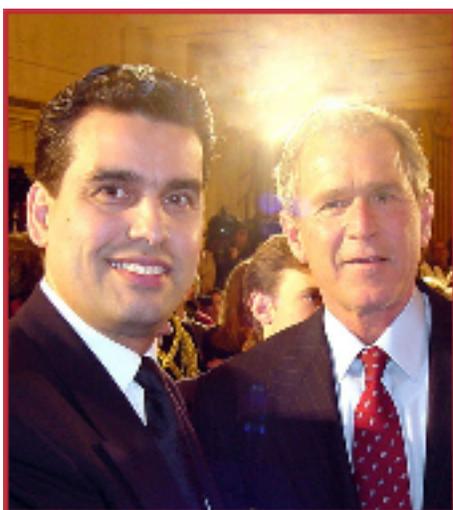

With regards to Scott Forbes and the “re-cabling power down” that was visited upon the South Tower during its last weekend of existence -- some may choose to chalk up such an odd occurrence as one more coincidence. It clearly speaks, however, in support of the hundreds of statements from firemen and policemen and medical technicians and reporters and eyewitnesses and survivors and victims -- who described seeing, hearing, feeling the shock waves of, and in many cases being knocked flat down by -- a series of huge explosions. An objection raised by supporters of the Official Version of Events to the extensive testimony of these witnesses has always been: “Those hundreds of people were mistaken. The bad guys couldn’t have planted explosives without prior access...”

Scott, by the by, had been scheduled to take the following Friday, the 14th, off from work, but a last minute swap with a colleague (who survived) gave him September 11th off instead. That morning, at home, as he watched the tragedy unfold, his thoughts came back to the crew that took over the building during the power down.

Over the course of the ensuing months, he sent letters and emails to the Port Authority, and then repeatedly to the 9/11 Commission, asking that a possible relationship between those men, that time, and the “global disintegrations” of the buildings which ensued be investigated. He received no response.

Upon returning to England in 2003, Scott was contacted by London Police and asked to come in for debriefing regarding his experiences. But neither he, nor any of his American colleagues, including the many who were actually in the buildings on 9/11 and survived, were ever contacted by any investigative body in the United States. (7.1)

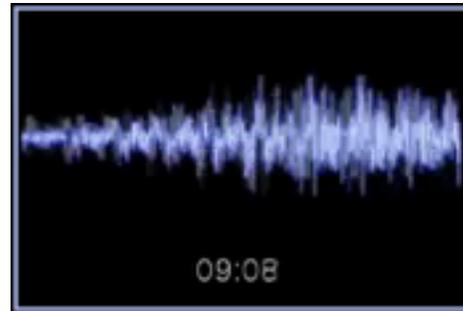

Which is ridiculous, but completely in keeping with a pattern of avoidance that has killed real investigation. William Rodriguez, for example, was the twenty year veteran of the North Tower maintenance crew who had the only set of keys to all the floors on 9/11. William had thrown himself into a hero’s duty that morning: leading firefighters up the stairwells unlocking doors as they went; grabbing people in trouble and humping them out of the building before turning around and heading back in. He is credited with the rescue of fifteen people on 9/11, and was among the last persons to make it out the door on the day -- diving under a fire truck beneath the roar of the suddenly concrete air.

Rodriguez’ heroism got him a photo op with President Bush, but it didn’t buy him any respect from the 9/11 Commission. Leveraging his celebrity to force the Commission’s hand in the face of their bizarre reluctance to interview him, he finally got a chance to sit down before them and testify. (In private session -- off limits to the press.) (7.2)

William was with co-workers, preparing for his shift in a sub-basement of the North Tower, when a massive explosion detonated -- below them. This explosion melted the skin off a co-worker's body, knocked walls down, and obliterated a 50-ton hydraulic press. Seconds later, they heard the first plane impact the tower, 95 floors above them.

Despite the fact that his description of an underground bomb going off just prior to the arrival of the plane -- though corroborated by dozens of others, Philip Morelli (knocked down by massive underground explosion, made it into a bathroom before the airplane impact above, exited to rubble, chaos, and injuries -- "walls gone.... faces knocked off"), Jose Sanchez (whose co-worker suffered a broken leg and a broken kneecap and had to be dragged out of the basement), Mike Pecoraro & Felipe David (the burn victim) among them; and despite the fact that the two distinct events were recorded on audio tape in a room full of business people across the street in One Liberty Plaza -- the plane crash following the first explosion after a nine-second delay. (Frame captures above are from the DVD: Loose Change Second Edition, in which you can HEAR the separate explosions interrupt the meeting); and despite the fact that New York Police reported yet another basement explosion some eight minutes later -- the first of many in both buildings throughout the whole grinding horror of the agonizing death watch....

And despite the fact that the use of multiple devices is a basic terrorist strategy -- not a single word of William Rodriguez' testimony was included in the 9/11 Commission's report. Nor was any mention whatever of the hundreds of other reports of explosions which methodically prepared each building for its failure -- and then obliterated it. To mention these explosions would have forced two questions:

- Ø When were these charges planted in the buildings?
- Ø Given the obvious professionalism of the job -- who planted them?

Please do not leave this project without making yourself familiar with the transcripts, video, and audio evidence of these explosions. The huge, prolonged one that preceded the North Tower's obliteration is hauntingly recorded on the DVD: 9/11 Eyewitness.

Despite the damning presence in Manhattan of men identifying themselves as FBI agents, circulating in the immediate aftermath of the tragedies -- suppressing interviews and repeating that "IT WAS FIRE THAT BROUGHT THE TOWERS DOWN" -- the first responders' testimony about these explosions is very persuasive. A: 4TH EXPLOSION ROCKS

Why not?

Firefighter Louie Cacchio: After he reached the 24th floor, he and another fireman “heard this huge explosion that sounded like a bomb [and] knocked off the lights and stalled the elevator.” After they pried themselves out of the elevator, “another huge explosion like the first one hits.”

Survivor Teresa Veliz: “There were explosions going off everywhere. I was convinced there were bombs planted all over the place and someone was sitting at a control panel pushing detonator buttons..... There was another explosion. And another. I didn't know where to run.”

Steve Evans of the BBC: “I was at the base of the second tower..... that was hit..... There was an explosion..... The base of the building shook..... [T]hen there was a series of explosions.”

Sue Keane, New Jersey Police Department (ex-U.S. Army Sergeant): “[I]t sounded like bombs going off..... I knew something was going to happen..... It started to get dark, then all of a sudden there was this massive explosion.”

WNYW FOX 5 TV Anchor: "There is an explosion at the base of the building..... white smoke from the bottom..... something happened at the base of the building! Then another explosion.”

Assistant Fire Commissioner Stephen Gregory: "Before Number Two came down..... I saw low-level flashes..... I saw a flash flash flash and then it looked like the building came down..... You know like when they demolish a building, how when they blow up a building, when it falls down?"

Paramedic Kevin Darnowski: "I started walking..... towards Vesey. I heard three explosions, and then we heard like groaning and grinding, and Tower Two started to come down.”

Emergency Medical Technician Gregg Brady, regarding Tower One, sixteen minutes later: “I heard three loud explosions. I look up and the north tower is coming down now.”

Captain Karin Deshore: “Somewhere around the middle of the..... Trade Center, there was this orange and red flash coming out. Initially it was just one flash. Then this flash just kept popping all the way around the building and that building had started to explode..... and with each popping sound it was initially an orange and then a red flash came out of the building and then it would just go all around the building on both sides as far as I could see. These popping sounds and the explosions were getting bigger, going up and down and then all around the building.”

Firefighter Richard Banaciski: “There was just an explosion in the south tower. It seemed like on television when they blow up these buildings. It seemed like it was going all the way around like a belt, all these explosions.”

Deputy Fire Commissioner Thomas Fitzpatrick: “It looked like sparkling..... around the building..... exactly the way it looks when they show you those implosions on TV.”

Beth Fertig of WNYC Radio: “It just descended like a timed explosion - like when they are deliberately bringing a building down..... It was coming down so perfectly..... I was thinking, 'They got everyone out, and they're bringing the building down because they have to.'”

Paramedic Daniel Rivera: “[I]t was [like a] professional demolition where they set the charges on certain floors and then you hear 'Pop, pop, pop, pop, pop.'”

Firefighter Dennis Tardio: "It was as if as if they had detonated ... as if they had planned to take down a building, boom-boom-boom-boom-boom-boom-boom-boom.”

Survivor in Hospital: "...and then all of a sudden it started like..... it sounded like gunfire..... you know, bang, bang, bang, bang, bang, bang and then all of a sudden three big explosions.”

Firefighter Paul Isaac: "There were definitely bombs in those buildings..... the 'higher-ups' forbid discussion of this fact.”

Is any of this evidence of the “C” word? Well, regarding 9/11 -- of course it is. Unless we are to believe that each of the purported hijackers got the idea for the crimes independently of one another -- we know that a conspiracy planned and executed them. The questions that remain unanswered are:

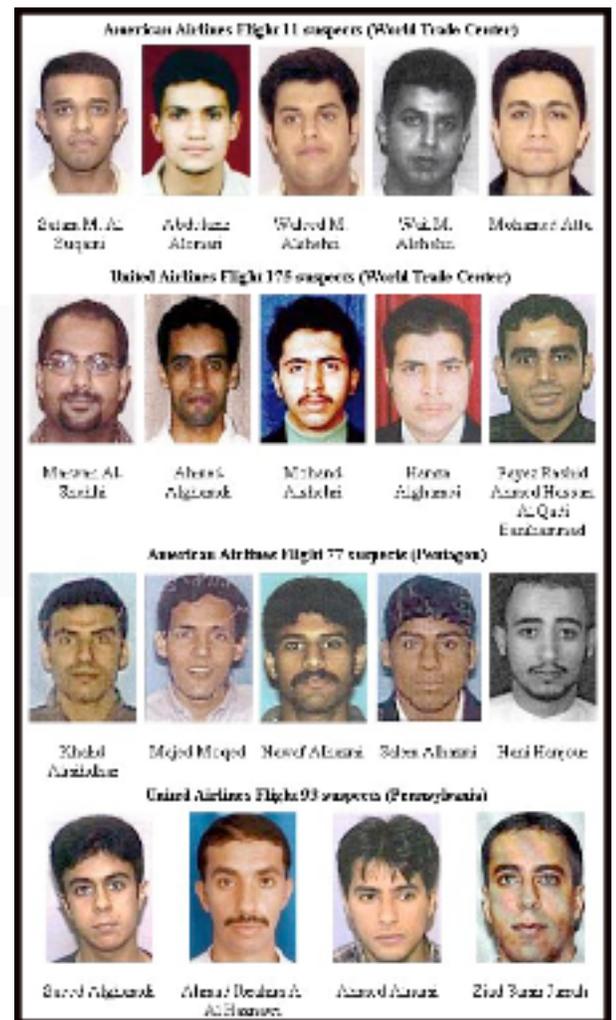

How long is the list of conspirators?

What combination of allegiances and associations describes them?

What was the ultimate purpose of the crime?

In our need to find “closure,” we find it difficult to ask these questions, especially when those in authority have declared them -- in defiance of all reason -- unnecessary.

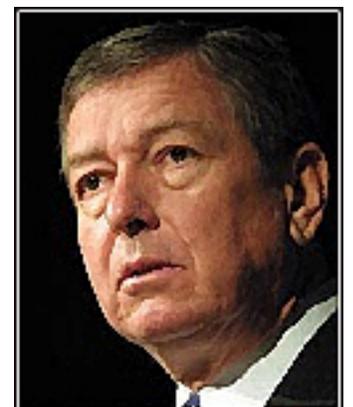

On the contrary. For the sake of our children -- given that the very essence of how we practice democracy has suddenly been cast into doubt by this crime -- it is critical that we step back and consider these questions carefully.

How long is the list of conspirators?

Ø Even as the mugshots of the nineteen “martyrs” were being broadcast to the country, Attorney General John Ashcroft began announcing that the hijackers had depended on the assistance of many accomplices within the United States. First we heard of “six hijack teams,” then a group of “fifty” conspirators, then “75 individuals who are currently detained,” then “over 480 people arrested,” and soon “nearly 1,000 individuals.....”

All of which drove home the “terrorizing” idea that America had been invaded by an Army of Dangerous but Invisible Aliens now lurking within -- and that American citizens would therefore need to accept a reduction of their Constitutional rights in order to guarantee their security.

Meanwhile, Americans who were waiting for the comfort of watching these hundreds of “terrorists’ accomplices” brought to justice would have a long wait. A year after 9/11 only six of them were still being held -- and to this day, not a single one has been charged with any terrorist related act. (7.4)

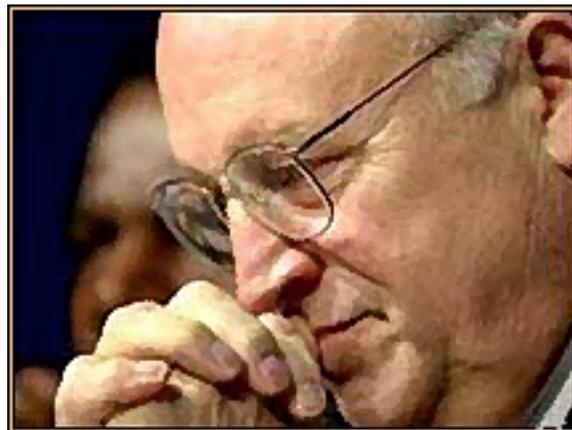

What combination of allegiances and associations describes them?

- Ø As we have learned, the revelation of evidence of State Sponsorship of the Crime -- the "go ahead" payment to Mohamed Atta which was directed by one of the highest-ranking officials of Pakistan -- was officially ignored by the United States. Immediately, though, the US responded to the discovery of this complicity by disappearing its own internationally trumpeted "Bin Laden 911 Paymaster" story, rather than re-naming it -- truthfully -- as the "Pakistan 911 Paymaster" story.

When a government lies to its people -- that government has something to hide: That the interests of the ISI are often indistinguishable from those of the CIA, perhaps? Instead of any sober measure that might have pursued the criminal truth, the public was hammered anew with "Al-Qaeda" and "bin Laden," up to and through the invasion of Afghanistan. As soon as bin Laden himself and virtually all of his Taliban "hosts" were allowed to slip away, however, the mantra shifted abruptly to "Iraq" and "Saddam" and "Weapons of Mass Destruction."

This, despite overwhelming and long-standing evidence that Saddam and Usama were deeply committed mutual enemies, that Saddam had never allowed even a whiff of Al-Qaeda anywhere near Baghdad, and that Iraq, obviously, had nothing whatever to do with 9/11.

And this, in retrospect, brazenly ignoring the profoundly unethical, impeachment-worthy campaign that the White House -- and Dick Cheney in particular -- had mounted against the CIA to get that embarrassed agency to produce "actionable intelligence" on these "WMD" that would justify the taking of Iraq. In an act of shame that bloodied his hands and will follow him to his grave, CIA Director George Tenet succumbed to Cheney's pressure. (7.5)

In the years since, many CIA agents of good conscience have come forward to reveal that such sketchy and outdated intelligence as they were able to dig up was thereafter willfully and boldly distorted by the Bush administration -- a federal crime -- to justify their long held plans. (7.6)

Which dovetails cleanly with the revelation that Mr. Cheney's secret "Energy Task Force" meetings had featured maps of Iraq's Oil Fields spread out before Enron and Halliburton Executives and the various other Corporate Giants in attendance -- five months before 9/11. (7.7)

Which dovetails cleanly with the chilling plans for the Subjugation of the Mideast first spelled out in detail in the summer of 1997 by the.....

PNAC's seminal document of intent, signed on June 3rd, 1997, called for unprecedented hikes in military spending, American military bases in Central Asia and the Middle East, toppling of non-complying regimes, abrogation of international treaties, control of the world's energy sources, militarization of outer space, total control of cyberspace, and the willingness to use nuclear weapons to achieve "American" goals. (7.8)

In 1998 the group sent a letter to President Clinton, challenging him to invade Iraq. Clinton declined.

Two years later, at the dawn of the Bush administration, sixteen of the signatories to PNAC's important letters of intent were installed into key positions in the US government. Cheney, of course, became Vice-President (after nominating himself) and Rumsfeld and Wolfowitz took the top two offices at the Pentagon, bringing in their colleague Douglas Feith to run a brand new Office of Special Plans.

While the PNAC manifesto had stated very clearly that the massive reallocation of US financial resources away from domestic concerns and into the unilateral military buildup necessary to launch a new, world dominating American Empire would be a tough sell, efforts to realize the group's goals nevertheless began in earnest. In September of 2000, PNAC -- with startling prescience -- declared that for their imperialistic military goals to be achieved in a timely fashion, it was necessary that the American public be galvanized beyond debate, and for that to happen.....

America would need to suffer some “catastrophic and catalyzing event -- like a New Pearl Harbor.”

(http://www.oldamericancentury.org/pnac_timeline.htm)

Nine months into the Bush Presidency, these unflinchingly bold and visionary men saw their wish come true.

After you have explored this project and have had a chance to absorb the amazing number of “coincidences” that allowed the 9/11 attacks to succeed..... please reflect again on these most startling “coincidences” of all:

- Ø That the “need” for 9/11 had been declared in a Statement of Political Intent by the same Weapons/Oil/Infrastructure-tied Men who had ascended to power shortly before it happened.
- Ø That these men and their corporate sponsors gathered secretly to establish Energy Policy and were known to be scrutinizing maps of Iraqi Oil Fields from February through May of 2001.
- Ø That George Bush, by Executive Order, had declared in May of 2001 that Dick Cheney alone would immediately take over the total coordination of all US anti-terrorism policy and planning.
- Ø That international “intelligence chatter” about imminent Terrorist Attacks on America were picked up all over the globe in the summer of 2001 -- chatter that took the shape of specific warnings to the US from at least eleven countries and included such details as “suicidal intent, multiple hijackings, planes used as weapons against national symbols” (specifically mentioning the World Trade Center) and were reported to a multitude of members of the administration in great detail.
- Ø That on the morning of September 11, 2001, Dick Cheney (in his Presidentially appointed role) was responsible for Six Wargames in America -- one of which (Operation Tripod II) had brought an army of emergency personnel to New York

City only the night before to set up Emergency Equipment and begin preparation for a simulated "Catastrophe in Lower Manhattan."

That another 9/11 "game" diverted military aircraft away from the northeastern United States; that another simulated multiple airline hijackings and caused multiple "false" radar images of "fake" hijacked planes to be inserted onto the screens of NORAD; that another caused the evacuation of key reconnaissance personnel due to a simulated airplane attack.

That taken as a whole, these widespread and well-coordinated exercises ensured that elements of the US military were rehearsing every aspect of the actual 9/11 attacks, even as the "real" attacks began to unfold simultaneously to the Games, thereby guaranteeing a muddled response among the confused and depleted assets of American Air Defense. (7.10)

- Ø That no one in the Bush administration, though in possession of all that intelligence from all those sources -- "multiple and suicidal hijackings" -- saw fit to pick up a phone and alert the Port Authority in New York that a terrorist attack was underway and that the Second Tower should be evacuated before the tragedy worsened.
- Ø That before the end of that day, Donald Rumsfeld had jumped ahead of his colleagues who had thrust Usama bin Laden's name into the spotlight, and was calling on the US Intelligence community to find evidence of Iraq's hand in the crimes -- a call that would eventually bear fruit as Saddam's non-existent Weapons of Mass Destruction.
- Ø That within weeks of 9/11, the Patriot Act was rammed into law, instantly undermining two and a quarter century's worth of checks and balances built into the US Constitution, but creating massive worldwide revenue streams for the new "War on Terror" business. This historically disfiguring legislation had been written in advance of the attacks.
- Ø That Iraq was quickly implicated in a storm of harrowing and incessantly repeated lies and the US military sent reeling into a brutally misconceived "Big Bang! Now What?" duty it was never designed to attempt -- in service of the new international "Constabulary" role envisioned for America by PNAC.

- Ø That the War Profiteering Businesses connected to PNAC have since proceeded to line up and gorge themselves at the richest, sloppiest, and most corrupt corporate feeding trough in history.
- Ø And that those in charge on 9/11 have since lied, lied and lied again about their actions on the day, so that all investigations into the STENCH wafting up under the nostrils of a shocked and wondering world -- much more aware than most Americans of the MASSIVE COINCIDENCE THEORY at the heart of the Official US Government Version of These Hellish Events -- have been suppressed, hamstrung and attacked as “unpatriotic” by the very same gang of now wealthier men who’d declared the “need” for just such a World Changing Dose of Hellishness in the first place -- only one year before.

Meanwhile, while paying constant lip service to the depth of its respect for the bravery and sacrifices of the thousands of young men and women who have taken up arms and gone to Iraq to protect America from

Saddam's
Non-Existent
Weapons of Mass Destruction

the Bush Administration's actual demonstration of that respect -- as expressed in its attempts to cut military combat pay, its attack on medical benefits for veterans and their families and its failure to provide adequate armor for soldiers' vehicles and for soldiers' bodies has spoken louder than its every patriotic slogan.

Supporting Our Troops

a passage from

Hostile Takeover
by David Sirota

Even soldiers wounded on the battlefield are not immune from being sacrificed on the altar of tax cuts. Just look at what happened in the lead-up to the Iraq war. In late 2002, as the president began formulating plans to send our soldiers into Iraq, the Bush administration ordered veterans' hospitals to stop publicizing health care benefits that veterans were entitled to. The reason? Budget deficits meant VA hospitals needed to lower costs, and the fewer veterans who knew about their health care benefits, the less money would have to be spent.

Yet on January 7, 2003, Bush said his government was so flush with cash that America could afford his $364 billion plan to eliminate all taxes on stock dividends – a proposal that gave the average American $226 and the average millionaire more than $90,000 a year.

But then, ten days later, the Bush administration said the government was so strapped for money it had to cut off health care benefits for 164,000 veterans. Deficits, though, weren't enough to stop Bush from signing the dividend tax cut into law in September 2003. But deficits were enough to prevent adequate funding of health care services for soldiers wounded in battle. As United Press International discovered a month after Bush signed his dividend tax cut, "hundreds of sick and wounded U.S. soldiers including many who served in the Iraq war are languishing in hot cement barracks while they wait – sometimes for months – to see doctors."

In 2004, it was the same. In January, the president proposed spending $2 trillion on income tax cuts, primarily for the wealthy. That very same month, the White House refused a request by its own Veteran Affairs Secretary for $1.2 billion in emergency funding for veterans' health care.

In February, it got worse. Slate magazine reported that the White House was skimping on funds to provide adequate armor for the thousands of troops being sent into combat in Iraq. In the very same budget that proposed new tax cuts, the White House earmarked zero dollars for various armor production programs. The consequences were severe. As Newsweek reported in April of that year, a study by one defense consultant circulating throughout the army noted that "one in four of those killed in combat in Iraq might be alive if they had had stronger armor around them" and "thousands more who were unprotected have suffered grievous wounds, such as the loss of limbs."

In 2005, this tax and deficit bait-and-switch reached a new low. On January 25, the Wall Street Journal reported that a top Bush administration official publicly blamed veterans' health care spending – not tax cuts – for jeopardizing national security resources. "The amounts [spent on veterans] have gotten to the point where they are hurtful. They are taking away from the nation's ability to defend itself," said David Chu, the Pentagon's undersecretary for personnel and readiness... Two days later, reporters uncovered evidence that the Bush administration was forcing wounded soldiers to pay for their own hospital meals. The next month, the White House released a budget that proposed raising health care premiums on veterans, citing (you guessed it) deficits.

Summing Up the More Recent Examples of Disrespect, the scenario as described.”

It was reported that Tillman had become a critic

What was the ultimate purpose of the crime?

Ø This question is usually approached by asking another: Who benefitted?

Al-Qaeda and Usama bin Laden? Certainly a case can be made that 9/11 represented a great day for these most infamous “Enemies of Freedom.” What the hijackers lacked in numbers and technological savvy they obviously made up for with their hatred of America and their willingness to die for that hatred. Or so the legend goes -- seared into our souls as it was: Quickly, and in bold, scary strokes.

The legend loses its power, however, when exposed to the light of the facts. Such as the fact, for instance, that the widely reported cell phone calls from the doomed passengers that defined the “heart of the story” could not actually have been made from the sky in 2001; that not a single one of the evil-doers’ names appeared on the flight manifests of the airliners they purportedly hijacked; (8.1) that their bodies failed to arrive on the autopsy slabs of the pathologists who processed the dead; (8.2) and most appallingly -- that at least seven of the nineteen suicidal nutjobs had the bad manners to remain alive after killing themselves. (8.3)

Such disconcerting weirdness brings to mind the legendary “Operation Northwoods” proposal. This plan by the US Joint Chiefs of Staff in 1962 to create false identities for false terrorists who would destroy a false American airliner for the purpose of justifying the invasion of a foreign country was a classic “False Flag” conspiracy. (8.4)

The Chairman of the JCS was General Lyman Lemnitzer; the President was Kennedy; the country to be blamed and invaded was Cuba. JFK declined to pursue the murderous scheme, which angered many leaders of the American Military-Industrial Complex -- the same Military-Industrial Complex which President Dwight Eisenhower, a Republican and a lifelong soldier, had pointedly warned the nation to be vigilant against as he left office.

It is also curious, perhaps, that unlike previous terrorist attacks throughout history, no one from the ominous outside world of the “others” took credit for 9/11 -- this greatest of all blows to the great enemy.

Dwight David Eisenhower
Commander of the Allied Forces, WW II

Until, that is, for Khalid Sheikh Mohammed's purported Post Gitmo Torture/Secret Military Tribunal "Confession" in early 2007 that he alone was "responsible for the 9/11 operation from A to Z." (8.5) (Which thankfully covered S, L and P -- the 9/11 phenomenon otherwise known as the "Suspension of the Laws of Physics.")

Mr. bin Laden denied having anything to do with the crimes, even though to claim them would certainly have marked the crowning achievement of his storied legend. (8.6) (The FBI's "Wanted Poster" against him doesn't even mention 9/11.) The video of his purported "proof of guilt" dinner party that was "discovered" by our government on the eve of the invasion of Afghanistan is an odd thing indeed. Not only did the Pentagon-provided translation of the murky soundtrack prove to be inaccurate, (8.7) but the happy joker playing Usama in the thing (E below) seems to have forgotten to be left-handed for the occasion and to have forgotten how old he was supposed to be. This Usama, if indeed it's him, is reminiscent of the pre-kidney disease version -- dramatically younger and heavier. Or perhaps he'd had his nose shortened and his cheeks plumped up for the sake of the camera -- though in his very next video sermon a few weeks later (A) he'd managed to regrow his original nose and lose all the baby fat. Memo to the Disinformation Squad: Who's slacking here? Is it the Time-Stamp Keeper? Or the Casting Director?

On the other hand -- in terms of who benefitted from 9/11 -- we'd have to steal at least a passing glance at the breathtakingly well-positioned Corporate Juggernaut suddenly driving the single most dynamic new sector of the economy of the western world: The War on Terror.

Talk about good timing. Unlike other wars throughout history, the war behind this stunningly huge windfall -- especially to the industries which originally funded PNAC -- has been declared by Vice-President Cheney to be a "war without end." There is now a veritable army of well-connected private contractors doing the excellent work the US has thus far accomplished in Iraq. As of March 2008, these businesses had pocketed roughly half of the $522 billion that American taxpayers had forked over for the privilege of eliminating the WMD that were not there.

Mr. Cheney, of course, not only served as a founding member of PNAC, but as past CEO of Halliburton as well. Perhaps it is no surprise, then, that Halliburton's no-bid contract for its slice of the Iraq Pie was coordinated directly through his office; has thus far generated $21 billion in revenue; and is set up as "Cost-Plus." (8.8)

(For the record -- in the twelve month period ending in October, 2005, Cheney's 433,333 Halliburton stock options had increased in value from $241,498 to more than $8 million -- an increase of 3,281 percent in only one year.) (8.9)

"Cost-Plus" works like this: The more the contractor spends -- the more it makes. The "Plus" in the equation stands for profit. If that profit is pegged at, say, 3% of an expenditure, and Halliburton, needing hotel rooms for its employees in nearby countries, chooses any place but the most expensive Five-Star Resort -- the company leaves money on the table that would otherwise have filled its pockets.

*Welcome to the Ritz, boys!
In the DVD, Iraq for Sale: the War Profiteers, we are provided a first-hand look at the theft such contracts have empowered.*

One Halliburton Exec had the good sense to lease himself an SUV at $7,000 per month for 36 months, instead of just buying it outright for $50,000 or so. The profit on the lease (36 times $7,000 equals $252,000; and $252,000 times the 3% add-on profit equals $7,560) is much higher than the purchase would've yielded ($50,000 times 3% equals only $1,500). (8.10) The fact that the US taxpayer had to come up with an extra $208,060 for the guy's car is completely beside the point. Lest we forget: such strategies are about one thing and one thing only. Defending liberty.

There is no evidence whatsoever that Halliburton has defrauded the US for a penny more than $1.8 billion in Iraq. (8.11) Mr. Cheney's personal net worth is now approaching $100 million. He and his greed-diseased cronies will quickly remind people with a sense of ethics that the government "saves money" by privatizing the waging of such a war, due to the greater "efficiencies" available to these behemoth companies -- a claim best measured by such Freedom on the March details as.....

Individual loads of soldiers' laundry being washed by Halliburton subsidiary KBR for the phenomenally cost-effective sum of only $100 per load. (Soldiers who feel their freshly laundered clothes are not actually sufficiently clean -- a common complaint -- are prohibited from washing their own apparel.)

Brand new $80,000 Halliburton purchased military vehicles being put into operation without such accessories as spare tires, then being ditched and burned by the side of the road -- and reordered -- when the company can't change a flat.

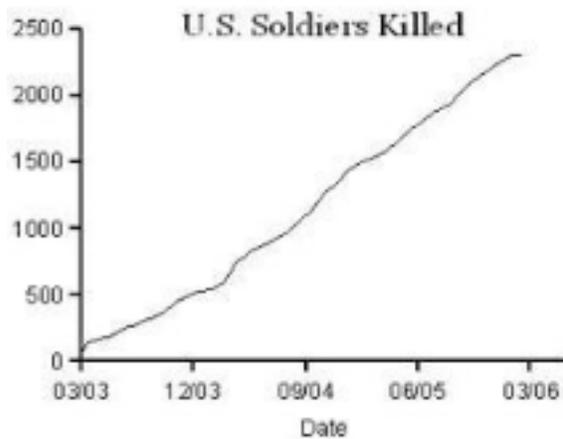

Massive garbage pits full of flaming pyres of incorrectly ordered Halliburton office equipment and computers, being torched by company employees before being invoiced as combat-incurred losses.

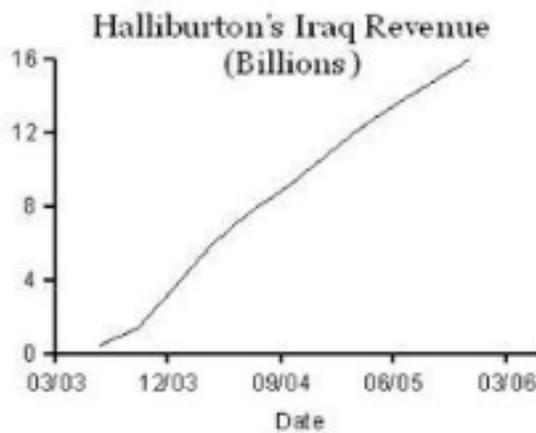

Convoys of Halliburton trucks being driven regularly from city to city in Iraq so as to keep the income from such transport duties flowing, thereby risking the drivers' lives -- even when nothing has been requisitioned and the trucks remain empty.

The provision of hundreds of barely screened, unqualified, untrained, and unmonitored "linguists" (by Titan) to produce error riddled (and therefore useless) translation services in support of the supposedly critical function of military "intelligence" in opposition to the Iraqi insurgency.

The willful decision by Halliburton to send civilians in fuel convoys of US military trucks along perilous routes (without maps) at times when those routes had been declared "off-limits" to US military personnel due to intense levels of insurgent violence, a decision which was in direct violation of those civilians' contracts -- resulted in the brutal deaths of those civilians -- and has never been investigated.

The refusal of Halliburton subsidiary KBR to provide round-the-clock access to food on outlying military bases, forcing US soldiers to stand outside in long lines for up to an hour -- subject to repeated enemy mortar attacks at regularly scheduled and widely known times -- to get their chow.

The side-by-side outrage of Halliburton and KBR employees living in comfortably air-conditioned, state of the art "hooches," while the soldiers whose nearby tents they've been paid to supply suffer chronic respiratory illnesses due to the mold that infests them.

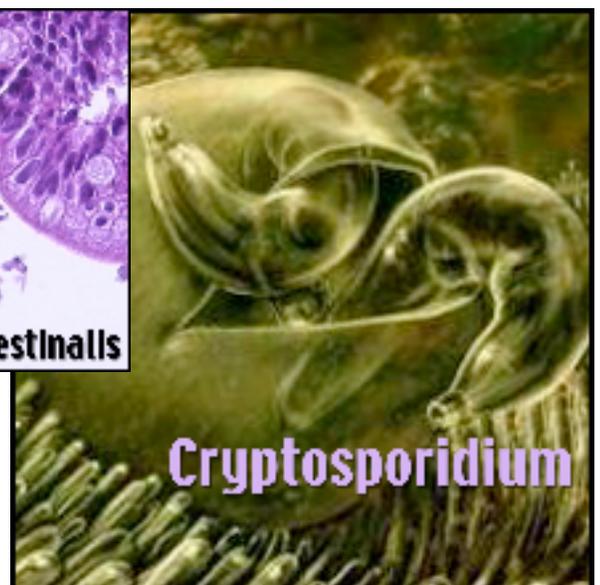

The outsourcing to Halliburton of a wide range of specialized military construction and repair functions that has forced the US soldiers originally recruited and trained to perform these functions to instead teach their privately-hired "replacements" to do the same tasks -- at five times the expense -- leaving the specially trained soldiers to pass the remainder of their tours on guard duty.

The willful decision by the security firm Blackwater to send a team of its civilian employees into a seething Fallujah -- undermanned, without appropriate (and contractually guaranteed) armor or weaponry or even a map, then rushing Capitol Hill for Damage Control -- without so much as an apology -- as the men's charred bodies hung in the streets. Blackwater's punishment? More and bigger contracts.

The coverup of the failure of Halliburton to provide contractually guaranteed clean water to military personnel that has obscured the fact that 63 of its 67 water treatment facilities serving the occupying forces produce water that is rife with pathogens -- often parasitical and slow-acting -- which will be carried home within the bodies of these veterans without their knowledge. (8.12)

Abu Ghraib. (8.13) Where “interrogation” management was cleverly outsourced to a huge company (CACI) originally contracted to sift computer data. This group, littered with poorly trained and psychologically suspect operatives, was redeployed to beef up US “intelligence gathering” in the face of the unexpectedly fierce resistance to US “liberation.” Analysts subsequently concluded that the vast majority of their chaotically rendered “detainees” had nothing whatever to do with the insurgency -- but everything to do with brutal suffering and shame. As in TORTURE. The worldwide broadcast of images culled from the mocking emails of participating US troops ensured that further American claims of high moral purpose would be utterly discredited. The troops were court martialed. CACI International was awarded another $16 million contract.

What happens when you torture people is, they figure out what you want to hear and they tell you.

Bob Baer, former CIA official, interviewed in Slate

Brutalization doesn't work. We know that. Besides, you lose your soul.

Dan Coleman, former FBI agent, interviewed by Jane Meyer

The photographing of prisoners, both in Afghanistan and in Iraq, seems to have been not random but, rather, part of the dehumanizing interrogation process. ... [Hayder Sabbar Abd, an Abu Ghraib survivor] told Ian Fisher, the Times reporter, that his ordeal had been recorded, almost constantly, by cameras, which added to his humiliation. He remembered how the camera flashed repeatedly as soldiers told him to masturbate and beat him when he refused.

Seymour Hersh, in "Chain of Command," The New Yorker

There's an absolute ban on torture for a very good reason. Torture taps into the deepest recesses, unexplored recesses of human consciousness, where creation and destruction coexist, where the infinite human capacity for kindness and infinite human capacity for cruelty coexist, and it has a powerful perverse appeal. And once it starts, both the perpetrators and the powerful who order them, let it spread.. ... [W]ithin months, we were torturing hundreds of Afghans at Bagram near Kabul. A few months later in 2003, through these techniques, we were torturing literally thousands of Iraqis. You can see in those photos, beyond the details of the techniques that we've described, you can see how that once it starts, it becomes this Dantesque hell, this kind of play palace of the darkest recesses of human consciousness. That's why it's necessary to maintain an absolute prohibition on torture. There is no such thing as a little bit of torture.

Alfred McCoy, University of Wisconsin, interviewed by Amy Goodman

Eventually, if you don't accidentally kill them first, torture victims will tell you something just to make you stop... If you torture 100 people, you'll get 100 different stories. If you gain the confidence of 100 people, you may get one valuable story.

Rear Admiral (ret.) John Hutson, former Judge Advocate General for the Navy

"The use of force, mental torture, threats, insults, or exposure to unpleasant and inhumane treatment of any kind is prohibited by law and is neither authorized nor condoned by the US Government. Experience indicates that the use of force is not necessary to gain the cooperation of sources for interrogation. Therefore, the use of force is a poor technique, as it yields unreliable results, may damage subsequent collection efforts, and can induce the source to say whatever he thinks the interrogator wants to hear."

“Spook Country”

by William Gibson

EXCERPT:

Tito watched the old man fold the copy of the New York Times he'd been reading. The light was going. Fading above this other ocean, the Pacific, which Tito had never seen before.

“I remember proofs of a CIA interrogation manual, something we'd been sent unofficially, for comment,” the old man said. “The first chapter laid out the ways in which torture is fundamentally counterproductive to intelligence. The argument had nothing to do with ethics, everything to do with quality and depth of product, with not squandering potential assets.” He removed his gold-rimmed glasses. “If the man who keeps returning to question you avoids behaving as if he were your enemy, you begin to lose your sense of who you are. Gradually, in the crisis of self that your captivity becomes, he guides you in your discovery of who you are becoming.”

“Did you interrogate people, yourself?” asked Garreth. The three of them were seated in the back of an open jeep, the black Pelican case under Garreth's feet.

“No,” said the old man, “I only reviewed the product. It's a terribly intimate process. An ordinary cigarette lighter will cause a man to tell you anything, whatever he thinks you want to hear. And will prevent him ever trusting you again, even slightly. And will confirm him, in his sense of self, as few things will.” He tapped the folded paper. “When I first saw what they were doing, I knew that they'd turned the SERE lessons inside out.

That meant that we were using techniques the Koreans had specifically developed in order to prepare prisoners for show trials.”

He fell silent.

Tito heard the lapping of waves.

[SERE refers to the US Military program which first specified wartime protocols for Survival, Evasion, Recovery and Escape.]

“There are huge profits to be made from a global war on terror...”

“Torture gets you false confessions...”

“[A] false confession of guilt by a brown person with a Moslem name has a very high economic value, and a very high political value, right now.”

Excerpted from Randi Rhodes’ Interview with Naomi Wolf, November 6, 2007

“The detainee arrives at the interrogation booth.
His hood is removed and he is bolted to the floor.”

Not everyone at Guantánamo was enthusiastic. The FBI and the Naval Criminal Investigative Service refused to be associated with aggressive interrogation. They opposed the techniques. One of the NCIS psychologists, Mike Gelles, knew about the [torture] brainstorming sessions but stayed away. He was dismissive of the administration’s contention that the techniques trickled up on their own from Guantánamo. “That’s not accurate,” he said flatly. “This was not done by a bunch of people down in Gitmo — no way.”

That view is buttressed by a key event that has received virtually no attention. On September 25, as the process of elaborating new interrogation techniques reached a critical point, a delegation of the administration’s most senior lawyers arrived at Guantánamo. The group included the president’s lawyer, Alberto Gonzales, who had by then received the Yoo-Bybee Memo [which was created to provide legal cover]; Vice President Cheney’s lawyer, David Addington, who had contributed to the writing of that memo; the CIA’s John Rizzo, who had asked for a Justice Department sign-off on individual techniques, including waterboarding, and received the second (and still secret) Yoo-Bybee Memo; and Jim Haynes, Rumsfeld’s counsel. They were all well aware of [Detainee 063, Mohammed] al-Qahtani. “They wanted to know what we were doing to get to this guy,” [Major General Michael] Dunlavey told me, “and Addington was interested in how we were managing it.” I asked what they had to say. “They brought ideas with them which had been given from sources in D.C.,” Dunlavey said. “They came down to observe and talk.” Throughout this whole period, Dunlavey went on, Rumsfeld was “directly and regularly involved.” [...]

That was a green light from the very top — the lawyers for Bush, Cheney, Rumsfeld, and the CIA. The administration’s version of events — that it became involved in the Guantánamo interrogations only in November, after receiving a list of techniques out of the blue from the “aggressive major general” — was demonstrably false.

Philippe Sands, Vanity Fair, May 2008

At 2:00 am on November 4, 2003, Manadel al-Jamadi, an Iraqi wanted for questioning regarding a suicide-bomber's deadly attack on a Red Cross facility, was rousted from his home by a platoon of Navy SEALs.

After a "forceful" interrogation session, al-Jamadi was removed to Abu Ghraib, where he was taken to a shower room and hung up by his wrists, which were shackled behind him.

There, five and a half hours after the onset of his "detainment," Army guards were summoned to "reposition" him -- his interrogators having declared that the prisoner was "not cooperating." Upon releasing his body from its suspension, the guards found that al-Jamadi's continuing refusal to talk was due to the fact that he was dead.

Sgt. Jeffery Frost, among the soldiers at the scene, reported that al-Jamadi's arms were stretched behind him in a way he had never before seen. The sergeant recalled that he was surprised the prisoner's arms "didn't pop out of their sockets," according to a summary of his interview. As his body was released from hanging, blood gushed from al-Jamadi's mouth "as if a faucet had been turned on."

Al-Jamadi's wife and son

Perhaps it goes without saying that no information was gained in this interrogation. Nevertheless, as al-Jamadi's corpse began to grow foul, it was packed in ice and used as a prop for a couple of triumphant "War on Terror" photo ops. The resulting images would eventually circle the globe as potent new symbols of America's Abandonment of International Law.

Nothing has more legitimized future suicidal attacks against the West in the eyes of humiliated young Muslim men the world over than the sight of these naked, hooded, beaten prisoners, their penises tied together, bleeding and writhing against one another on the concrete floors where Saddam did his worst. Beside them now: Smiling, Attack Dog Loosing, Anal Probing Americans -- leering at their agony and giving a jolly "thumbs up" to the camera.

Who among us doubts that our children's children will pay for the unconscionable corruption that has caused so dark a stain to descend on the face of our country? Or that such an outrage matters little to the men who are making this black magic happen? For at the end of the day -- all the hatred in the world will pale beside the realization of their goals:

They get the immediate profits. The biggest chunk of the massive blood-stained funding debt that will burden your family and mine for generations is going directly -- as usual -- into the pockets of these very men, and the corporate sponsors whose interests they so lucratively serve.

They get control of the oil. Near term, and long term. In the near term, the invasion accomplished a dramatic suppression of output that helped drive the price of crude to once unimaginable highs. Long term, through the tireless efforts of the governments of the US and the UK, a system of Production Sharing Agreements is being pushed on the Iraqi "Parliament" which will ensure that control -- and hundreds of billions of dollars of Iraq's national wealth -- will land in the hands of the major oil companies. (8.14)

They get the permanent new revenue streams they've stolen by obliterating the Iraqi economy. The banking industry was sold off to foreign companies less burdened by the Muslim reluctance to impose usurious interest rates. All tariffs were instantly outlawed, unleashing a tidal wave of subsidized, cheaply produced imports which drowned Iraqi businesses by the thousands. Bankruptcies swept the country and 60% of the populace was thrown out of work. The new "agricultural chief" dismissed Iraq's longstanding ability to feed itself by burying the domestic agriculture industry under hundreds of thousands of tons of cheap wheat imported by a company of his own affiliation. (8.15)

They get the permanent military bases (in the two countries bordering Iran) from which they will eventually launch the crucial gambit on "The Grand Chessboard:" the subjugation of the truly promised land -- The Republic of Uzbekistan. (8.16)

Best of all, they get to send a message to humanity: We have decided to run the planet -- to the detriment of all other values -- in the service of our permanently expanding power and profit. Before you even think to resist, understand: We can -- and will -- kill you.

Before the cosmic arrogance of such brazen theft could even be dreamed, the predators behind it required a paralysis of the political norms of the US government -- and the acquiescence of the American people. They got both. Whether or not luck is, as some would say, the residue of design -- 9/11 has been very good to these men.

That they mean to parlay the windfall into a universal subjugation is patently obvious. And therein will be joined the true struggle for freedom that we in America have long been conned into believing was coming at us solely from the pages of the Qur'an. Our earliest exposure to the "Muslim Means Terror" storyline arrived simultaneously with clandestine efforts to give it some real teeth. To this day we remain ignorant of the fact that much of the recent advent of virulent, anti-western Islamic Radicalism has been directed and financed by the Intelligence agencies of the US led western powers. (8.17)

Many tens of thousands of Islamic Jihadists have been recruited, organized, trained and armed -- since June of 1979 -- by the highest level covert operatives of the West.

The official justification for this seemingly self-destructive strategy was to seduce the competing economic system of the USSR to its overextended ruin in Afghanistan. Yet CIA support of the Radical Jihadist movement, most notably in the financial support of the Pakistani madrasas that mold young Muslim boys into angry, anti-western zealots, continued for years after the Soviets had crawled away.

The same is true of CIA support for Al-Qaeda itself. There is abundant evidence that thousands of Al-Qaeda connected operatives were paid by the CIA and functioning in the service of "American interests" during the subsequent conflicts in Kosovo, Bosnia and Chechnya, (8.18) as well as for reasons of political control in oil-rich Algeria, and the maintenance of a climate of semi-stability favorable to Western Business Interests in the Philippines. It works like this:

- Ø In any strategically significant location -- especially where valuable natural resources exist -- the "War on Terror" must be fought.
- Ø The "War on Terror" demands the intervention of the "Protectors of Freedom."
- Ø Where the "Protectors of Freedom" intervene, Predatory Corporate Hegemony flourishes unopposed, enabling the theft of local resources and the destruction of local mechanisms of political and economic autonomy.
- Ø Which has become, in the era of "Free Trade," the dominant political and economic dynamic on earth.

More recently, US cultivation and support of the most virulent strains of Revolutionary Islamic Wahhabism in the Far East stands as a countervailing force to the emerging power of China in the region, much as the same strategy was employed by the US in Afghanistan and then in Chechnya against the fading power of Russia. Yet we are constantly told that Al-Qaeda is “America’s Enemy” -- which very effectively obscures the way our fear of this “enemy” is used by our Planet’s Landlords against the interests of middle and working class peoples the world over -- Americans included. (8.19)

The question of when exactly -- as is claimed -- Al-Qaeda ceased to be a dependable “asset” of the CIA and became a legitimate antagonist of the US has neither been asked nor answered in the mainstream, though anyone familiar with the CIA’s oversight of Al-Qaeda’s very creation and the long and fruitful history of synchronization between the group’s activities and western goals would have compelling reason to wonder.

Epecially in light of PNAC’s stated intentions. And the Big Lie that became Iraq.

By what logic should we presume that Al-Qaeda was not used in New York City in the same way it was used in Algeria? Or in Chechnya? Or in Afghanistan?

As a means to create short term paralysis and mortal fear -- thereby to justify Criminal Corporate Aggression in the pursuit of long-term control of the world’s remaining oil.

It is well-documented, for instance, that many of the Al-Qaeda connected “hijackers” were extremely well-surveilled by multiple agencies within the US intelligence apparatus in the months leading up to 9/11, yet repeated requests by field agents to intervene in their plans were turned down at the highest levels of those agencies. (8.20)

Two of the alleged 9/11 ringleaders had actually spent the summer living with an FBI asset in San Diego. (Long after the pile of mass-murder facilitating coincidences has become a mountain -- does yet another even matter?)

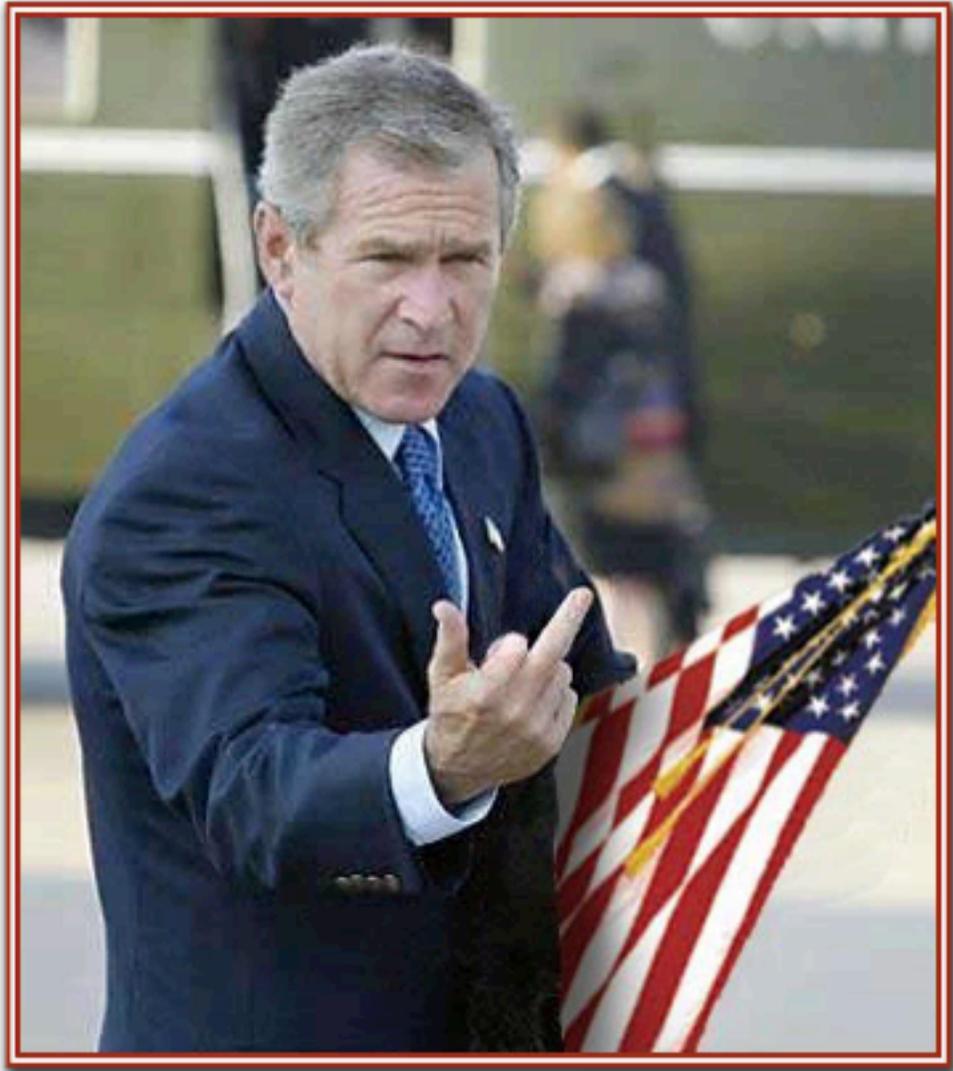

People who dare to speculate about such possibilities tend to provoke outrage and attack -- given the brutal reordering of our sense of reality necessary to follow the train of such wrenching thought.....

But the idea -- of some level of complicity somewhere close to home -- goes a long way toward explaining why so many utterly inexplicable things happened around 9/11.

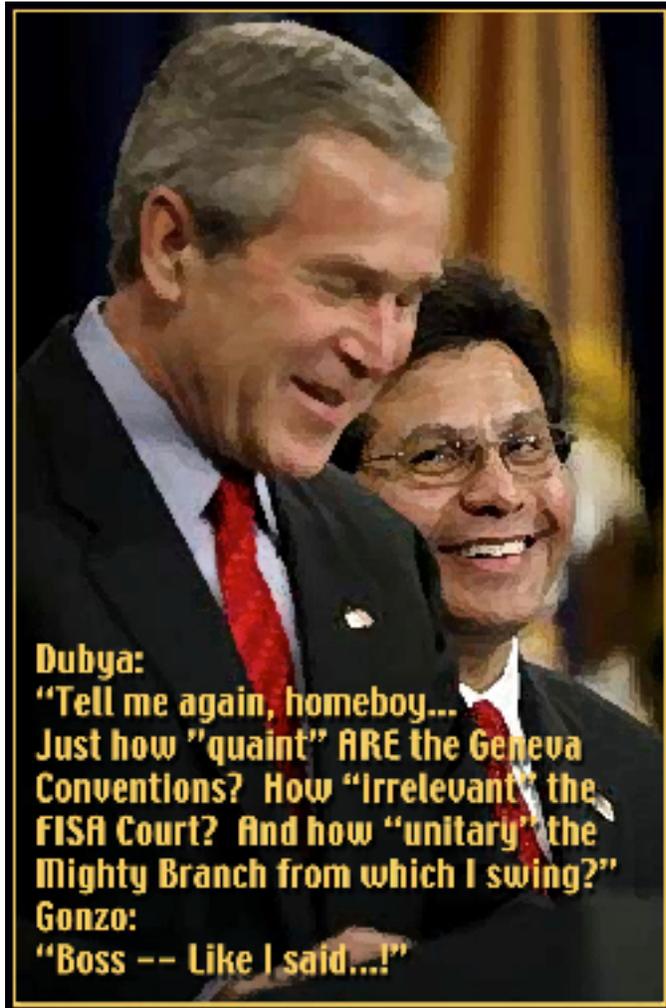

A long way toward explaining why so many powerful people have fought so long, so dirty and so hard to obscure so many of the troubling lies within the official mythology.

Toward explaining why -- despite the sincere efforts of thousands of focused and well-trained professionals -- there has always been someone in the mix who “sticks his foot out” and trips up the good guys just when they’re about to bag the Evil Usama.

It’s been happening for at least thirteen years. The recurring whiff on the same dancing boogie man. And honestly, how hard must we work to continue to call it a coincidence?

The agenda of the Post 9/11 New World Order calls for a suppression of dissent designed to bring the United States more closely in line with the norms of the dictatorships young American students were once taught to pity.

The malignant beauty of this assault on the US Constitution is that 9/11 provided it with both shelter and impetus.

Though the Patriot Act was written well before the attacks, the minimal resistance to it mustered by a few clear-thinking congressmen was easily dispelled by a dose of anthrax in the mail and a ferocious media blitz against Usama that was driven into the psychic wound of the exploding towers like a barbed spike -- and stoked a primal howl for revenge that left little room for reason. (9.1)

Thus, right in the face of a stunned and fearful nation, the immediate deconstruction of American constitutional rights was begun, and deemed to be permanently necessary in the new and never-ending War on Terror.

The administration's flagrant disregard for the jurisdiction of the FISA court -- a direct violation of federal law -- is a prime example of this deconstruction.

FISA is the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which established, in 1978, a legal regime for "foreign intelligence" surveillance separate from ordinary law enforcement surveillance.

FISA provides the government with broad, powerful protocols for intercepting the communications and apprehending the operatives of foreign states as well as "terrorist" groups deemed hostile to the interests of the United States -- protocols which extend the government's intrusive reach far beyond that available to "non-intelligence" related law enforcement. The court convenes in secret and findings from the surveillance orders it empowers are routinely shielded from defendants' attempts to challenge their validity.

And yet it provides a typically American check on the possibility that someone in a position of power might fall prey to the temptation to employ its sweeping scope in improper ways -- toward entities deemed "hostile," for example, that may actually pose more of a personal political threat to the petitioner than a threat to national security.

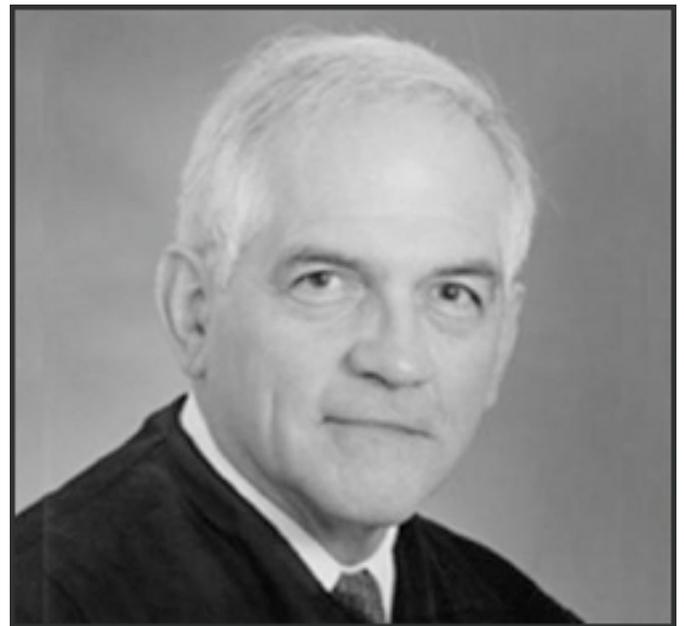

It is important to note that in the first 27 years of its existence, the FISA Court approved 18,761 orders for surveillance -- and turned down only five. (9.2)

Yet the federal laws that demand adherence to the FISA protocols, very much like the tenets of the Geneva Conventions and very much like the laws of physics -- as we shall see -- were suddenly and unilaterally deemed by the Bush Administration to be irrelevant in the wake of 9/11.

The Administration -- even while lying to the American public for eight months that the laws were being upheld -- began operating completely outside the purview of the Court. Which is, in and of itself, a blatant and impeachment-worthy crime against the United States Constitution. For which charges have not been brought.

Instead, amazingly, fascist-inspired justification for this crime was floated in the form of claims that no one would be "targeted" by the administration's illegal warrantless wiretapping -- if every American were monitored. (9.3)

And despite the administration's assurances -- when caught in the FISA lie -- that its unilateral surveillance in the U.S. was scrupulously focused on "Al-Qaeda," in May of 2006 the public learned that AT&T and its "competitors" have been allowing the NSA to access the phone records of millions of Americans. It will never be known whether the truth about this covert breach of federal law would have come to light were it not for the conscience of U.S. District Judge James Robertson, (right) who chose to resign his place on the FISA bench (9.4) and speak out, rather than continue to accommodate the Administration's criminal dishonesty.

And even while the President insisted that the NSA was not "mining or trolling through the personal lives of millions of innocent Americans," his operatives pushed Congress for explicit permission to do exactly that: to monitor the conversations and phone records of people in the US without benefit of any independent oversight of any kind.

Cheney-Specter Bill, S. 2453, better known as The National Security Surveillance Act, would have gutted the Fourth Amendment. It would have declared judicial review of the Domestic Surveillance of US Citizens to be permanently optional, thereby enabling Presidentially mandated computer-driven data mining of all information of any citizen and round-the-clock surveillance of their conversations, indefinitely. (9.5)

Thirty years ago, in the aftermath of the Watergate crime which drove Richard Nixon from the White House, Senator Frank Church presided over an Inquiry into reports that the US Intelligence services had begun spying on Americans. Discovering widespread abuse, including the compiling of dossiers on lawful political activities and the secret opening of citizens' mail, the Church Committee moved to protect the American people from the surveillance technology of the NSA. Such technology, it found, could easily be turned against the public by those in power to extinguish the exercise of democracy.

Responding, in his urgent endorsement of the creation of the FISA Court -- which simply asks the government for the most cursory explanation before abrogating the right to privacy -- Senator Church (left) was blunt about what was at stake. Like few men willing to speak about it, he had peeled back the curtain of "intelligence" and stared the beast in the eye. His words:

"I know the capacity that is there to make tyranny total in America, and we must see to it that [the NSA] and all agencies that possess this technology operate within the law and under proper supervision, so that we never cross over that abyss.

That is the abyss from which there is no return." (9.6)

The Bush Administration (to the benefit of the Multi-National Corporate Elites whose interests it so assiduously served) violated the letter and spirit of the Constitution of the United States to a critical degree. And has, to this point, gotten away with it. Anyone who is aware of the details of the assault, and does not believe that our Democracy has been cracked to its core as a result, is failing to acknowledge the power of precedent.

With a disdain unparalleled in the history of our country, for example -- George W. Bush chose to ignore the Presidential power of veto.

For an American President to veto a bill, if he does not want to sign it into law, allows Congress a second chance to exercise its Constitutional Mandate: The Creation of the Laws which Govern the United States. If the legislative body can pass a vetoed bill again -- this time by a two-thirds majority -- its exercise of its will, as the collective and directly elected voice of the American people -- shall prevail over the Executive's objections.

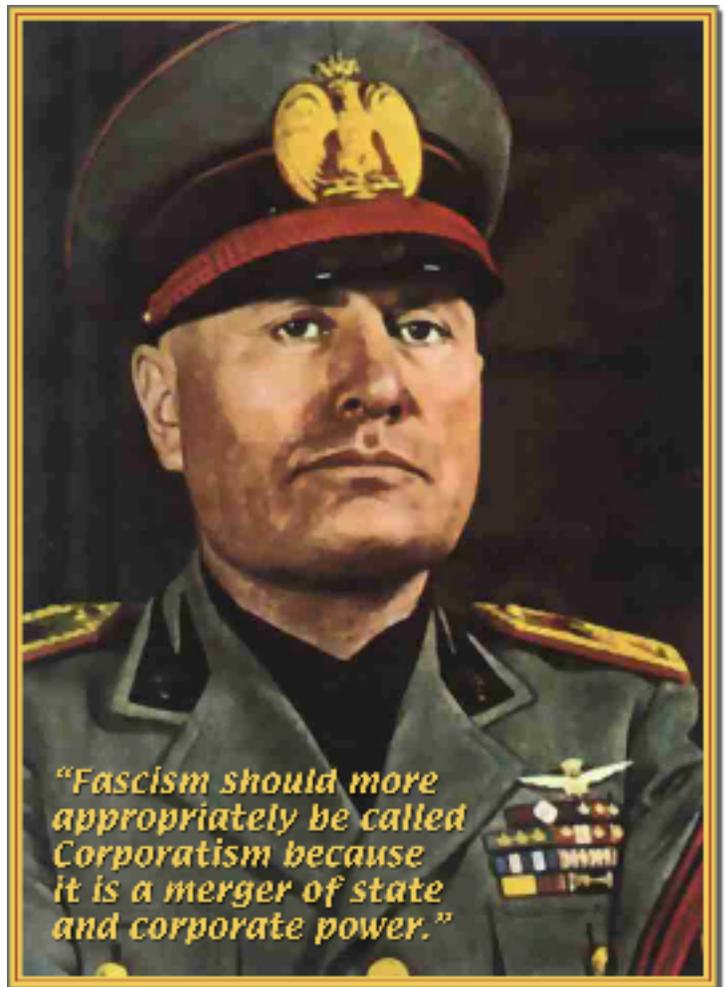

By refusing to exercise a veto -- but choosing instead to append a "Presidential Signing Statement" to a bill as he signs it, Bush very effectively nullified one of the most crucial components of the system of Checks and Balances built into our Constitution.

Until the Reagan Presidency, such Signing Statements were a rarely exercised PR tool, but that changed with the efforts of a young Reagan lawyer named Samuel Alito Jr. (whom Bush eventually appointed to the US Supreme Court). Alito believed that the power of the Executive should be enhanced by formalizing its opinions on the original intent and constitutional validity of new law -- functions the Founding Fathers had carefully vested in the other two branches of our government. Bush expanded this power shifting concept to declare any portion of a new law to be null and void if it did not agree with his vision -- and his vision alone -- of the needs of the Executive Branch. Rather than an objection to a Congressional act, this stance became an objection to the authority of Congress itself. By the end of 2006, Mr. Bush had summarily obliterated the Constitutionally guaranteed will of the American people as exercised by their representatives by employing such nullifying statements more than 800 times. (9.7)

That the 109th Congress (of Tom DeLay/Duke Cunningham/Jack Abramoff infamy) was easily the most corrupt in history did not mitigate the damage such Presidential disdain has inflicted upon America. And, again, these crimes -- by the man who once dismissed the US Constitution as a "goddamned piece of paper," were tolerated for years with barely a peep of protest from the "liberal" mainstream press. Which is more truly, of course -- exactly as liberal as the six massive corporations that now own all of it. (9.8)

To be sure, Mr. Bush, though performing as poorly when called upon to speak off the script as any President in history, sputtered along as a reasonably sharp looking figurehead in the service of the politically sophisticated Neo-Cons who operated behind and beyond him -- and that he would finally be pushed aside to make his further millions was always a given. The legion of corporate predators who feasted on his watch, however, will barely miss him in his passing, secure in their knowledge that Bush has left behind an America that is frightened, ignorant of the fact that it has lost control of its own elections, and well conditioned to keep its mind off difficult ideas.

If history teaches us anything -- it is that democracies are as rare as they are fragile. Unless "We, the People" choose to rouse ourselves and take a stand against the ongoing destruction of our rights, our children will never know the blessings of freedom we grew up taking for granted.

NEWS: SUPERIOR COURT CONFIRMS BUSH'S RIGHT TO DETAIN CITIZENS WITHOUT A FAIR TRIAL

For the first time ever, a person in the US may now be removed from his or her life and incarcerated indefinitely without ever gaining access to the judicial system. This loss applies not only to people suspected of plotting or carrying out acts of aggression against 'American' interests -- but to people deemed to be in support of such people. (9.9)

The Greediest and Most Arrogant among the Elite are betting that the rest of us have neither the will nor the energy to stem this tide. Though they still speak of “spreading democracy” with the usual patriotic fervor, their strategic documents (which are freely available to read) reveal that -- for many of these Architects of the New American Empire -- constitutional democracy has become the problem.

In his blueprint for dominion, “The Grand Chessboard,” Zbigniew Brzezinski (left) -- the erstwhile Rockefeller Protégé, Founder of the Trilateral Commission and Reigning Godfather of Western Political Aggression -- openly describes American Democracy as being “inimical” to the exercise of imperial power in the Mideast. (9.10)

For such well-advantaged, “men of best quality” to maintain their centuries long dominance of the world’s resources and the power that flows from that dominance, democracy -- allowing as it does for the needs of people of less domineering aspirations -- has become the problem. Democracy, therefore, must be curtailed. But how? The Evil Commies, after all, have long since been vanquished. How to get the “E Word” back in play?

Ahhhhhh, of course. Let's fire up those Radical Muslims we've been Grooming and Find a Way to Make It Hurt.

There has never been a tyrannical regime -- anywhere -- that did not depend on the threat of outside "enemies" to force its own citizens to accept the elimination of their rights. In the words of Dr. Joseph Goebbels, Adolf Hitler's Nazi propaganda minister...

"The people can always be brought to the bidding of the leaders. That is easy. All you have to do is tell them they are being attacked, and denounce the peacemakers for lack of patriotism and exposing the country to danger. It works the same in any country."

"If you tell a lie big enough and keep repeating it, people will eventually come to believe it. The lie can be maintained only for such time as the State can shield the people from the political, economic and/or military consequences of the lie. It thus becomes vitally important for the State to use all of its powers to repress dissent..." (9.11)

As a student, I was taught that this kind of fear-based recipe for control is not supposed to be necessary in a truly functioning democracy, let alone one as accomplished as the United States. Yet here we are, caught up and cooking in just such a recipe, whistling in the cauldron of our willful and continuing ignorance of....

- Ø Massive evidence of Election Fraud in our country. This critical wound to the Body of the Republic is not even a subject of conversation.
- Ø Ninety thousand African-American voters were illegally thrown off the Voting Roles in the months leading up to the 2000 election in Florida. The subsequent NAACP lawsuit in response to this crime was quietly settled out of court by (original PNAC member) Jeb Bush's state government (a small price to pay for the 537 vote victory which spawned his brother's illegitimate Presidency). (9.12)
- Ø The Help America Vote Act (HAVA), which followed, and was supposedly designed to counter such crimes, instead enabled the most egregious theft of a Presidential election in U.S. History, as it privatized the essence of democracy itself, and ushered in the era of Corporate Owned and Unverifiable Black Box Balloting.

Thanks to HAVA, complete control of the majority of the votes cast in America has now been entrusted (for billions of dollars) to a handful of companies that have openly bragged of their allegiance to the Republican party, defied efforts to force their compliance with certification laws, and refused to offer any mechanism by which to conduct recounts or otherwise verify election results.

These companies have provided thousands of machines which must be constantly “tweaked” by company employees before and during elections and which repeatedly malfunction or are “inadvertently under allocated” in Democrat dominated precincts.

Unbelievably, they have been allowed to maintain completely unmonitored control of their own notoriously hackable secret software, whereby any person in possession of any one of several built-in “backdoor pass codes” may produce untraceable, fraudulent results in any election in less than sixty seconds. (9.13)

... took it upon herself to Google “Diebold Election Systems” until she came upon the motherlode -- the FTP site where the company shared its secret codes, which allow every one of its employees to function as an “administrator” and switch the results of any election without detection. Blackboxvoting.org (which Bev founded) has since uncovered massive evidence of election fraud in 2002 and 2004, and recruited a National Army of Monitors to safeguard the 2006 elections. The laws which enable such abuse remain in effect.

As a Trojan Horse of a Side Deal, HAVA also provided for a huge surge in the number of Provisional Ballots distributed to voters in poorer districts which cannot afford the new machines. It did not provide, however, that these provisional ballots actually be counted. Through the rejection of more than a million of them, along with the rejection of hundreds of thousands of so-called “Spoiled” Ballots, along with the rejection of half a million Absentee Ballots on the most dubious of grounds, and the Ongoing Purge of Black and Hispanic Voters before they even arrive at a polling place -- the 2004 re-election of Bush/Cheney was engineered in the wreckage of a national tally that left More Than Three Million Votes Uncounted. In every one of the above described categories of rejection, the loss of votes was overwhelmingly weighted in a singular, class-descriptive direction.

This is how a man Shown by the National Exit Polls to have been Defeated -- among Male Voters, 51% to 49%, and among Female Voters, 53% to 47% -- can again be Declared the Winner of the Presidency of the United States. Obliterate the Expressed Will of the People of Iowa, where according to votes actually cast he lost by 2%, New Mexico, where he lost by 2%, and Ohio, where he lost by 4%, and -- Presto! The Loser is Switched. Case Closed. Questions Will Not be Entertained.

Though the US Census Bureau would eventually peg the discrepancy between its tabulation of voters who voted and those whose votes were tallied at a crisp 3.4 million, nary a whimper of protest was noted in the “free” American press. (9.14)

- Ø Such an historically unprecedented discrepancy between the exit polls and the “counted” votes in our supposedly sacred electoral process has never before been allowed by the United States to stand unchallenged anywhere in the world where “American interests” were declared. (9.15) It is no doubt such craven embrace of corruption which necessitated.....
- Ø The disbanding in 2004 of the Voter News Service and its replacement with the National Election Pool. This brand new organization, charged with conducting those telltale exit polls, was thereby compelled to produce -- for the first time in history -- statistically impossible last minute revisions of the exit poll percentages which attempted (unsuccessfully) to nudge the above mentioned discrepancies out of the realm of total absurdity. (9.16)
- Ø Which, in light of the mainstream American media’s disinterest in this issue, was only necessary to temper the haunted laughter that was directed at the US from the rest of the civilized world -- many of whose citizens are profoundly more aware of what has been happening to America than the average American.

As an embarrassing example, it was widely reported -- by the highly respected International Election Observer Mission; the European Parliament; the NATO Parliamentary Assembly; and the Council of Europe -- that the 2004 Presidential Election in the Ukraine “did not meet democratic standards.”

This finding was seconded by Republican Senator Richard Lugar of Indiana, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Referencing the glaring discrepancies between the official results and a wide range of surveys of voters at polling places -- exit polls -- Senator Lugar concluded that “a concerted and forceful program of election-day fraud and abuse was enacted with either the leadership or cooperation of governmental authorities.” And Senator Lugar was not the only American government official to pay attention to these polls in the Ukraine.

The Bush Administration had helped pay for them -- understanding all too well that the long-time history of accuracy attending such surveys is a sure-fire way to detect fraud. The irony of the Neo-Cons paying for the same polls on the other side of the planet that they were allowed to dismiss as “irrelevant” here in America was not lost on everyone:

“Eastern bloc observers noted that balloting in Ohio, New Mexico and Florida did not meet Ukrainian standards, but applauded America's attempt to restore democratic institutions after the overthrow of elected government in 2000.” (9.17)

May we take a moment here to reflect on how many millions of American servicemen and women have literally laid down their lives to protect our democracy against the exact travesties noted above?

Before any one of us decides not to investigate these crimes further, he or she would do well to remember how much blood has been spilled to safeguard against them. To what does the hallowed concept of "Our Freedom" refer -- if not to this?

As the Grand Pageant of "Decision '08" built to a climax and the media debated its Buzzed-Up Questions regarding Taxes and Toughness and the Proper Tone of the "War on Terror" -- stark against the backdrop of the "Latest Great Shock," this one economic -- we waited in vain for a voice to crack the chatter and demand aloud: Who will be barred from the polls this time? How many votes will be disappeared?

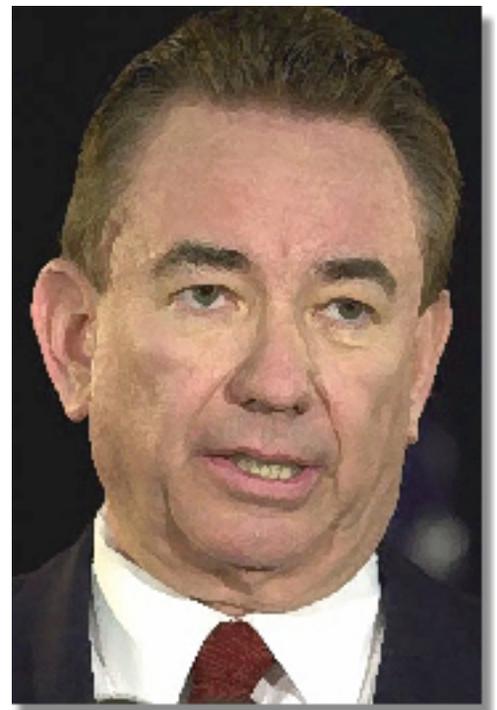

We will wait forever to know these truths and still we will not know -- if all we do is wait. There is ample evidence that plans to steal the 2008 election were designed and primed years before it arrived. We cannot act if we do not understand. (9.18)

- Ø Moving along to a more expansive view of the Endless Menu of Ways to Destroy a Great Country in the Name of Ever Greater Corporate Power, we come to the Bush Administration's brutal attack on the sanctity of science: its politically mandated distortion of scientific research in support of fraudulent policy decisions regarding the environment, health, medical research and nuclear weaponry. Formerly independent research by the National Science Foundation and other organizations which used to be published according to the rigors of peer review and was answerable first and foremost to its intellectual integrity -- came to be vetted by the likes of Karl Rove for its political ramifications -- the public be damned. (9.19)

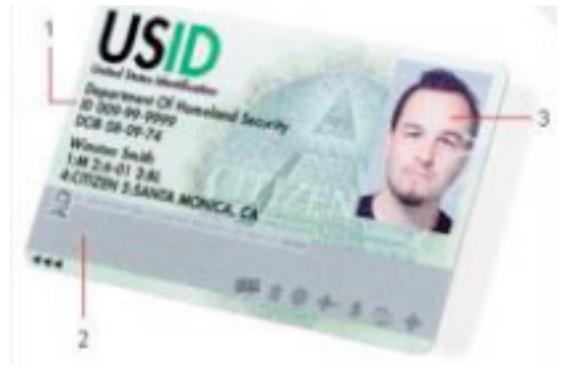

To cite but one example of corruption trumping truth -- the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention set about planning to strengthen lead poisoning regulations, in light of newly discovered scientific evidence that much smaller amounts than previously understood were implicated in brain damage among children.

Before the panel could act, however, Bush's then Health and Human Services Secretary Tommy Thompson (right) rejected the recommendations and replaced two members of the panel with individuals tied to the lead industry. (9.20)

It should be noted, of course, that the children left at risk in the wake of this decision are not really that important in the grand scheme of things. They are, after all -- poor.

- Ø The soon to be introduced U. S. National Identity Cards which will be disturbingly indistinguishable (except for the proposed retinal scan requirements and radio tracking chips embedded within them) from the “Internal Passports” once used to identify citizens of the Soviet Union. (9.21)

- Ø The currently optional, about to be mandatory inclusion of Global Positioning Satellite technology in all American motor vehicles. (9.22)

- Ø The currently cutting edge, but projected to be indispensable Radio Frequency Identification Devices (RFID) -- implanted into human bodies -- which are easily scannable from any direction without the knowledge of the person being scanned. Already entering our homes hidden in products we buy, RFID will next be pushed as the perfect solution to identity theft, and eventually as the "secure" prerequisite for all financial transactions. (9.23)

- Ø The emerging “hit list” of teachers at colleges and universities who do not conduct their classes along the same political and intellectual processes as those mandated by Fox News. A phalanx of right-wing political committees and government entities have thus drawn dead aim on one of the last engines of independent inquiry still functioning in the United States. Many of these teachers remain stubbornly committed to old-fashioned ideas about truth and justice. They tend to have difficulty ignoring obvious lies, and often insist on asking questions even after being told what to think. Dangerously out of touch with the requirements of the New Imperialism, they are now attacked as a threat to freedom, and their employing institutions urged to stifle or fire them. (9.24)

Brigham Young Physics Professor Steven Jones is an outrageously blatant case in point. A conservative, devoutly church going Mormon scientist, Jones had the courage to follow up the troubling news he heard about the giant pools of molten steel still burning in the rubble beneath all three failed buildings of the World Trade Center -- more than three months after the attacks. Being a scientist, the professor was not blessed with the "ignorance is bliss" shelter that allowed the average American citizen (had he or she possessed knowledge of this phenomenon) to consider such molten pools a normal result of the 9/11 attacks.

Jones (and thousands like him throughout the world) knew immediately that these pools testified that the official explanation for the three towers' failures was a lie.

His white paper, "Why Indeed Did the WTC Towers Collapse?" set out to compare the official story against the hypothesis that molten steel burning for weeks -- as is commonly observed in thermite reactions, but never associated with jet fuel or furniture fires -- was evidence that actually favored an alternate explanation of the destruction. Such as demolition, which commonly employs thermite to break steel.

Unlike jet fuel or carpet or drywall or desks or computers or drapes or coffee cups -- thermite contains its own oxygen. It is this rare attribute which allows thermite -- unlike every other known substance in the pulverized towers -- to burn for weeks.

Because of his evenhanded approach and adherence to the scientific method; because he did not speculate on who might have been responsible; because he invited peer review -- and has been upheld by it.....

..... but mostly because he included video of the Third Tower's astonishing 6.5 second implosion (and own resulting molten pool of steel) in his inquiry -- Jones' paper has taken off across the world as the single most damning document in contradiction to the government enforced Cover-Up. (9.25)

On August 31, 2006, George Bush traveled to Utah to meet with Gordon Hinckley, the Head of the Mormon Church. Eight days later, Professor Jones was relieved of his classroom duties and his White Paper removed from the BYU website. (9.26)

- Ø The capitulation of Yahoo and AOL to demands that they permanently store -- and make available to the government -- the Search Engine Records and Websites Visited by the American citizens who use their services. While such Congressman as James Sensenbrenner and the recently disgraced pedophile Mark Foley have tried to pass this off to the need to protect children from sexual predators, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales let it "slip" that it's really more about compiling political information critical to the "War on Terror." (9.27)
- Ø The quiet construction of Civilian Detention Centers throughout the United States -- another "no-bid" win for Halliburton -- for the purported purpose of immigration control, though the possible need to quell civil unrest has also been mentioned..... should domestic "dissent" get out of hand. (9.28)

- Ø The destruction of the Posse Comitatus Act -- which has long forbidden the use of United States Military Forces against the citizens of the United States. This hidden wound to the Bill of Rights was accomplished by President Bush under cover of the Military Commissions Act of 2006, which he signed on the same day.

With the Military Commissions Act, Bush plucked from Congress a bit of shelter from the outraged worldwide accusation that his administration practices war crimes. With its passage, the secret designation of certain individuals as "unlawful alien enemy combatants" by the US, and their subsequent anonymous rendition to secret prisons where they are "disappeared" into a world of secret torture on the farthest edges of reality was "officially" endorsed and continued.

While the Need for Such Torture was being loudly discussed, the Posse Comitatus Act was quietly pushed into the abyss -- gutted by revolutionary changes to the Insurrection Act, then buried in a huge, "quick decision to support our troops, no scrutiny necessary or possible" appropriations bill. Thus was removed -- without our knowledge -- this most powerful impediment to Martial Law. It had protected us from Executive tyranny for 130 years.

Its repeal grants the President the unilateral power, upon his declaration of a "public emergency," to take control of state-based National Guard troops and station them anywhere in America -- without the consent of the governor of their state of constitutional origination, and without the consent of the governor or military officials or local law enforcement authorities of the state designated for occupation -- in order to "suppress public disorder."

It is interesting to place this dictatorial prelude beside the observation of the retired Chief of US Military Operations, General Tommy Franks. The general has been quoted to say that he does not expect America's "experiment in democracy" -- as embodied in the US Constitution -- to survive a terrorist "attack employing WMD."

Beyond the discretionary power to define an "emergency," the new law bestows on the Executive the power to decide which kind of "protest" is potentially beneficial to "terrorists" -- and thus subject to military intervention and forced relocation to the above-mentioned Halliburton constructed domestic detention camps. "Undesirables" and "potential terrorists" are mentioned alongside "illegal aliens" in early discussions of likely detainees. The Homeland Security press release announcing the awarding of the Detention Center contracts to Halliburton also pointedly referred to the camps' availability for use in the "rapid development of new programs."

Why, may we not wonder, did the Bush administration feel the need to remove America's longstanding roadblock against Martial Law? Does an answer lie in the expectation that many Americans will object to being quarantined -- and to the forced vaccination of their children with substances they know nothing about -- should the next "Attack on America" involve bio-terrorism -- or worse -- as has been consistently described by certain officials in our government as "likely?" (9.29)

THE PATRIOT ACT

(without the inconvenience of serving a warrant) allows Government Authorities to:

Search your home while you are away. Confiscate items and place cameras and microphones to monitor you at home.

Monitor your email, internet usage, phone calls, credit cards, bank accounts, student, medical & library records. And, as a bonus -- Americans may now be jailed indefinitely without a trial, a lawyer, or even a phone call to the outside world.

But we have been ASSURED, by the very same leaders who.....

Seized and have held political power through comprehensive election fraud.
Lied about their actions on 9/11.
Lied about their ties to al-Qaeda.
Lied about their intent to investigate 9/11.
Declared Pakistan an 'ally' only days after the Head of Pakistani Intelligence made the last payment to the 9/11 hijackers.
Lied about their vast pre-knowledge and actual practice sessions for everything that happened on 9/11.
Lied about the poisoned air our heroes breathed after 9/11.
Scrubbed the 9/11 crime scenes and disposed of evidence in direct contravention of Federal Law.
Held not a single person in all the US Government responsible for any of the multitude of failures to perform their lawfully mandated duties on 9/11.

Lied about the melting point of steel.
Lied about the laws of gravity.
Destroyed government stores of the Ames Strain of Anthrax when it was discovered that this strain -- sent by 'Terrorists' to Democrats who wanted to read the Patriot Act before passing it -- had been manufactured by the US Army.
Fought in court for three and a half years to suppress Hundreds of Statements of First Responders on 9/11 -- statements describing the massive explosions that wracked the buildings but were excised completely in the official 'investigations.'
Suppressed the fact that Marvin Bush -- the president's brother -- was a central figure in the company that provided security for the WTC Towers on 9/11.
Lied about circumventing the FISA court.
Lied about their illegal wiretapping.
Lied about their access to Mr. bin Laden.
Lied about their reasons for invading Iraq.
Lied that combat operations were over.
Placed in mortal danger -- by illegally revealing her identity -- the life of an American CIA agent because her journalist husband DID NOT LIE about the fact that there were no WMD in Iraq.
Lied that they did not operate secret prisons around the world.
Lied that they were not practicing torture.
Denied all responsibility for the personal setbacks that dozens of courageous Americans have suffered immediately after speaking out against these lies -- setbacks that have included demotions, loss of jobs, public ridicule, confiscation of property, violent destruction of property, threats on lives -- and death.....

..... that we may rest easy.

Yes, we have been ASSURED by these very same "Patriots" that the "Patriot Act" will never, ever be used to suppress dissent in America.

Some people, familiar with history, might contemplate the preceding developments and see in them a certain dramatic foreshadowing.

The end of privacy and the right to dissent is no longer some vague totalitarian nightmare lurking on the horizon of someone else's pitiful country. It is the people of America now who are confronted with the loss of our rights -- a fascist-friendly future to which we are being systematically conditioned to capitulate.

Terrorism is a key tool of this conditioning, and two things about it are critical to grasp.

First, while the power of unforeseen violence has always been a part of human reality -- and will likely continue as a tactic of resistance among otherwise dominated people -- its effectiveness is already assured if the "freedom" it is supposedly directed against has long since been surrendered by its intended victims.

Second, throughout history, the True Perpetrators of Terrorist Attacks have often -- especially among countries with ambitions toward empire -- proven to be the Powers Supposedly Under Attack.

Such events are known as False Flag Operations. And as even the quickest analysis of Global Push and Shove will reveal -- False Flag Ops occur with stunning frequency.

That this simple fact is so widely ignored by Americans is a testament to both the power and the failure of our mainstream media. The power is expressed in the media's overwhelming capacity to forcibly embed almost any idea in our minds, pounding away with emotionally loaded catch phrases and carefully chosen, incessantly repeated imagery. The failure is expressed in the media's growing refusal to investigate or even raise questions when those in power make any claim -- no matter how poorly substantiated -- that can be played off as bearing on national security.

As a result, we as a people are encouraged to banish any whisper of doubt we may carry about the legitimacy of the constant fear of alien attack that gets injected into our lives. Whether from the mocking likes of Rush Limbaugh, or the supposedly "progressive" voice of a "Mr. K" (as he smirks at the "Building 7" crowd), we are assured that we must be dead flat crazy if we think there is any possibility we are being lied to about who our real enemies are -- or the true motivations behind the actions of our "protectors."

We are basically told that, "Lies about the true source of mass violence are too big to pull off. Those sworn to protect us, for instance, would never allow us to be attacked for political gain while blaming the attack on someone who didn't really do it. That level of deceit would demand that a whole lot of people would have to keep a very difficult secret for a very long time. And as we all know -- that's just not possible."

Sounds like a No-Brainer. We don't think twice.

However. If -- through some righteous act of will -- our very busy brains were to become aware of how remarkably common the unthinkable scenario above actually is -- might we pause to think again?

Let's test that possibility for a moment with a short and shallow (not to mention highly incomplete) recitation of the lurid.....

History of False Flag Terrorism:

What was Nero thinking when he Burned Rome and blamed it on the Christians? Did he actually think he could get away with it?

What was Hitler thinking when he Burned the Reichstag -- the Seat of Parliament -- and blamed it on the Communists, even as his Storm Troopers were running through the underground tunnel back to Goering's bunker, their flaming torches hot in hand?

Did he likewise think he could get away with it? Or does it matter what he thought? Since not only did he get away with it -- the Shock of the Act of Terror Launched the Third Reich, and gave the Führer an instant excuse to grind the norms of Europe's then strongest democracy into the choking dust of his Empire Lusting Madness.

His second False Flag Attack -- Operation Himmler in 1939-- provided the Nazis with justification to occupy Poland, as the Gestapo took over and faked an assault on the German radio station at Gleiwitz. They dressed some political prisoners to look the part of Polish Saboteurs and murdered them on the spot. The next day, Poland was invaded.

It is perhaps worth noting here that as World War II drew to a close and Hitler's ruin became inevitable, the Head of Nazi Military Intelligence -- Reinhard Gehlen (right) -- reached out to the United States for asylum. In return for access to the mountains of data that he and his closest associates had compiled on the Soviet Union, Gehlen struck a deal with Allen Dulles, the co-founder of the CIA, which provided for his safe passage to America.

The deal with Dulles -- Operation Paperclip -- provided Gehlen with the wholesale transplant of his entire Nazi Intelligence unit directly into the CIA. And it paved the way for more than 700 elite Nazi scientists to bring the lessons of their most outlandish research in human cruelty into the US Intelligence community as well. (Search for MK-ULTRA / ARTICHOKE, OPERATION MIDNIGHT CLIMAX, etc.) American Law expressly forbids the immigration of such people -- hundreds of whom had directly participated in just-concluded programs that accomplished the mass torture and murder of literally millions of people.

President Harry Truman (right) directed that the transplantation of these War Criminals to America would not be allowed. Dulles nodded and defied him -- as good as spitting on Truman's back as he was walking away -- and simply instructed his CIA underlings to scrub the dossiers of the former Nazis of all references to their true affiliations and crimes.

Dulles (below) thereby brought these beasts directly into the belly of the United States Intelligence community, which seemed to digest their arrival with a deplorable ease. Their hard-wired fascist loyalties meshing perfectly with the anti-Socialist zeitgeist of the day, these brightest minds of the Nazi War Machine went directly back to work as if without interruption.

Almost immediately, the CIA and England's MI6 conspired with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) to establish a Vast Network of Secret Stay-Behind Armies Throughout Europe.

This action expressed the utter disdain of the Western Intelligence Establishment for the "will of the people" in numerous countries considered "allies" and "democracies." Massive caches of arms and munitions were hidden. Hand-picked men drawn from various military and intelligence services were tightly organized into secret, powerful, and virulently right-wing groups.

Ostensibly justified as the "seeds of resistance" against the threat of a Soviet invasion, these groups were charged with monitoring and manipulating the political process within each state -- ready to pounce at the first evidence of a drift away from rightist policies or the rise toward the head of government by anyone affiliated with the left.

In several countries, the secret armies remained content to master their skills with explosives and wait. In many countries, however, the "waiting" was thrown aside for the active harassment and destabilization of democratically elected governments, the assassination of key leaders, military Coups d'Etat, and multiple, wildly horrific acts of terrorism that resurrected the random mass killing of thousands of innocent people.

A False Flag Terrorism -- barely imaginable in its scope, its true source continually and brutally obscured -- that was Directed Against the European Public for Decades.

Secrecy endured, though the continent-encompassing campaign -- codenamed Operation Gladio in Italy (from the Latin "gladius," the sword) -- involved the active complicity of literally thousands of clandestine operatives in at least sixteen countries.

So deeply submerged were the organizations that Austrian President Thomas Klestil, who had publicly declared that no such secret army could ever undermine his country's sovereignty, was shocked to learn in 1996 that the "Austrian Hiking, Sports and Society Club" was just such an army. After Franz Olah, who had set up the "Club" at the CIA's bidding, confessed that "there must have been a couple of thousand people working for us," President Klestil demanded an apology and requested a full-on investigation from the United States. The Clinton Administration responded with silence.

Austria's ignorance of its own loss of internal political legitimacy was just one example of the reach and power of this most Sweeping and Historically Successful of False Flag Operations. Though these Western financed, trained and coordinated Armies of Dark Actors were found to be responsible for Brutal Acts of Terrorism in Italy, Ireland, Turkey, Germany, France, Spain, Portugal, Belgium, and Sweden -- the blame for the ongoing atrocity was impeccably focused on "Leftists."

Thus, for decades, the public -- blinded to the true sources of their continuing agony -- reached out for "protection" to the very same agencies which secretly harbored their murderous assailants.

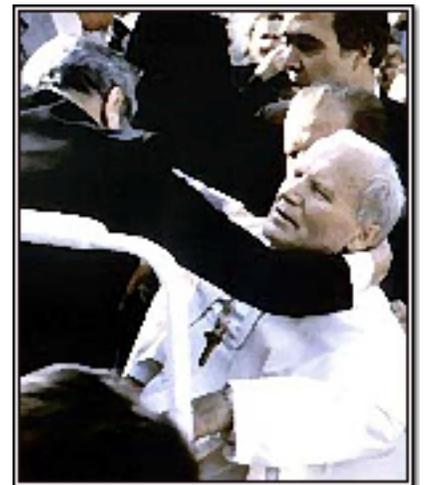

For decades.

CIA Director William Colby (at right in September, 1974) would eventually confirm in his memoirs that Gladio had been a "major program" for the Agency.

Highlights of the Decades of Terror linked to these False Flag Operations would include:

- Ø The December, 1944 Athens Massacre in Greece, blamed on radical leftists, in which British troops were seen standing side-by-side on rooftops with domestic paramilitary operatives machine-gunning the crowd below.
- Ø The Dirty War -- "La Guerra Sucia" -- waged for years by Spain's Gladio-linked Death Squads in the 1980s, during which 27 men associated with the Basque Separatist Movement were murdered.
- Ø The 1980 Military Coup in Turkey, by which the commander of the Gladio-affiliated "Counter-Guerilla" organization, General Kenan Evren, seized control of the government -- one day after 3,000 US military personnel began "maneuvers" on Turkish soil. More than 600,000 citizens were arrested on political grounds; a quarter of a million tortured; countless murdered.
- Ø Evren's rule facilitated the Killing and Torturing of Thousands of Kurds in the 1980s. In a withering reign of false flag attacks, Counter-Guerrilla operatives attacked numerous villages, dressed up as Kurdish leftist PKK fighters, and raped and executed people randomly.
- Ø In Spain, the 1976 Montejurra Massacre and the 1977 Massacre of Atocha, both of which targeted trade unionists. In Atocha, assassins bent on killing Union Leader Joaquin Navarro opened fire with submachine guns on the people they encountered in their search for the man. Then they killed him too.
- Ø The bloody 1967 Military Coup in Greece staged by the Gladio-linked "LOK," during which scores of people were killed and more than 10,000 arrested.
- Ø The deadly Oktoberfest Bombing of 1980 in Munich, Germany, after which the Neo-Nazi Heinz Lembke lead police to 33 hidden arm-caches, where huge amounts of military equipment were found. Lembke committed suicide in his prison cell shortly after announcing he would name names. Immediately all investigation was dropped, and a "lone bomber" blamed.
- Ø The Failed Coup in Algiers against the government of Charles De Gaulle by the Organisation Armée Secrète (OAS) in 1961, which was spear-headed by "retired" right-wing military officers from the French Colonial War in Vietnam.
- Ø The 1979 Murder of Turkish Newspaper Editor Abdi Ipekçi by Mehmet Ali Agca, the infamous Gladio-linked "Grey Wolves" member who would undertake, in the following year, the Failed Assassination of Pope John Paul II.

- Ø The 1969 Murder of Anticolonialist Leader Eduardo Mondlane by Aginter Press, the Portuguese secret stay-behind army.
 - Ø The 1977 Trade Union Rally Massacre at Taksim Square in Istanbul, Turkey, during which Counter-Guerilla snipers opened fire on a panicked and pinned-down crowd of 500,000 people. For twenty minutes the gunmen fired, killing 38 and wounding hundreds, while the thousands of police ringing the throng stood and watched.
 - Ø Continuing in Turkey -- the Bahçelievler Massacre of seven university students on October 9, 1978; the Beyazıt Square Massacre of another seven students on March 16, 1978; and the Kahramanmaraş Massacre (below) of December 23, 1978, during which 111 people were killed, according to the official figures, though the actual number was believed to be much higher.
 - Ø The Brabant Massacres in Belgium in the 1980s, during which at least 28 people were murdered in random, precisely executed attacks. During the siege, a large Gladio-related weapons cache was discovered outside the nearby village of Velp.
 - Ø The 1974 Piazza Della Loggia Bombing in Brescia, Italy, which killed eight and injured more than a hundred.
 - Ø The Piazza Fontana Bombing of 1969, which obliterated sixteen people and seriously wounded 90, and was described as the “detonator” by which Italian military authorities would declare a state of emergency. Communists were blamed.
 - Ø The 1974 Italicus Express Bombing, in which explosives planted on the crowded Rome to Munich train left twelve people dead and forty-four injured.
 - Ø The 1973 Bombing of the Plane Argo 16, which killed all aboard and was long blamed on Israel, was later attributed by General Geraldo Serravalle, secret head of Gladio from 1971 to 1974, to Gladiatori who were refusing to hand over their clandestine arms.
 - Ø The May, 1972 Peteano Murders, in which three policemen were slain, supposedly at the hands of the Communist “Red Brigades.” The Gladio Operative Vincenzo Vinciguerra would later confess that the murders were actually his, and that he was spirited away in the aftermath to the shelter of Fascist Spain by members of the Italian Secret Service.

- Ø The Murder of Former Italian Prime Minister Aldo Moro, the leader of the Christian Democracy Party, who had recently reached an historic compromise with the Italian Communist Party (PCI), and was on his way to formalize it when he was kidnapped in 1978, purportedly by the Red Brigades. During his detention, Moro wrote several letters to various prominent political figures (including Giulio Andreotti, the man who had succeeded him as Prime Minister -- and who would finally confess in 1990 to the existence of Gladio).

After 54 days of captivity, Moro was murdered, and his body dumped in an abandoned car.

Reporting on the crime, investigative journalist Mino Pecorelli wrote that Carlo Alberto Dalla Chiesa, Italy's Head of Counter-Terrorism, had known Moro's exact whereabouts during his capture, and would later oversee the discovery of a cache of Moro's letters, knowledge of which he withheld from the public. At least one of these communiqués from the doomed former head of state made reference to the involvement of both NATO and the CIA in an Italian-based "secret service, parallel army."

Journalist Pecorelli not only revealed the existence of the letters, but drew a connection between the "secret army" they described and doubts about the professed affiliations of Moro's assassins. Pecorelli went on to predict that Dalla Chiesa, by virtue of his undisclosed complicity in the crime and his first-hand knowledge of the historically important letters, was in mortal danger. The journalist would prove a skillful fortune teller, though perhaps less comprehensive than he might have wished. For Pecorelli himself was murdered in 1979, and Dalla Chiesa not until 1982.

It was not until 1990, when Italian Judge Felice Casson forced the above-mentioned Giulio Andreotti to take the stand in an investigation of domestic terrorism, that the secrecy shrouding the operations finally began to unravel.

On August 3rd, 1990, Andreotti -- a Three-Time Former Prime Minister of his country -- revealed that Italy's Secret Gladio Army had been hidden all the while within the Defense Ministry, as a subsection of the Military Secret Service.

General Vito Miceli, a former director of that Secret Service, upon hearing of Andreotti's testimony, would protest: "I have gone to prison because I did not want to reveal the existence of this super secret organization. And now Andreotti (below, at right) comes along and tells it to parliament!"

The Veteran (and remarkably named) Gladio Operative, Vincenzo Vinciguerra (below, left), went before Judge Casson and explained the simple logic behind the viciousness:

"You had to attack civilians, the people, women, children, innocent people, unknown people far removed from any political game."

"The reason was quite simple. They were supposed to force these people, the Italian public, to turn to the state to ask for greater security."

"This is the political logic that lies behind all the massacres and the bombings which remain unpunished, because the state cannot convict itself or declare itself responsible for what happened."

As a result of Judge Casson's inquiry, the Existence of the Secret Stay Behind Armies and the Scope of their Murderous Operations eventually came to be acknowledged all across the continent, though pressure against meaningful investigation and legal remedy continues to this day.

(A great deal of material related to Gladio is included in Reference 10.1 of this piece. Daniele Ganser's 2005 book, "NATO's Secret Armies," is likely the most authoritative examination currently available. For a look at current False Flag Terrorism, including comprehensive research on Al-Qaeda's ongoing relationship with Western Intelligence in the light of 9/11, see Nafeez Ahmed's superbly presented book, "The War on Truth.")

this plain fact:
That the "Big Lie" Behind "Leftist Terrorism" in Europe was successfully maintained from the mid-1940s through 1990.

Though knowledge of Gladio was held, to varying degrees, by military and intelligence operatives numbering in the thousands, based in a multitude of countries, trained, supplied, and organized by the Western Intelligence Establishment, and though their Terrorist Operations repeatedly accomplished
The Mass Murder of Innocent People,

The History-Altering False Flag Conspiracy Behind the Attacks remained a Secret for More than Forty Years.

On the 27th anniversary of John Kennedy's assassination -- November 22, 1990 -- the European Parliament issued a Special Resolution, calling for a "a full investigation into the nature, structure, aims, and all other aspects of these clandestine organizations or any splinter groups, their use for illegal interference in the internal political affairs of the countries concerned, and the problem of terrorism in Europe."

Though revelations have since spilled forth in the time-honored tradition that follows any breakthrough to honesty, a "full investigation" -- in the legal sense -- has not been undertaken.

And those who look beyond the headlines will note that an Odd Sense of the Surreal has still not been solved in the Ongoing Tales of Terror. There is hardly a corner of the planet, it seems, able to shield itself from such episodes of shocking, high-yield violence -- attributed always to "extremists" -- as are eventually connected in one way or another to the Intelligence Services of governments.

Most of us are made aware of the more outrageous of these violent episodes: The breaking stories keep on coming. It's a lot harder to get the facts about the follow-up -- the part where "ongoing investigation" and an "unnamed source" suggests that the story first told was, at the very least, misleading.

In 2002, for instance, I heard about the Terrorist Bombings in Bali.

But I missed the part where former Indonesian President Abdurrahman Wahid, the man often referred to as the "conscience" of his country, observed on television that: "The orders to do this... [bomb the Sari Club] came from within our armed forces, not from the fundamentalist people." And I likewise missed the part where former terrorist Umar Abduh said: "There is not a single Islamic group either in the movement or the political groups that is not controlled by (Indonesian) intelligence."

And so it goes. Beyond the Spanish government's immediate phone calls to major newspapers begging that the March 11, 2004 Madrid Train Bombings be blamed on Basque Leftists -- an appeal that eventually failed in favor of a fallback "al Qaeda" scenario, since abandoned as well for lack of evidence -- we are left with the largely ignored facts that two of the accused bombers (who "blew themselves up" before they could be brought to trial) were longtime police informants.

And that the man accused of supplying the military grade explosives, which murdered 191 people and wounded 1,755, was found to be in possession of the Private Phone Number of the Head of Spain's Civil Guard Bomb Squad. Golfing buddies, maybe? Squash?

Which eerily echoes the awkward climax of The Chechen Terror in Russia, where a Series of Bombings played out behind the rise of former KGB Head Vladimir Putin to National Power. These bombings would claim 300 lives and injure more than a thousand, and would eventually be blamed on Arabs fighting for the independence of Chechnya. The explosions -- which began in a Moscow Mall, continued outside a Buynaksk Apartment Building, then claimed an Apartment Building in Pechatniki, then obliterated an Eight-Story Apartment Block on the Kashirskoye Highway, then a Nine-Story Apartment Complex in the City of Volgodonsk -- finally sputtered to a standstill in in the Basement of an Apartment Building in Ryazan.

There, on the night of September 22, 1999, an alert citizen saved his own life by calling the local police when he noticed two suspicious men carrying sacks into the building from a car with Moscow license plates. The cops found three hundred-pound sacks of white powder in the basement. A detonator was attached and a timing device set for 5:30 in the morning. The head of the local bomb squad disconnected the devices and tested the white substance with a gas analyzer (MO-2). The substance was identified as Hexogen (RDX), the same military explosive used in each of the previous bombings.

In the subsequent forced evacuation of 30,000 residents through tight roadblocks manned by 1,200 police officers with automatic weapons -- the perpetrators were caught. They quickly produced identification cards from the Russian Federal Security Service (FSB). Their phone records showed that they had called the Moscow office of the FSB immediately upon fleeing the scene.

The Bombers were, in other words, Agents of the Russian Government engaged in the Murder of Russian People, in an Ongoing Campaign of Terror which was Officially Blamed on Rebel Chechens. Nevertheless, they were shortly released.

On September 24, 1999, FSB director Nikolai Patrushev declared that the incident had been a "training exercise" -- and the terrorist bombings abruptly stopped. That same day, the War on Chechnya was launched.

Flashing forward, we might note that the July 7, 2005 Terrorist Bombings in London -- intriguingly replicating a particularly haunting aspect of 9/11 -- were undertaken for real while a massive “rehearsal” for just such an event, involving the same locations and the same attack profile was taking place “coincidentally” at exactly the same time.

<http://www.julyseventh.co.uk/july-7-terror-rehearsal.html#kirstylang>

Coincidence is a bitch, is it not? And a hypnotic one, at that. For we would have to be hypnotized to believe that the published “proof” of the London Bombers entering the subway to do the deed should be treated as genuine. For instance, as “Hasib Hussain” takes his last steps into the tube, we see his reflected image in the glass wall behind him. But instead of that image showing the back side of his body, like any mirror behind any human truly would, it shows the front side of him again. Whoever executed the digital tweakage of this “evidence” remains a class or two shy of a Photoshop Master rating.

One might wonder also about reports that the “backpack bombs” involved somehow caused the steel floors of the destroyed subway cars to curl upwards in their mangled ruin; or that the government claimed for an hour and a half that a “power surge,” not bombs, was responsible for the throttling of the system; or that the double-decker bus which blew up an hour later in Tavistock Square had been the only such vehicle diverted from its regular route that day, before meeting its explosive demise.

52 people were murdered. 700 were wounded. As was, of course, everyone on the planet who is not directly profiting from the War on Terror.

The Line of Profit in this Newest War can be traced directly from Halliburton/KBR's current, historically huge windfall in Iraq all the way back to its more modest days of profiteering as the Chief Financial Engine of Lyndon Johnson's Political Career.

In a relationship that Launched its Rise to Mega-Power, the company (then known as Brown & Root) was the lucky beneficiary of Johnson's decision to escalate hostilities in Southeast Asia. This escalation by the New President reversed the plans of his recently deceased predecessor, John Kennedy, to withdraw American troops. (Those plans were declassified in the 1990s. See: <http://www.history-matters.com/vietnam1963.htm>).

Johnson, about to be sworn in as President aboard Air Force One on the runway in Dallas, standing between his wife, Lady Bird, and a grief-stricken Jacqueline Kennedy, turns to field a "wink" from his pal, Texas Representative Albert Thomas

Soon -- out of the infamous Gulf of Tonkin Incident of August 2 and 4, 1964 (in which the North Vietnamese Navy was reported to have attacked the Destroyers USS Maddox and USS Turner Joy), Johnson would fashion a national television speech announcing his order of Air Strikes Against North Vietnam. He announced to our country that "aggression by terror against the peaceful villagers of South Vietnam has now been joined by open aggression on the high seas against the United States of America."

Even as he demanded -- and got -- the Gulf of Tonkin Resolution from Congress, which empowered him to Attack Militarily without a Declaration of War, and to undertake a "surge" that saw troop levels eventually jump from 23,000 to 542,000, Johnson was confiding privately that, "For all I know, our Navy was shooting at whales out there."

An investigation by the NSA in 2005 would conclude -- forty years after the fact -- that “[I]t is not simply that there is a different story as to what happened; it is that no attack happened that night. [...] In truth, Hanoi's navy was engaged in nothing that night but the salvage of two of the boats damaged on 2 August.”

The Ultimate Value of the Gulf of Tonkin False Flag Attack Against America -- and the Vietnam War it enabled -- may be measured in several ways:

- Ø It taught the American Military that the American Press must never again have access to what is actually occurring in America's Name overseas.
- Ø It cost the lives of 5.1 million Vietnamese and 58,217 Americans.
- Ø It guaranteed that Johnson's lifelong political benefactor, Brown & Root -- folded snugly into the Four Corporation Consortium that gobbled up a Solid Decade of No Bid Contracts -- walked away from the jungles of Southeast Asia with hundreds of millions of dollars in profits.

Johnson, it turns out, was not done, though his last attempt to redirect history beneath the Winds of Deception would come to naught. It's appropriate, perhaps, to close our Short History of False Flag Terror with an episode which also measures.....

The Long Life of a Big Lie:

The Attack on the USS Liberty is just such an episode.

On June 8, 1967 -- the third day of the legendary Six Day War between Israel and the Arab states of Egypt, Jordan and Syria -- the Liberty, a US Navy Spy Ship, was sailing in international waters off the coast of Egypt. The ship prominently flew the Stars and Stripes, and had been identified as American and “friendly” in repeated Israeli flyovers during the previous two days.

Crew members who were sunning themselves on deck were stunned from their reverie at 2:00 pm when several Unmarked Fighter Jets suddenly descended upon them with blazing machine guns and killed many of them instantly.

The jets followed with a heat-seeking missile attack which destroyed the ship's active communication antennas and then began dropping Napalm, stem to stern. An Electronics Technician by the name of Terry Halbardier managed to get off an SOS from an antenna that had been powered down as the assault began. His message -- stating that the USS Liberty was under attack by unknown aircraft -- was picked up by the USS Saratoga and the USS America of the nearby Sixth Fleet, both of which launched jet fighters to come to the ship's rescue.

Before they could reach the Liberty -- fifteen minutes away -- these fighter aircraft were ordered to turn around by US Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara, in Washington. Liberty survivor David Lewis, Officer of the Deck (OOD) during the attack, recalls the amazement of Sixth Fleet Rear Admiral Lawrence Geis at the overriding of his orders:

"He told me that since I was the senior Liberty survivor on board he wanted to tell me in confidence what had actually transpired. He told me that upon receipt of our SOS, aircraft were launched to come to our assistance and then Washington was notified. He said that the Secretary of Defense (Robert McNamara) had ordered that the aircraft be returned to the carrier, which was done. RADM Geis then said that he speculated that Washington may have suspected that the aircraft carried nuclear weapons so he put together another flight of conventional aircraft that had no capability of carrying nuclear weapons. These he launched to assist us and again notified Washington of his actions.

Again McNamara (below) ordered the aircraft recalled. He requested confirmation of the order, being unable to believe that Washington would let us sink. This time President Johnson ordered the recall with the comment that he did not care if every man drowned and the ship sank, but that he would not embarrass his allies."

That the attack was the work of "allies" was not so quickly clear to the Americans fighting to stay alive, since the aircraft portion of the surprise assault had gone on for quite a while. In the words of survivor Phillip Tourney:

"Soon after the jets were done with us we see 3 motor torpedo boats approaching our ship at a high rate of speed. We then learned who our attackers were. We saw 3 flags marked with the Star of David.

We were in shock because the Israelis were supposed to be our allies! We had had no idea who was attacking us until then. The attacking jet aircraft were unmarked.

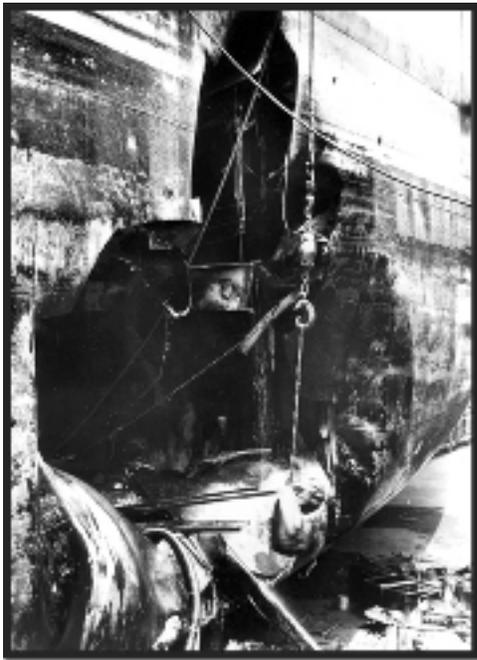

The torpedo boats maneuvered themselves into a torpedo launch attitude, now come the 5 to 6 torpedoes. The captain was doing his best to maneuver the ship to avoid sudden death. The torpedoes whizzed by our ship, forward and aft with 1 hitting its mark, almost dead mid-ships, blowing to bits 25 American heroes who stood their ground below the water line and accepted their fate, doing their duty for the United States Government... "

The attack went on for 75 minutes. Because she took the torpedo hit directly upon a mid-ship brace, the Liberty was spared being cut in half, despite the thirty foot hole in her hull. Afterward, though US aircraft remained fifteen minutes away, the ship -- her seven by thirteen foot American flag riddled with bullet holes -- was left alone and "dead in the water" for more than sixteen hours, as if some demon somewhere were muttering imprecations that she might yet succumb.

She did not.

More than 200 Americans on board, however, had been wounded in the ordeal, and 34 of them would die.

The government of Israel claimed its pilots and torpedo boat captains had believed the Liberty to be the Egyptian vessel "El Quseir" -- a 1920s vintage horse-cavalry transport that was half the Liberty's size -- and called the attack a "tragic mistake."

Former Intelligence Analyst Steve Forslund of the 544th Air Reconnaissance Technical Wing begs to differ. On the day, Forslund was manning the teletype machine behind the sealed vault door at Offutt Air Force Base in Omaha, as real-time surveilled chatter began rolling in. He remembers:

"The [Israeli] ground control station stated that the target was American and for the aircraft to confirm it. The aircraft did confirm the identity of the target as American, by the American flag... The ground control station ordered the aircraft to attack and sink the target and ensure they left no survivors."

Forslund's statement has been confirmed by James Gotcher, then serving with the USAF Security Service's NSA-linked 6924th Security Squadron, and Air Force Captain Richard Block, who was at the time commanding an intelligence wing of more than 100 analysts and cryptologists actively monitoring Middle Eastern communications.

Oliver Kirby, as the NSA's Deputy Director for Operations at the time, had access to surveillance transcripts of the actual attack, and has spoken pointedly of their content:

“They said, 'We've got him in the zero,' whatever that meant -- I guess the sights or something. And then one of them said, 'Can you see the flag?' They said 'Yes, it's U.S. It's U.S.' They said it several times, so there wasn't any doubt in anybody's mind that they knew it.”

This conclusion was echoed by the Senior Counsel to the USS Liberty Court of Inquiry, US Navy Captain Ward Boston, Jr., JAGC, who had been charged, along with Admiral Isaac C. Kidd, to oversee the Navy's immediate official inquiry into the event.

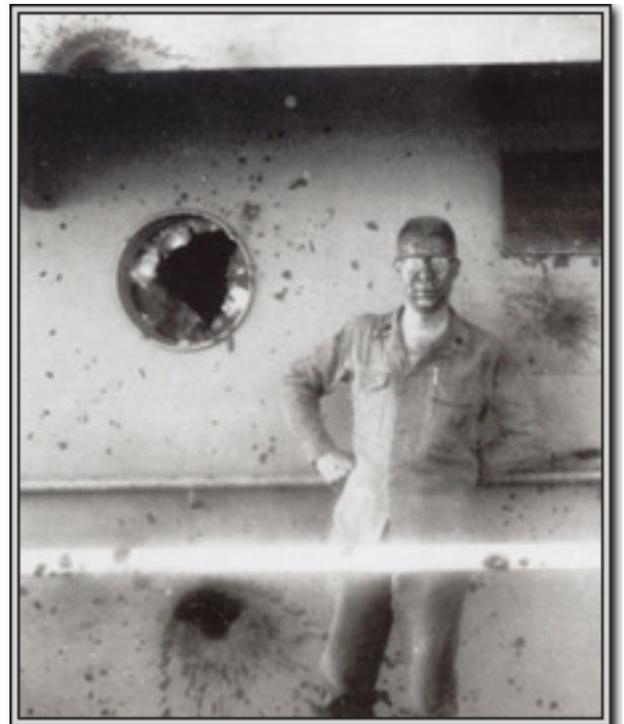

Commander John S. McCain, Jr., Chief of US Naval Forces in Europe (and father of the US Senator), was their superior in the effort. Captain Boston and Admiral Kidd were convinced that a proper Court of Inquiry into an attack of such magnitude would take at least six months to complete, and requested such time from McCain. They were given one week. In a sworn deposition on January 9, 2004, Boston declared:

“For more than 30 years, I have remained silent on the topic of USS Liberty. I am a military man and when orders come in from the Secretary of Defense and President of the United States, I follow them. However, recent attempts to rewrite history compel me to share the truth. [...]

The evidence was clear. Both Admiral Kidd and I believed with certainty that this attack, which killed 34 American sailors and injured 172 others, was a deliberate effort to sink an American ship and murder its entire crew. [...] I am certain that the Israeli pilots that undertook the attack, as well as their superiors, who had ordered the attack, were well aware that the ship was American. [...] Not only did the Israelis attack the ship with napalm, gunfire, and missiles, Israeli torpedo boats machine-gunned three lifeboats that had been launched in an attempt by the crew to save the most seriously wounded -- a war crime. [...]

I know from personal conversations I had with Admiral Kidd that President Lyndon Johnson and Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara ordered him to conclude that the attack was a case of “mistaken identity” despite overwhelming evidence to the contrary. [...] [I]t is important for the American people to know that it is clear that Israel is responsible for deliberately attacking an American ship and murdering American sailors, whose bereaved shipmates have lived with this egregious conclusion for many years.”

*In the aftermath,
Staff Sergeant Bryce Lockwood*

Despite four decades of unrelenting suppression, evidence that the Official Explanation for this Mass Murder is a Brazen Lie has fairly screamed to be heard.

The Liberty remains the only attack on an American military vessel in our nation's history not to be investigated by Congress. The Navy's own investigation, beyond the aforementioned "one week" time limit imposed upon it, was further hamstrung when the Judge and Counsel were forbidden to even speak with the Israeli pilots involved -- or to anyone in Israel, for that matter. Those American survivors who remained in service to their country were separated from one another in subsequent assignments and threatened with Court Martial if they spoke about their experiences.

Their questions, however, have not gone away.

Why were they attacked? Why is the attack covered up?

Various answers have been floated. Some have speculated that Israel was genuinely bent on removing America's ability to surveil the harsher and more controversial details of its brilliant and devastatingly quick redefinition of the balance of power in the region. Others have argued that President Johnson was actually deeply concerned -- first and foremost -- that Israel not be "embarrassed" by their mistake when he railed that the Liberty should be allowed to sink. But even for a man with Johnson's prodigious appetite for political brutality, this seems a stretch. Especially when one considers that both Johnson and McNamara seemed to know the identity of the Liberty's tormentors even before such knowledge had begun to come to those aboard the ship.

In September of 2003, British journalist Peter Hounam published "Operation Cyanide: How the Bombing of the USS Liberty Nearly Caused World War III." The book introduces us to a little-known clique of "hawks" within the Johnson Administration called the "303 Committee," which the late CIA Director Richard Helms described as a "device for examining covert operations of any kind and making a judgment on behalf of the President, so he wouldn't be nailed with the thing, if it failed."

In 1966, that committee fashioned a project called "Frontlet 615," the goal of which was the destruction of Egypt's President, the charismatic Gamal Abdel Nasser. President Nasser, much admired at the time (five million people would mourn him in the streets when he died), was then promoting a new "Pan-Arabism," seeking to inspire a sense of pride and empowerment throughout the region. He was big and getting bigger. He was a builder. And he was every bit a genuine visionary.

As such, Nasser threatened to jeopardize the leadership of America's favorite Arab Partners -- the Saudis. He had also begun to look increasingly to the Soviet Union for financial aid, and the Soviets were seen to have designs on control of the Suez Canal.

Hounam's research indicates that the USS Liberty rescue jets which Lyndon Johnson and Robert McNamara commanded to return on June 8, 1967, were not the only jets they were moved to recall that afternoon. Another squadron was launched in the immediate response to this "unprovoked attack on America" -- a squadron bound for an airbase outside of Cairo.

Stationed at this base were a number of Soviet bombers.

Thus was the US poised to join Israel in her stunning success. But even as these jets were streaking toward Egypt, the Needed Justification for America to "Legitimately" Engage -- the Sinking of the USS Liberty -- was Steadfastly Refusing to Manifest.

Though the Liberty had been a Sitting Duck, barely armed, she was failing to follow the script. She had suffered instant mass casualties inflicted by the surprise machine gun attack. Her communications antennas were supposed to have been taken out. She'd been set ablaze by Napalm and white phosphorus weapons, all the while repeatedly strafed with cannon fire, and targeted by at least five powerful torpedoes, any one of which should have been enough to take her down -- and one of which did in fact score a direct hit, at her very center.

Yet she would not sink.

Three minutes before reaching their target, in Operation Cyanide's telling, the Cairo-bound US Jets were recalled, and America remained, officially at least, on the sidelines of the Six Day War.

By keeping her right and fighting to stay afloat, the American sailors who correctly identified their "enemy" that day truly altered history. Had they failed, and the Liberty gone down, Egypt would have taken the blame for her loss.

And much as North Vietnam had been successfully blamed -- at great profit -- for a similar "Attack on America" less than three years previously, the "Arab Aggressors" would have been very thoroughly punished. This time, it was not to be.

Which illustrates that even a country as powerful as the United States cannot depend on the cover of a False Flag Attack, if its victims have witnessed the True Flag Behind It -- and lived to tell the tale.

Which is not to suggest that such a job gone wrong might easily threaten the apparently inexhaustible will of so many well-trained covert operatives to Sustain the Big Lie.

Their continuing business demands it.

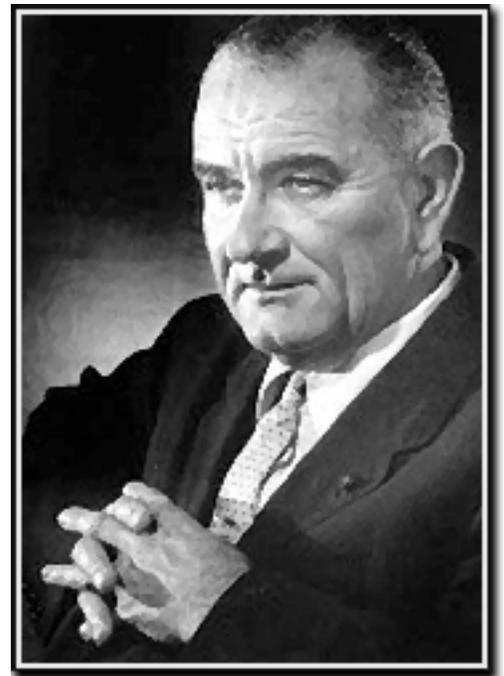

On June 8, 2007, Liberty survivor Lt. James Ennes, Jr. attended a gathering in Virginia which honored his shipmates who died. It was an emotional, quietly observed hour-long ceremony on the banks of the Potomac. Ennes was asked later how it had felt.

“The thoughts that always come back to me -- time and time again -- is that this ‘thing’ is still being covered-up,” he replied, “after forty years.”

The USS Liberty Memorial Website may be accessed at: <http://www.gtr5.com/>

In sum, then, we can see that the History of False Flag Terrorism not only reveals how Commonly Such Events are Used by People in Power to Achieve Political Goals, but also how Amazingly Long Lived are the Lies Told to Support Such Deception -- if we do not know our history. (10.1)

With that in mind, it's interesting to look at the differences between the publicized “threats” we are repeatedly told we face and the details of the actual deeds that follow. When we think about it -- how many times do these post 9/11 stories about “barely thwarted attacks” lead to actual arrests? It is remarkable how often -- and quietly -- they collapse days or weeks or months later into “mistaken assessments” based on “faulty intelligence.” Recall that almost all of us believed Colin Powell's passionate speech before the UN on Saddam's “Weapons of Mass Destruction.” And despite the leak in Great Britain of the “Downing Street Memos” -- which proved the speech was based on lies -- more Americans today believe it was true than they did a year ago. Is more powerful evidence needed that we are simply not paying attention? (10.2)

Contemplate, if you will, the pattern of how such lies are used against us. (10.3)

Begin to pay attention to how consistently a widely publicized “new terror threat” will follow any compelling news about the real world that might give us reason to pause for a moment and consider the actual damage that is piling up around our shredding Bill of Rights; our historically out-of-whack trade deficits; our unprecedented national debt loads; the tens of thousands more Americans that fall beyond the reach of health insurance every single month; the corporate profit-driven outsourcing of millions of middle class jobs which have been promised by virtue of their years of education to our own children; the ominously destabilizing weather all around our planet; and the degree to which our relationships with the other nations of the world have come to be measured by their willingness to acquiesce to the appetites of our corporate masters -- a willingness that is always rendered now in the light of our capacity to destroy them.

“You’re either for us or against us!” comes the blustering schoolyard throw-down out of our leaders’ lockstep mouths -- speaking for the United States of America.

Absent even the faintest acknowledgment of their profit and complicity in the “crisis” the globe must now endure.

Imagine how such threats have landed, all across the human race, coming from the society that has excelled like no other in modern times. The culture of unprecedented opportunity. The last best beacon of hope -- a guiding light to repeated generations of struggling humans, stranded together in the void of space and cursed with the same daunting problems -- but buoyed always by the unshakable confidence of America -- the brightest and most capable of all countries.

What kind of message does it send, from a nation that has done so majestically well for so long? As it is known in every trial-tested life on the planet -- it is his appetite for aggression which betrays the bully’s sense of his inner weakness. And we, the people -- standing by while these angry, insatiable men scream their lust for Total Domination deep into the gathering black -- look away as if to agree:

“Once we were not only powerful -- but great. Great in all the generosity of our promise. A country to be emulated; to be respected and depended upon. Now, we will be feared.”

Cheney's Pals at Halliburton etc. Get Hundreds of Millions in Iraq No-bid Contracts

The hideous irony in this is that the future damage that genuine Jihadism will inflict upon the West is no doubt gathering momentum like a virulent cancer, provoked to metastasize by our brutally misbegotten “liberation” of Iraq.

As the National Intelligence Estimate of April 2006 starkly concluded, the Big Lie that took us to Baghdad has proven to be an engine, rather than a brake, to the spreading threat of Radical Islamic violence. (10.4)

The implications are obvious and staggering:

The centerpiece of Usama bin Laden’s International Call to Jihad has long been his prediction that the United States, driven by greed, was making plans to invade and occupy an oil-rich Muslim country. (10.5)

With patience, wise commitments to real alliance, and the careful, cooperative efforts of multinational police work, we could’ve discredited bin Laden in the eyes of those hundreds of millions of moderate Muslims who want to believe otherwise -- even as we captured him. Instead -- opting for Surgery by Sledgehammer -- we’ve made the man a prophet.

This might be considered stupid in retrospect. But only if capturing bin Laden and eliminating the “threat of terror” were really the goal of the master criminals who conned us, instead, into this Profit Drenched Bloodletting. 9/11 afforded them the opportunity to accomplish their true goals, and relinquishing their stranglehold on power by promoting peace is not among them.

Pouring gasoline on the fire is more like it.

For while the American mass media “protects” us at home from the gory details of what an utterly broken, weapons infested, criminal gang-ridden free-for-all actually looks like, the daily infusion of images of maimed and dying Muslim children that is being force fed into the psyches of millions of young Muslims the world over continues unabated -- and yet to be avenged. (10.6)

This is what they see, beamed into their homes...

Thus, disastrously, does the United States of America conduct the “War on Terror.” Contextualized by the covert Savaging of the Geneva Conventions -- as defined in the torture of captive men and the rape of captive women and children -- and as enabled by the overt and preemptive destruction of a sovereign foreign government. War Crimes, in brazen contravention to the moral imperatives of International Law which have stood for more than a hundred and forty years -- the violation of which has always been held in the highest contempt by America. And this in a time when our leaders seek to cast Radical Islam as “barbaric” in the court of international opinion. (10.7)

So plays out the calculus of the tough talking men who call the shots -- most of whose lives are tellingly unmarked by the personal sacrifice of any military service of their own. And we, the citizens of America, deeply frightened after 9/11, vulnerably ignorant of history, continue even now to abide their lies -- and their heinous, criminal greed.

True masters of shadow play, brilliant in deflective disguise, these men would quietly kill -- even while singing its praises -- that which common Americans hold precious. Such duplicity is a central principle of the political philosophy in which they’ve been trained. They believe and benefit in the process. They have been practicing for decades. (10.8)

If American democracy is to survive the fear driven assault they’ve begun, it is critical that we as citizens stand up and demand accountability from these men. We cannot do so if we do not arm ourselves with knowledge -- from sources beyond their control. We need to read -- to familiarize ourselves with the observations of thoughtful people who speak beyond the interests of Empire. Think. Outside of our comfort zones. Seek -- rather than flee -- differing points of view. Share and compare ideas. And most importantly -- ask questions. Of our media. Of our representatives. Of one another.

Real investigation of the True Scope of the 9/11 Crime and the destabilization of the entire world which has followed in its wake is not only warranted -- it is utterly critical. And the time to act is quickly passing us by.

Our Republic will not stand if we continue to pretend that the wounds now mounting against it are someone else’s business. The reckoning is upon us. And truly, if not for Americans -- who will save America?

To review...

Lincoln's assassination: a conspiracy.

Nurse Nayirah's rage-inducing exposé of the Inhuman Iraqi Baby Killers which came undone upon a closer examination: a conspiracy.

The Protocols of the Elders of Zion: a conspiracy theory which was proven to have been the cruelest hoax in the history of the world; and a hoax which was proven to have been created and promoted by -- a conspiracy.

LBJ with Bobby and Jack

The assassination of John Kennedy (though originally passed off as the terrible deed of a disgruntled "loner," eventually judged by the majority of historians, two congressional investigations and a trail of bloody corpses to have been): a conspiracy.

Which bring us to the "breakthrough" research posted in San Francisco regarding the long rumored connection between Saddam Hussein and Mr. bin Laden. It turns out that both of these evil men were assisted to power and provided with weapons, training, and extensive strategic and political advice during the 1980s, under the direction of one-time CIA Director, one time Vice President, one time President of the United States: the honorable George H. W. Bush. In Saddam's case, it took two CIA sponsored Coups to install him as Iraq's Strongman -- his itchy trigger finger having aborted the first try.

But eventually all three of these Leaders of Lesser Men would settle into a comfortable fluency when it came to that most important of connective issues: Currency. Through the Bank of Credit and Commerce International (or BCCI -- famous for its dirty role in the Iran-Contra Scam and the preferred money launderer of drug and arms traffickers, financial fraud artists, corrupt officials, dictators and terrorists the world over), the three leaders shared more than a common deposit slip. Beyond his weapons, Usama got a Life Lesson in Black Market Finance; Saddam got a 15% Cut Off the Top of his multi-billion BCCI weapons loans; and the elder Bush got to bring BCCI to the rescue of young Dubya's Struggling Oil Company just before it went Belly Up. Even the Saudis behind BCCI did well: Something close to $15 billion went missing in the chaos of the bank's collapse. (11.1)

President Bush Sr. has more recently been drawing his "big bank" from the Weapons Selling Carlyle Group, where the business of making war -- as the bin Laden family itself can attest -- has always been the best kind of business. (11.2)

Chaos, as always -- the favored state to obscure wrongdoing. Thus chaos, as always, in history's telling ledger -- the tried and true midwife to the birth of a lock down tyranny.

As a point to make in summation of the above historical judgments, we might want to ponder the fact that over the course of the last sixty-five years or so, there have been 92 actual or attempted Coups d'Etat among the countries of the world -- quite a few of which did not result in someone later reporting the involvement of the CIA. (11.3)

But even aside from the obvious exceptions to that statement -- such as the JFK assassination, the toppling of the Prime Minister of Iran and the Installation of the Shah in 1953, the overthrow of the Iraqi government in 1963, the second coup in Iraq in 1968, the coup in Chile in 1973, the murder of hundreds of government officials in the 1980s by the US financed Contras in Nicaragua, the 48 hour failed coup in Venezuela in 2002, and so forth -- it might be useful to note that not a single one of these 92 undertakings was the work of less than two people. Which means that every single one of them involved -- to employ a term almost guaranteed to invite ridicule -- a conspiracy.

Which brings to mind -- a question.

When did the word "conspiracy" become automatically joined in the popular psyche to the word "theory?" Despite the fact that any time two or more people plan to do anything they know to be wrong -- an actual conspiracy has occurred; and despite the fact that criminals throughout the land are charged, tried, and convicted of conspiracy on a daily basis -- it has become impossible in the current culture to utter the word "conspiracy" without the word "theory" attaching itself like a string of dancing tin cans clattering down the highway behind our favorite newlyweds' mythical limo.

Who among the political thought police first imagined the permanent melding of these two concepts into such a lethal tool of instant dismissal? It's a remarkable accomplishment, and one would hope somebody got a medal for it. Just utter the mantra (seven magic syllables that roll off the tongue -- there's even a "hiss" in it) and we are immediately granted a pass from having to form conscious thoughts about other, more numerous and unpleasant syllables that might be spilled in our direction by some troubled, unpleasant person standing well outside the parameters of pleasing conversation. Thank God for the shelter of instant "CT" thought ejection.

But of course, in post twentieth century America, it's really not that hard anymore to find ways to stick our fingers in our ears, so to speak. It's almost a matter of necessity, given the constant racket that assaults us.

True, shutting out as much unpleasantness as possible might make it easier for well-focused forces to pull a fast one on us. But what else can we do? It's just gotten so damn hard to keep up with it all. Who can take the time or risk the trouble to look at the men behind the curtain? Like the Wiz told our beloved Dorothy: "Pay no attention..."

Fine with us. We'd rather not, anyway. We scramble like crazy just to deal with what gets thrown at us already -- day in and day out.

And regarding that one particular, horribly traumatic day which knocked us so far off balance that we'll probably never feel the same again -- why not just accept the myth of it, and stay in line: The only reason our well-meaning leaders couldn't find a way to respond against the enemy on 9/11, which meant that all those Americans had to die, right in front of our eyes, is that our well-meaning government is, you know, really inefficient. Who would even think to argue?

Hasn't it already been accepted as history?

It feels like it has been. It feels like a bad dream that came true, from which you want to wake up, but somebody keeps pushing you back down in the dark, speaking in hypnotic tones and trying to make what isn't real about it seem insignificant.....

"Do not fret, children. It just so happened that on 9/11 all our top military leaders assumed that an airliner crashing into the World Trade Center had to be an accident. What else were they supposed to suspect?

Those warnings from all those other countries about imminent attack? About terrorists flying planes into buildings? And the year before, when the President slept on a riverboat in Germany for three nights because German Intelligence got warnings he was going to be targeted by terrorists flying a plane into his hotel? And the Al-Qaeda turncoat who told the FBI in April 2000 he'd been training to fly a plane into a building? And Attorney General John Ashcroft who stopped flying on commercial jets a couple of weeks before? And all the Pentagon brass that canceled their flight plans the night before September 11th..... ?

Our leaders thought every one of those details was sort of like..... a coincidence.

That's why they kept on doing the important meetings and photo ops they had previously planned for that morning, instead of jumping to duty when the attacks began, which they no doubt would've done, had they only understood. (11.4)

The Laws of Physics do not allow for such massive structures to disappear at the speed of free-fall, you say? Unless assisted by the application of an external source of disintegrating energy?

Where'd you get that notion? The formula is widely published throughout the world and free for anyone to compare to the videos, you say? Cheesh. We're talking fanatical Muslims here, kids. Didn't you read the program? Muslims have no respect for the Laws of Physics -- so why, in the name of God, would you?

And those stories somebody told you they thought they might've heard about the firemen and the policemen and the medical technicians and the survivors and the victims and the reporters and the eyewitnesses that morning who all reported powerful, repeated explosions going off -- in and below the towers during the rescue effort? And the video that recorded the sounds of those explosions? And the video of the smoke coming up from the towers' basements after many of those explosions? And the video of the flashing "cutter" charges going off like white hot firecrackers within and below the towers' plunging disintegration waves? They were all just mistakes and optical illusions and auditory anomalies. We'll explain what they thought they saw and heard later. (11.5)

And those other videos of the tops of the towers exploding wildly into massive clouds of microscopic dust -- massive chunks of steel beams hurled sideways like darts into buildings four hundred feet away? No need to keep watching those. We'll come up with a theory for that -- and you can bet your bottom dollar it won't be a conspiracy theory. No one around here could ever pull off anything so cunning as blowing up those buildings.

That would take professionalism and a selfish, iron will and a blatant disregard for the laws of our country.

The third building that fell?

What third building...?

Oh.....

Building 7.

Tenants: CIA. IRS. SEC. Department of Defense. Secret Service. $23 Million NYC Emergency Management Command Bunker etc.

47 Stories. Steel framed. Didn't get hit by a plane.

Yeah, well we know the owner seemed to be admitting on TV that they brought it down on purpose because it seemed like the "smartest thing to do" under the circumstances would be to "pull it," just like the demolition guy said later in the same show about "getting ready to 'pull' Building 6"-- which would mean that Building 7 was pre-wired with explosives -- and then Building 7 imploded and fell 47 stories into its own footprint in 6.5 seconds like it had been pre-wired with explosives -- after giant sounds of explosions were heard on video coming from inside Building 7 and explosive squibs were seen on video ejecting from it -- but obviously just because he said that was going to happen and we saw that happen and heard that happen doesn't mean... that's what actually happened. (11.6)

And yeah, the BBC might've overreacted when they yanked their live feed from New York just five minutes before the demolition. But you'd have been embarrassed, too, if you'd already announced the event; and your reporter on the scene was going on and on about how sad it was that yet another building had collapsed -- the third skyscraper to perish on this horrible day, she reminded us -- with the actual building itself still standing there unbroken, strangely yet to disappear, looming directly behind her as if in defiant protest -- even as she eulogized it. Can't you just imagine the frantic transatlantic phone calls? (11.7)

"You damned morons! You can't have the frigging building collapse live on international television twenty-three minutes after you've announced its collapse! It's supposed to be spontaneous! Cut the damned feed NOW!

The insurance policy? Hot Dang, children -- you are working way too hard here!

So what if the owner took it out just six weeks before the attacks and he may now be asking for the whole seven billion dollar payoff? That's just good business! He had fourteen million of his own money in the trade center! And so far the courts have only awarded about five billion in compensation so there's really no reason to suspect that the demolitions might've actually..... had any..... (11.8)

Tell you what. We'll get back to you on that, too."

Or so it seems we are told, though without benefit of so many words. Because truly, no serious questions about any of these preposterously discrediting problems with the Massive Coincidence Theory at the heart of the tragedy have ever been asked of our "leaders." And therefore, answers have not been required. (11.9)

A truer version of the core message delivered to people with questions goes more like this: Anybody who doubts the official story of this tragic Crime Against Freedom is not only a pathetic conspiracy theorist -- but a traitor as well.

Which is no doubt why the only people to have been fired or demoted in the aftermath are those who said, "Wait a minute..."

No one in a position of authority was held accountable.

No one.

It's enough to make you stop and think.

And read. \(11.10\)

The Windsor Building endured a fire that ravaged 88% of its floors and burned for an entire day. Yet it, like every other burning steel-framed building in the history of the world except for -- the THREE -- on 9/11, did not fail.

Now, having studied the long-delayed report of the 911 Commission, and the joke that was FEMA's pass ("the scenario we herein provide has only a low probability of having actually occurred, blah blah blah") and the tortured pretzel logic of the National Institute of Standards and Technology's absurd attempt to avoid anything remotely resembling scientific method or non-manipulated, empirical truth -- I, personally, have come to realize -- no one ever had any intention of "getting back to us."

Each of the above exercises mixed a variety of compelling and verifiable facts into a smokescreen of tangents designed to distract us from the unanswered questions that really matter:

Who was actually behind 9/11? How did they pull it off? Why were we so utterly helpless in the face of it?

As a rule -- these questions have remained unasked when possible; unanswered when asked; and solved by lies when a response was forced.

For example -- as we skim the highlights of the NIST's report, to which many a fire fighter's widow must have turned for the answer to the same haunting question her husband was facing as he died:

Why did this building do what no other steel building in history has ever done?

After performing its forensic duties, the NIST investigators noted (and the press ignored) that only 2% of the steel remnants from the towers had been heated above 250°C.

And that they could find no steel that had been heated above 600°C. Which is:

770°C cooler than the melting point -- 1370°C -- of such steel and 500°C cooler than the temperature -- 1100°C -- such steel could be softened sufficiently to be susceptible to sagging -- if exposed for several hours.

The NIST further noted that the hottest portions of the fires were of short duration (the south tower went from whole to gone in 56 minutes) a finding consistent with the early darkening of the smoke (which indicates cooling) that was widely observed.

Adding these findings to the fact that non-pressurized hydrocarbon fires, such as those attending jet fuel, cannot possibly burn hotter than 825°C -- and nowhere near that hot if diffused, as all visual and forensic evidence attested these fires were -- the NIST's own published August 2003 metallurgical study of the towers stated that it was prepared to "rule out weak steel as a contributing factor in the collapse."

And yet, in its final report, issued fourteen months later in October of 2004, with no new data having arisen, and the deaths of 3,000 American citizens still awaiting justice.....

.... the NIST went ahead and ignored its own findings and

ALLOWED THE LIE --

THAT FIRE SOMEHOW CAUSED 200,000 TONS of STRUCTURAL STEEL

TO DISINTEGRATE IN SECONDS --

(11.11)

And that is the way this damnable game has gone. Repeatedly, every which way one looks, and ever since that day: the United States Government has lied about 9/11.

The question is therefore forced: Why?

Some people point to the Popular Mechanics issue which seeks to debunk the “poisonous claims” of the 9/11 truth movement. The cover story (now a book and soon a comic book) was put together by Benjamin Chertoff (who was installed in the job just before the attacks, and who, while we’re on the subject of lying, then tried to pretend he is not related to the CEO of the biggest new growth industry in America -- his cousin Michael, the Chairman of the Department of Homeland Security).

The issue takes a mighty swing at the growing tide of skepticism that is “sadly... seeping into mainstream America.” In the introduction to the magazine’s article, James Meigs (also installed just prior to 9/11), holds forth as follows:

...the American people have questioned why we were caught off guard and have demanded to know the whole story behind the events of that terrible day. But as a society we accept the basic premise that a group of Islamist terrorists hijacked four airplanes and turned them into weapons against us. Sadly, the noble search for truth is now being hijacked by a growing army of conspiracy theorists.

Right there, I began to suspect I was not gonna find answers in the pages of PM, since the single most offensive aspect of the entire 9/11 nightmare is the fact that our government has so obviously and willfully defaulted on its promise, as stated by our President (below with Michael Chertoff), to get to the bottom of the “whole story” -- the “noble search for truth” that even the condescending Meigs cites as the American people’s right to demand. (11.12)

Thousands and thousands of independent researchers all over the world have reordered their lives and spent money, time, and little chunks of their health in an effort to answer the questions our government hasn’t even bothered to ask.

Imagine a friend of Dick Cheney’s, a military guy perhaps, having a brewski with the veep after a tough week, and casually asking, “Dickster, my man, are you aware that no steel-framed building ever in the history of the world was brought down by fire -- except for that one on 9/11? And that second one on 9/11? And that... third one? If there wasn’t another angle to it -- how could that be possible?” (A question, by the way, that Popular Mechanics, preferring easier, wackier targets, does not touch.)

Mr. Meigs (left) brands the people who ask such questions “extremists” and accuses them of “disgracing the memories of the thousands who died that day.”

Before he utters another syllable about disgrace, Mr. Meigs needs to spend some serious, contemplative time looking at himself in a mirror.

Breaking the bottom.
Obliterating
everything else.

Floor detonations delayed at
75 milliseconds.
Core detonations delayed at 300 milliseconds.
Scenario of a free-fall speed pulverization, which was -- though profoundly effective as
"SHOCK AND AWE"
-- a mistake.

In a free-fall speed failure such as the one at right, the Laws of Physics require the controlled application of powerful, destructive energy to overcome the building's resistance to its own disintegration.
This energy must be powerful enough to eliminate the resistance of every floor BEFORE the floor above it arrives.

If ANY floor encounters
ANY resistance, failure cannot occur at the speed observed.

The 9/11 Commission did not even attempt to reconstruct the event -- except to say that it lasted "ten seconds" -- thereby avoiding its duty to define the source of the energy that caused it.

Not yet half-way down, and it is clear there will be no stack of "pancakes" at the bottom. Nor will any portion of the massive core be standing, though there was nothing above it but the middle of the roof. The smoke of the last basement explosions, however -- the ones that caused the building to begin to "moan," and hundreds of onlookers to begin running away from the area in sudden anticipation of the calamity to come -- is clearly visible rising from the street below.

Whereas such past tragedies as the Challenger Disaster, the sinking of the Titanic, and the surprise attack on Pearl Harbor generated government investigations that began within a week of the event, it took the Bush Administration 441 days to launch the 9/11 Commission, which it had vigorously fought to avoid.

That they finally allowed even the pretense of an investigation is a testament to the dogged insistence of a small group of 9/11 families who refused to take the offered financial recompense and call it a day. These people represent a class of Americans whose tragedy-forged sense of justice has moved them beyond the reach of hush money. You can get to know them -- a profound pleasure -- in the DVD: 9/11 Press for Truth. (11.13)

They are pressing for answers to the haunting questions that surround their loved ones' untimely deaths, and they have practically had to gang tackle the leaders of our government into making an effort to answer those questions.

Kristin Breitweiser, a registered Republican who voted for President Bush in 2000, was horrified to learn of the overwhelming number of sources that had provided government leaders with specific warnings about "planes as weapons" before 9/11, upon which our leaders did not act. Remarkably, no one even picked up a phone, though the predicted scenario was very obviously unfolding.

"My husband was in Tower II. If he knew that it was a terrorist attack, he wouldn't have stayed in the building."

The seriousness of the "effort" our elected officials finally came up with can be summed up by a single claim: According to the Commission's Final Report, the government's failure to pin down the identity of whoever put up the money that paid for 9/11 -- the most heinous crime ever committed against the United States -- was not important.....

In the commission's own words, the identity of the unknown financiers was
"of little practical significance....."

Call me crazy. I would think the identity of the people who put up that money might actually be quite significant. What we all know, though we never hear it said out loud, is that we were the victims of a vicious conspiracy that day, one that did not remain a theory. What we do not know -- and therefore still need to learn -- is who in hell was really behind it. Whoever paid for such monstrosity would seem -- to me -- to be a good place to start looking. Call me crazy.

But don't insult me.

On Condoleezza Rice's recommendation, the Bush administration brought in her erstwhile writing partner -- Philip Zelikow -- to oversee the findings of the 9/11 Commission. (11.14)

Dr. Zelikow's qualifying credentials?

He is acknowledged to be among the world's greatest experts in a process he has described as:

The Creation and Maintenance of Public Myths.

Excuse me.....

Is it possible to arrange some face time with this man? Alone in a room?

I'm an American. My life has been changed. My children will grow up in a world much more threatening than the one that existed the day before this happened. I'm paying very close attention now. And I'm damn sure gonna ask myself:

What are the odds that all of the amazingly unfortunate circumstances that had to come together on that fateful morning to create the complete lack of meaningful response demonstrated by those in our government sworn to protect us can actually have been coincidental?

Slim to none -- that's what those odds are.

My duty to my country, therefore, will not allow me to quit seeking some semblance of the truth, despite the fact that the only way to approach it at the beginning of what is proving to be a difficult journey -- is with a "theory."

Though it is a cold, sobering fact that it is impossible for those of us at this distance to solve the whole puzzle of what truly happened, it does not follow that we should therefore surrender to an explanation for it that we can easily understand to be riddled with lies. Morally, we are not allowed that luxury.

As they approached the fifth year of their catastrophic ordeal, Iraqi citizens were being slaughtered at the rate of 120 a day. At least six hundred thousand human beings have now died in Afghanistan and Iraq. (11.15) And there is no way yet to count those who will die in the coming years due to the seeds of rage such brutality has planted in the hope-killing psychic wounds of the bloodshed -- bloodshed which continues even as we read these words.

Thousands of young American men and women have come back home in coffins, and we rarely hear even a passing reference to the tens of thousands of Americans who've survived horrific events with horrific injuries to their brains (the majority of our wounded) from which there will never be a complete recovery. (11.16)

Countless more lives among the people who loved these people have been scarred forever because of what we, in America, were told was done to us on 9/11, and by whom.

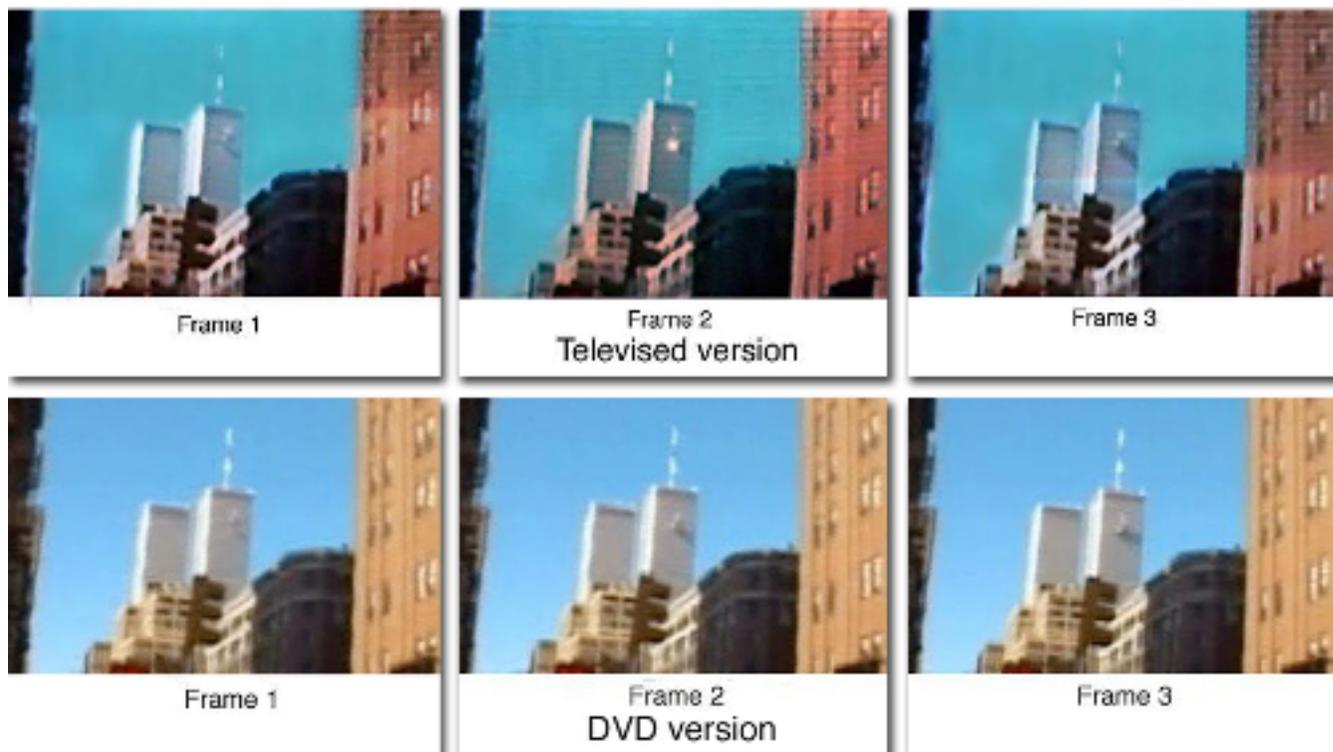

Whereas our leaders claimed they couldn't protect us from such sneaky Muslim fanatics as the ones who "got us," they were easily able to tell us -- almost instantly -- who the "evil-doers" were, and how they did it.

To an overwhelming degree -- almost all of us believed what we were told.

Myself included.

Yet from that day forward, those same leaders and their appointed "investigators" have presided over a campaign of lies, lawlessness and suppression that could not possibly have been necessary -- had they simply been telling us the truth.

In conclusion -- may we take one last pass at these most glaring nuggets of wonder....

At the instant the Second Plane (next page) touched the steel columns of the South Tower, a sharp, fiery flash was seen to emanate from the tip of its nose cone. Defenders of the Official Story have denied this, though the flash was recorded by many cameras.

When confronted by the images, official denials have turned into dismissals:
The flash must be a "reflection," or "static electricity."

And yet, a similarly bright explosion of energy occurred as the First Plane (above) touched the North Tower, as well. It was clearly observed in the Naudet Brothers' documentary footage of the attack which appeared on television throughout the world on September 12th. Interestingly, the frame which shows the flash (top row, center) was scrubbed to eliminate it by the time the film was released on DVD.

Why was the image altered?

Was it evidence of the presence of a nozzle? As might be attached to an airplane which had been converted into a re-fueling tanker, like the fleet of such planes reported to have been leased by PNAC member Dov Zakheim?

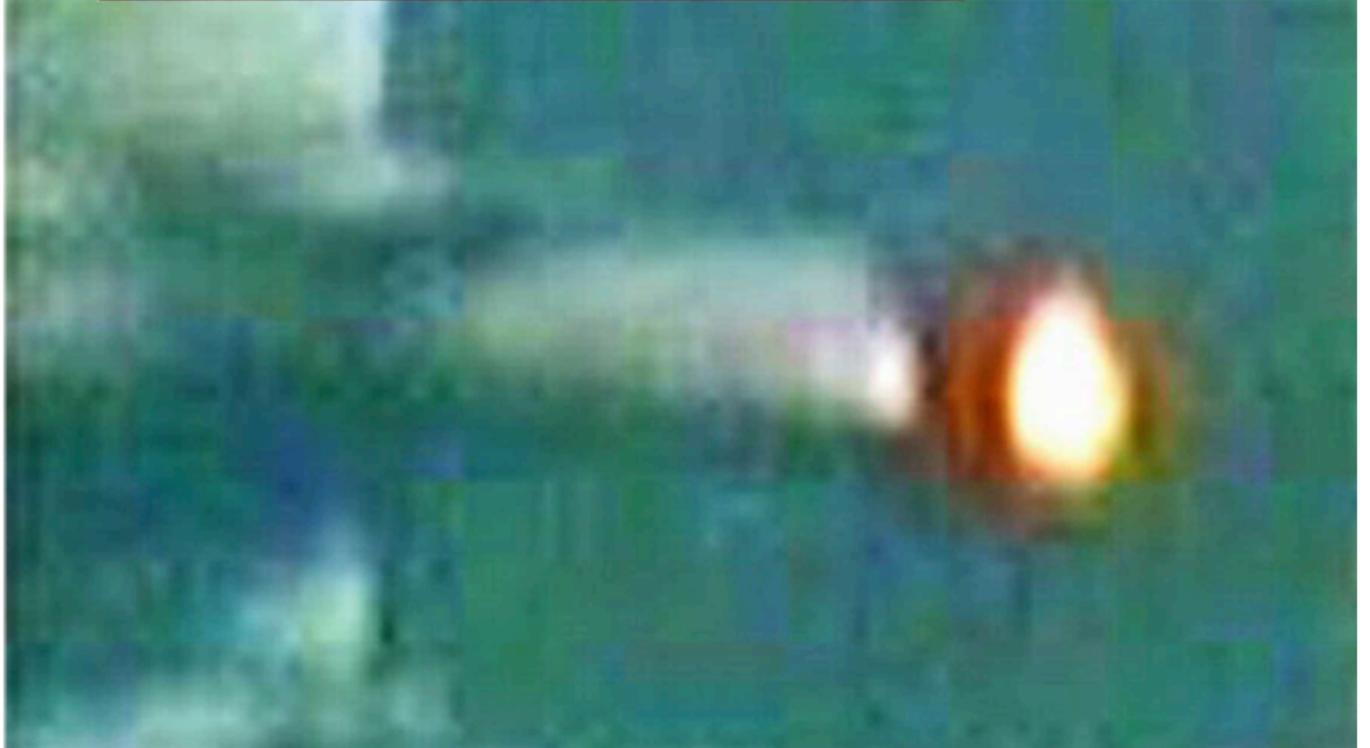

Or are these flashes related to those which emanated later from the helicopter seen hovering in the smoke above the South Tower in the DVD, 911 Eyewitness?

Flashes which were followed -- almost instantaneously -- by the disintegration of the building.

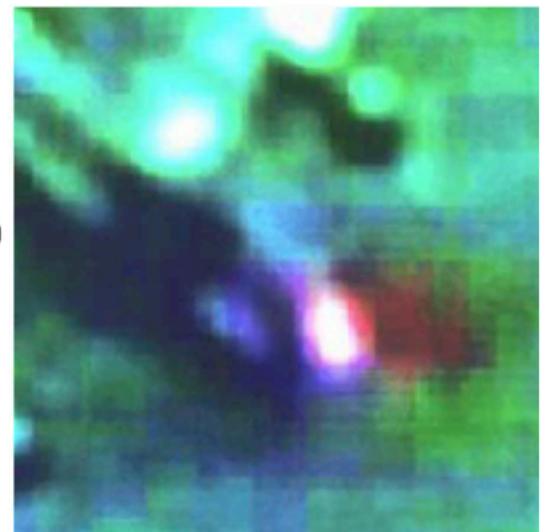

The Second Plane

By some observers -- familiar with physics and electromagnetic weapons -- this effect has been dubbed the 'Scalar Flash' or the 'Garage Door Opener,' in honor of the possibility that it is related to the airplane's capacity to seemingly melt (top left and right) into the building, rather than collide with it.

Defenders of the Official Story have instead held that there was no flash; just as there was no object attached to the bottom of the plane, an object which did not, therefore, cast its own shadow on the preceding page.

At 8:13 am on September 11, 2001, American Airlines Flight 11 was instructed by air traffic controllers to climb to 35,000 feet. The plane did not obey and its transponder was turned off, which immediately tagged it as a possible hijacking and should have triggered the scrambling of military jets. At 8:25 controllers were hearing "Don't try to make any stupid moves" from the cockpit, yet NORAD claims it was not notified until 8:40 that the plane had been hijacked. At 8:46 it crashed into the North Tower of the World Trade Center.

This fact and the fact that a second plane was now incommunicado, wildly off course and also heading for Manhattan, and that a third plane had abruptly turned around over Ohio and was flying back toward Washington, DC was now known to the FAA, NORAD, the National Military Command Center, the Pentagon, the White House, the Secret Service, Canada's Strategic Command, and the man pictured to the right: the Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces of the United States.

Though such an attack had been explicitly predicted – the Commander chose to stick to his previously scheduled "soft event:" a photo op to promote a reading initiative among second graders in a Sarasota, Florida classroom.

At 9:03 am, seventeen minutes after the onset of the most terrifying sequence of wounds ever inflicted upon the citizens of his country – in an attack that had been widely and urgently predicted – the Commander entered the classroom to sit among the children. Almost simultaneously, United Flight 175 slammed into the South Tower. Seconds later, the Commander's aide, Andrew Card, whispered in his ear that America was "under attack."

In the White House, Secret Service Agents were at this moment grabbing Dick Cheney by the belt and speeding him to "safety" in the basement bunker. Though the Commander, in Florida, was appearing live on local television, surrounded by innocents in a location that had been publicized steadily for four days – and though the classroom where he sat pondering the concept of "airplanes as weapons" was situated three and a half miles from an airport – he did nothing. Nor, in an unprecedented violation of sworn protocol, did the Secret Service Detail assigned to protect him.

The minutes ticked away, even as Americans in New York were choosing suicide over their continuing agony. Two more minutes of student recitation of "My Pet Goat" became five, then seven.

The press was dismissed, but the crisis could wait. The Commander lingered, chatting up the seven year olds, cracking wise and posing for photos. Even the conservative journalist Bill Sammon, who would later write a fawning piece on the President's "cool under fire," had to chide him at one point for behaving like the "Dawdler in Chief."

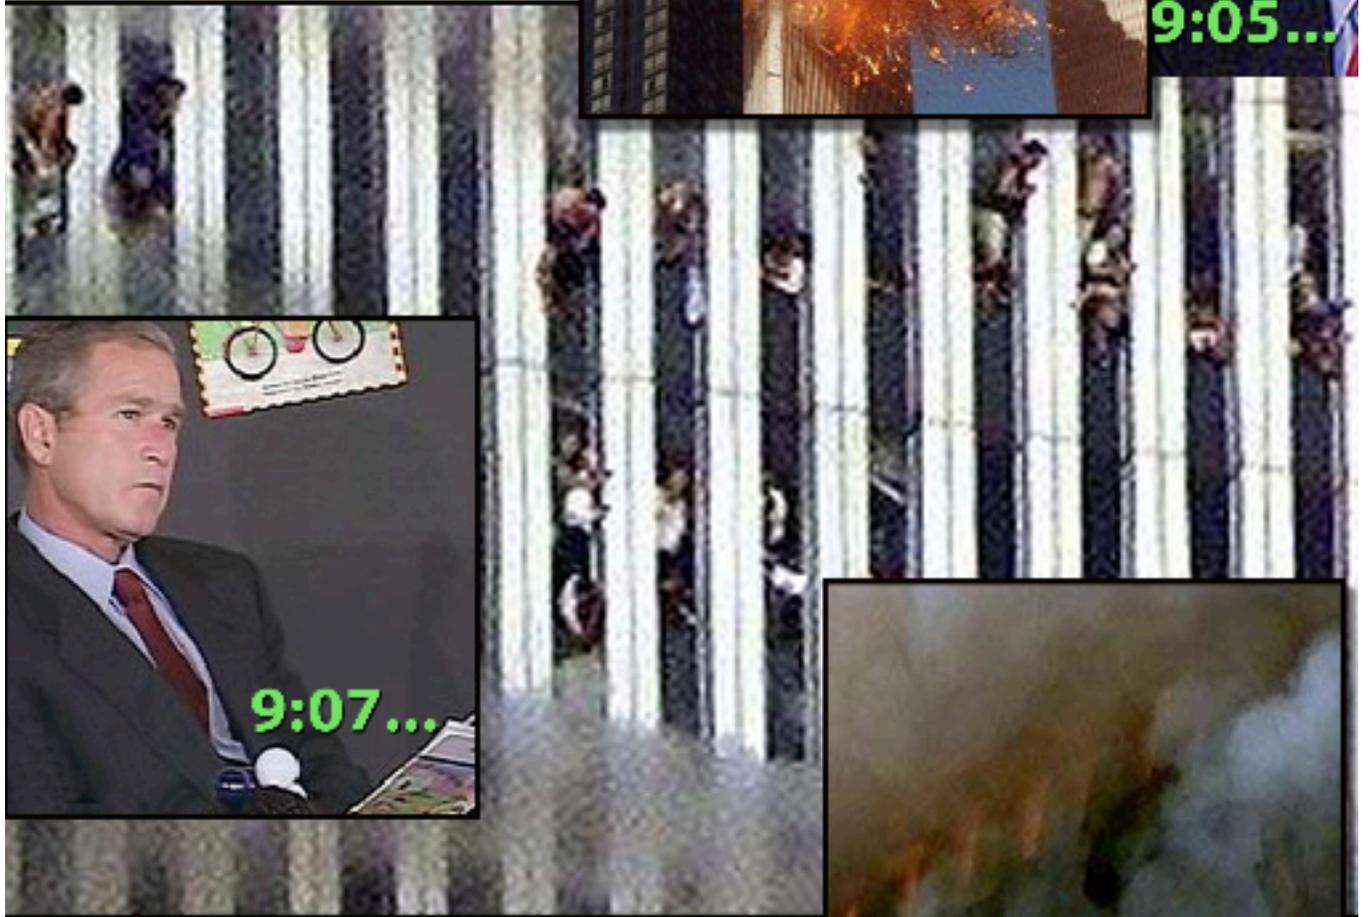

At 9:30, still seemingly oblivious to the mortal danger his continuing presence constituted for all those somber children gathered behind him, the Commander made a short speech from the school.

Then he made his way back to Air Force One, took off, and began to fly in circles for the next several hours, while Dick Cheney managed America's response to the Attack on Freedom. The story was floated that the Commander had to stay away from Washington because Air Force One was targeted. It was revealed as a lie within days – but no matter. The fact that no one had bothered to call for fighter jets to protect the Commander's plane was already more revealing of the truth. Military escorts finally showed up two and a half hours later.

In the weeks to come, the Commander and his aides would offer lie upon lie to take the stink off their recollections of this inexplicable behavior. Even the classroom teacher would chime in – claiming the President never heard the children's lesson because duty had claimed him. Andrew Card: "When he heard, he left within seconds." Two American reporters who were present wrote differently of the Commander's actions on the day. Both were fired.

But Sammon's book Fighting Back: The War on Terrorism, Michael Moore's film Fahrenheit 911 and Allen Woods & Paul Thompson's piece Bush on 9/11: An Interesting Day (http://www.williambowles.info/911/interesting_day.html) finally arrived to do that troublesome duty that liars hate so much. They revealed what had really happened – and what had not. Thus begging, one more time, the obvious, unasked question: Why?

At 8:13, the "Attack on America" began with the hijacking of an airplane – an act that had been repeatedly and explicitly predicted in reports from eleven countries which included the words "suicidal" and "multiple." At 8:46, the first Americans died.....

Seventeen minutes later, having been informed, and with the Secret Service standing by, the "Commander in Chief" sat down in a classroom full of seven year olds, three and a half miles from an airport..... and did not move.

The reasons for this, like so much about the tragedy, remain untold.

But these are among the things we know.....

- Ø Numerous high-ranking government authorities (George Bush, Dick Cheney, Condoleezza Rice, Richard Meyers, and Donald Rumsfeld among them) lied about their reasons for inaction (“we couldn’t imagine planes used as weapons”) though they’d been repeatedly and explicitly warned of exactly that. (12.1)
- Ø On the evening of 9/11 Bush stated to all of America:

"Immediately following the first attack, I implemented our government's emergency response plans. Our military is powerful, and it's prepared. Our emergency teams are working in New York City and Washington, D.C. to help with local rescue efforts." (12.2)
- Ø At a Town Hall Meeting in Orlando Florida on December 4, 2001, Bush stated:

"Actually I was in a classroom talking about a reading program that works. And I was sitting outside the classroom waiting to go in, and I saw an airplane hit the tower -- the TV was obviously on, and I used to fly myself, and I said, "There's one terrible pilot." And I said, "It must have been a horrible accident." But I was whisked off there -- I didn't have much time to think about it." (12.3)
- Ø Again at a town meeting in Ontario, California in January 2002, Bush:

"First of all, when we walked into the classroom, I had seen this plane fly into the first building. There was a TV set on. And you know, I thought it was pilot error and I was amazed that anybody could make such a terrible mistake. And something was wrong with the plane." (12.4)

These second and third statements make the first statement into a lie -- of course.

In which case the Presidential Lying had begun within hours of the Crimes.

But the video the President claims to have seen of the first plane’s attack did not -- of course -- appear on television until the following day. So unless he saw some Live Secret Service Video Feed of the 9/11 Operation in his Presidential Limo..... these second and third Bush statements about his actions were lies as well.
- Ø Authorities lied about standard air defense protocols, claiming intervention was not a process typically undertaken, attempting to suppress the simple fact that military jets had been scrambled and errant flights diverted 129 times in the year 2000 and 67 times in a nine month period prior to 9/11. (12.5)

- Ø They lied about being unable to locate the crucial, data-recording black boxes from the hijacked planes, even though the boxes are almost never irretrievable, and even though the workers in New York City who conducted the searches told reporters exactly where and when the boxes had been found. (12.6)
- Ø They destroyed audio and data tapes recorded by the air traffic controllers who handled the New York flights. (12.7)
- Ø They scrubbed the crime scenes even as they denied funds, access, manpower and time to investigators and attempted to dispose of the evidence before it could be analyzed forensically -- in direct contravention of federal law. (12.8)
- Ø They lied about the hideously toxic, asbestos, dioxin, benzene and glass laden sub-micronic dust infusing the rubble piles after the attacks, thus ensuring that the men and women who did the cleanup would face the early ruination of their health.

These men and women endured week after week of close exposure to the poisonous smoke emanating from the molten pools of steel, titanium, vanadium, lead and nickel (a metal not present in the buildings but an end product of fuel-oil combustion) that burned beneath all three towers for more than three months.

Though these fires suspended metals in the air at levels never before recorded in the United States, the Bush Administration convinced the EPA to officially declare that the air was “safe” to breathe. Authorities followed up this reckless and deceitful manipulation of thousands of grieving, generous Americans by turning a deaf ear to the pleas for assistance of the earliest victims among them -- as their failing health led to the loss of their jobs and then their medical insurance.

Though these first responders have now fallen prey to a full-blown epidemic of life-threatening respiratory illness and early-onset cancers -- and have now begun to die in otherwise inexplicably high numbers -- no one -- even to this day -- has been held accountable for the vicious, murderous lie embedded in this largely unexamined chapter of the 9/11 crime. (12.9)

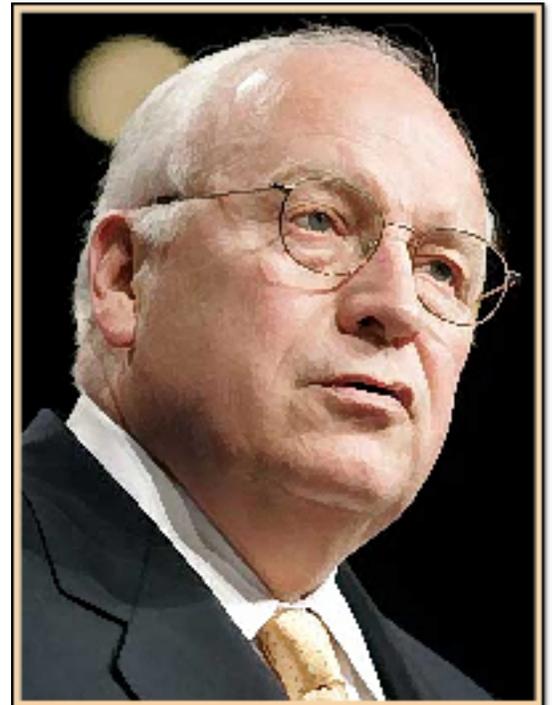

- Ø Authorities quietly disposed of the US government stocks of the same strain of Anthrax that was sent by the “terrorists” to the Democratic Senator who questioned the wisdom of adopting the Patriot Act without even reading it, and then to the Democratic Senator who publicly demanded that Attorney General Ashcroft stop ignoring a constitutionally mandated inquiry of the Senate Judiciary Committee, and then to the journalists who used the word ‘demolition’ in their reporting of the catastrophic failures of the three towers in New York. (12.10)

- Ø They lied about the melting point of steel and dispersed patently false and misleading information about the true design of the towers in an attempt to sell a second brazen lie about the 'Infernos of Fire' that supposedly overcame the most basic laws of physics -- for the first, second and third time in all of world history -- on the same day. (12.11)

They were very much aided in this process by the fact that many human beings chose to jump to their deaths to escape the torture of the smoke and flames that morning, bowing to the fact that temperatures which are utterly insignificant to the integrity of steel -- 200° C for instance -- are utterly devastating to a human being.

- Ø They withheld access to the Construction Blueprints of the Twin Towers from each of the officially sanctioned 9/11 "investigations." (12.12)
- Ø They fought in court for three and a half years to suppress the release of the Oral Histories of the first responders, hundreds of whom had described repeated "explosions" in the towers. (12.13)
- Ø They fought in court to suppress release of the audio tapes of the Fire Chief who reached the 76th Floor of the South Tower and reported the presence of "two small pockets of fire," seven minutes before his violent death. (12.14)

- Ø They suppressed public knowledge of the six separate 9/11 War Games which were being conducted under the coordination of Dick Cheney at the time of the attacks, games which had caused US Military Aircraft to vacate their standard assignments around New York and Washington; and games which had brought a small army of government operatives to gather on the West Side of Manhattan on the night before 9/11 to prepare for a "simulated catastrophe;" and games which included a "simulated domestic air crisis" involving a hijacked plane being flown into the National Reconnaissance Office -- America's spy satellite coordinating "eyes in the sky" -- which caused that agency's personnel to begin evacuating the building three minutes prior to the attack on the Second Tower and to be sent home without ever laying eyes on the satellite photos of the critical day -- photos which were classified the following morning; and games which caused numerous false radar blips of "simulated multiple hijackings" to be inserted into NORAD radar screens and therefore contributed greatly to the sense of confusion that hampered the efforts of many decent public servants to do their jobs as the real hijackings and attacks unfolded over the course of one hour and fifty minutes of utterly complete official non-intervention. (12.15)

- Ø This official non-intervention began with the very first act of aggression. As neither the first, nor the second, nor the third, nor the fourth pilot of the doomed 9/11 flights keyed the code for 'hijack' into his transponder. Each of these highly accomplished professionals was trained to do so at the first hint of a hijacking -- yet not a single one of them did.

Commander Ted Muga, who piloted Grumman Jets for the US Navy and Boeing 727s for Pan-Am, comments: "There's a very, very simple code that you put in if you suspect that your plane is being hijacked. It takes literally just a split-second for you to put your hand down on the center console and flip it over. And not one of the four planes ever transponded a hijack code, which is most, most unusual."

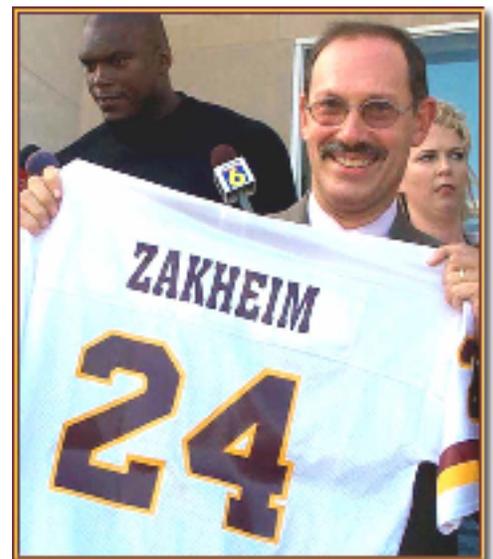

What to make of this? Pilots and aeronautical engineers familiar with the process have pointed out that when failure to perform such a crucial action is so perfectly replicated -- the action was most likely not possible. (12.16)

- Ø At a press conference in late summer 2001, Donald Rumsfeld stood before the national media and said that more than $2,000,000,000,000 in Pentagon funds could not be accounted for. "By some estimates," he gravely intoned, "we cannot track 2.3 trillion dollars in transactions." The Comptroller of the Pentagon at the time was a friend of both Rumsfeld and Bush by the name of Dov Zakheim.

If we have difficulty recalling the national outrage that accompanied this admission -- given that such a mountain of missing money breaks down to $8,000 in evaporated income taxes for every man, woman and child in America -- perhaps it's because of the way it was timed. Coincidentally -- the announcement was made on September 10, 2001.

Mr. Zakheim, it turns out, is connected to the 9/11 Storyline in even more interesting ways. As his Pentagon stint began, for example, he was serving as the CEO of System Planning Services International, a high-technology research, analysis, and manufacturing firm. In May of 2001 -- four months before the attacks -- a subsidiary of Zakheim's firm oversaw a belated investigation of the first "terrorist" attack on the World Trade Center in 1993.

Zakheim borrows Champ Bailey's number as the Washington Redskins raise funds for 9/11 survivors

This "look back" included extended scrutiny of the security system and structural blueprints of the WTC. Securacom, the WTC's Kuwaiti-American security company, shared this data with Zakheim's group pre-9/11, but was curiously compelled to withhold it from investigators after the tragedy. Securacom was run, coincidentally -- by Bush's cousin Wirt Walker and employed his brother Marvin.

Meanwhile, Mr. Zakheim's own company, System Planning Services, was busily promoting its prize product -- an indispensable bit of "War Games" enhancing military magic called the Flight Termination System:

"System Planning Corporation is proud to offer the Flight Termination System (FTS), a fully redundant turnkey range safety and test system for remote control and flight termination of airborne test vehicles [airplanes].....

Because many installations require several remote CTS [Command Transmitter System] units that can be controlled from either the remote site or a centralized site, the FTS has been developed to control a fully redundant automated network of transmitters. The system can be configured to operate as a single local site or with up to eight remote sights over an extended range. Each CTS unit may be controlled locally (manually), or as part of the larger FTS system. The fully redundant central control unit also supports either manual or automated modes of operation."

According to the firm's website, the Flight Termination System, in conjunction with its Command Transmitter System, can actually control up to eight aircraft at the same time. And best of all, this unprecedentedly powerful system of Remote Control allows the tech-savvy "good guys" who possess it to literally "hijack the hijackers" in case of a national emergency like the one we endured on 9/11.

One potential drawback -- the pilot of a plane suddenly Remotely Controlled in this fashion would not be able to broadcast the hijack code from his transponder.

Though his flight would proceed with remarkable precision -- his transponder, like every other electronic system in his aircraft, would no longer be under his control.

His 'black box' flight data recorders might also prove less than critical to recover -- should the aircraft crash. These recorders, which commit data in a recurring loop, would begin recording nothing from the instant of remote intervention.

Since leaving his post at the Pentagon, Mr. Zakheim has gone on to a lucrative position at the prestigious strategy consulting firm of Booz, Allen & Hamilton. Booz Hamilton -- coincidentally, of course -- is connected to both the notorious Terrorist-financed, US Government Agency Favored Software Company Ptech [to be referenced several pages hence], and the charitable foundation Blessed Relief -- widely described in intelligence circles as a front for Usama bin Laden.

And Mr. Zakheim -- like Cheney and Rumsfeld and Libby and Wolfowitz and Quayle and Perle and Jeb and Bolton and Abrams, Armitage, Khalizad et al -- is also a veteran of the organization which declared, a year before it happened, the necessity of a "New Pearl Harbor" to quickly realize "America's" Imperial Goals.

He is, in other words, yet another of the Bush Administration's Bevy of 9/11 Empowered Neo-Con Players who was also a member of PNAC. (12.17)

- Ø Authorities claimed that the remarkably high velocity of impact and remarkably intense fire that characterized the attack on the Pentagon caused the body of the 200,000 pound Boeing 757 supposedly involved to “vaporize” in the immediate aftermath; yet claimed they were somehow able -- through the amazing survival of the infinitely more fragile, flesh and blood dependent remains of human DNA -- to identify almost every single one of the 189 victims who died at the scene.

Neither Donald Rumsfeld’s statement six weeks later that it was a “missile” which hit the building, nor the possibility that the 9/12 burying of the Pentagon lawn under sand might have been necessitated by a problematic lack of any evidence of damage to the grass has been addressed. Such damage might have been expected given the low angle of attack (light poles knocked down a mile away) and the wild thrust of the two 9,000 pound, redlining jet engines which every Boeing 757 heretofore observed carries suspended from its wings some twenty feet below the nose of its cockpit. A cockpit which supposedly, in this case, penetrated the ground floor of the building. (12.18)

- Ø They suppressed public knowledge of the troubling contradictions surrounding the Heroic “Let’s Roll” Legend of United Flight 93, including the fact that the flight -- which did not actually appear on United Airlines’ flight schedule for 9/11 -- was reported (and confirmed on the day by the airline) to have landed and been evacuated on the tarmac in Cleveland due to a bomb scare, even as the airport itself was being evacuated of all civilians (who were forbidden to use their cars to leave).

The Mayor of Shanksville (among the first on the scene of the purported crash site) later remarked on camera that “there was no plane.” The local coroner later called it “eerie” that he had “not, to this day, seen a single drop of blood -- not a drop.” And rather than nose-dive to earth as the passengers struggled valiantly to gain control, whatever aircraft was truly being chased in the sky that day by a “white military-looking jet” -- as reported by numerous eyewitnesses -- left a debris field that stretched over eight miles of Pennsylvania farmland.

Since it formed the inspiring centerpiece of the repeatedly told story of the heroism of common Americans on the day, it’s understandable why this particular detail remains carefully unmentioned in the official mythology: That the courageous, heartbreaking cell phone calls from the doomed passengers -- several of whose private numbers reportedly showed up on their loved ones “Caller IDs” and/or were described as having originated from locked toilet stalls in the back of the plane -- could not possibly have been made from a commercial airliner at thirty-five thousand feet on 9/11. The technology to complete such calls did not yet exist.

Extensive tests by researcher A.K. Dewdney confirmed this fact, as have members of the telecom industry. In July of 2004, Qualcomm would proudly announce that American Airlines had finally conducted a trial run on a modified aircraft which permitted such calls, and that “travelers could be talking on their personal cellphones as early as 2006.”

Mastery of real-time human voice-cloning technology, however, had been demonstrated to both Colin Powell and General Carl Steiner by psyops military scientists at the Los Alamos National Laboratory more than two and a half years before 9/11.

And most interestingly, according to easily replicable research by Wing TV's Vincent Sammartino -- when the 45 names listed as passengers on the tragic flight are punched into the Social Security Death Index -- only six turn up as belonging to people actually reported to have died.

This death-defying rupture in the scripted historical myth of the "flight of heroes" is perhaps mirrored by the airplane itself (tail number N5IUA) -- which was spotted by United Airlines' employee David Friedman on April 10, 2003 at Chicago's O'Hare Airport. In 2006, the plane was listed as still valid with the FAA.

To understand these anomalies, it's useful to take a look at Operation Northwoods. Northwoods was the plan pushed on John Kennedy by the Joint Chiefs of Staff in 1962 whereby the CIA would create a fictitious list of passengers and "kill them" by shooting down a drone plane painted and numbered as an exact replica of an actual registered airplane. The objective was to justify a US invasion of Cuba. Some believe that Kennedy's rejection of this plan cost him dearly. (12.19)

- Ø Authorities suppressed public knowledge of the high-level obstruction of FBI investigations into the purported hijackers' activities prior to 9/11. (12.20)
- Ø They lied about the much wider than reported extent of the insider stock trading that preceded the attacks and peaked -- from within the towers -- during them. (12.21)
- Ø They lied about their stunning lack of interest in vigorously investigating these trading anomalies, as if knowing the identities of the persons whose pre-knowledge of the attacks brought them profit was unimportant.

One high-ranking FBI official, brazenly ignoring the overwhelming flood of evidence -- which triggered investigations to be launched by over a dozen nations and at least eight US government agencies, exchanges and commissions into globally distributed illicit profits estimated by knowledgeable analysts to have totaled in the "billions of dollars" -- had the gall to declare that there were "no flags or indicators" of insider trading. This officially sanctioned, bald-faced lie was widely disseminated in the US press as a prelude to its subsequent silence on these most damning and brutally callous of greed crimes. (12.22)

- Ø They refused to acknowledge Pakistan's obvious complicity in the attacks, and conducted a stifling campaign of disinformation -- aimed at mainstream journalists, and by extension, the American people -- to keep any meaningful examination of the decades long connection between the CIA and the ISI out of the public consciousness. (12.23)

- Ø They lied about their efforts and numerous opportunities to catch or kill Usama bin Laden, and actively suppressed public knowledge of the actual details of the United States government's recent, long-standing and repeatedly cooperative relationship with Al-Qaeda. (12.24)
- Ø Colin Powell promised a "White Paper" from the State Department to establish Al-Qaeda's authorship of the attacks. He never produced it, nor did anyone else. (12.25)
- Ø George Bush promised, within hours of the attacks, that the "full resources of the federal government" would be brought to bear in an effort to get to the truth.

After which, he presided instead over his administration's prodigious efforts to fight the formation of an investigative body, until, defeated in this effort -- he compensated by underfunding it and obstructing its efforts at every turn.

The White House stacked the panel with Washington insiders whose resumés were littered with conflicts of interest; tried to set up (Saudi Enforcer) Henry Kissinger as Chairman; opposed the Commission's request for adequate funding and adequate time to cover even the appearance of legitimate service to its appointed task; directed Presidential Chief Counsel Alberto Gonzalez to make last minute phone calls seeking to undermine the pending testimony of Richard Clarke; lied outright that Condoleezza Rice should be shielded from appearing due to the "long standing principal that sitting national security advisors do not testify before Congress," though no less than five such advisors had done exactly that in far less important circumstances; severely limited the panel's access to the "Presidential Daily Briefs" which preceded the attacks -- allowing only four commissioners to look at 24 of the 360 documents they had requested, and then refusing to allow these commissioners to retain possession of their own notes on these documents.

And finally, the White House -- in an arrangement surely made mandatory by the bizarre differences between the President's behavior in Florida on the day, and that of his Vice-President in Washington -- insisted that Mr. Bush and Mr. Cheney would speak to the panel only on the conditions that neither be sworn; no recording be made of their recollections of their actions; and that neither would speak a word without the other by his side. (12.26)

- Ø The 9/11 Commission responded to these affronts by rolling over and playing deaf, dumb and blind. Various government officials representing the US military, NORAD and the FAA came before it to tell conflicting, contradictory versions of their respective actions and responses during the crisis -- contradictory stories that by definition had to include lies. The once respected values of truth and justice -- even the pursuit of useful information -- were simply trampled, as the lies and liars were left unchallenged. The commission thanked everyone instead and reassured a "War on Terror" focused nation that "It was not our intention to assign blame."

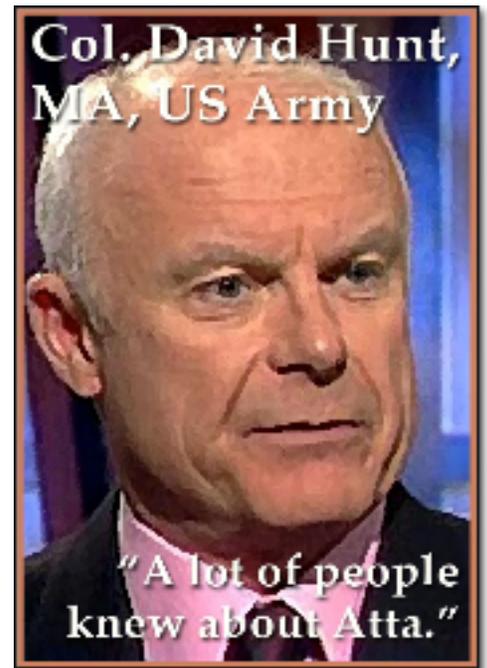

The panel's final report devoted exactly one paragraph of its hundreds and hundreds of pages of rhetoric to the single most crucial event of the entire experience: the cause of the mass murders in New York.

The Commissioners refused to call the many eyewitnesses who contacted them about the need to investigate the explosions they had survived in the twin towers, nor to address the overwhelmingly plentiful reports and the mass of visual and audio evidence of these explosions. Though William Rodriguez -- publicly acknowledged as a hero -- finally forced them to interview him, they included not a single word of his testimony anywhere in their report. (12.27)

- Ø The 9/11 Commission dealt with the unexplained, 6.5 second implosive failure of the 47-story World Trade Center Building 7 -- whose group of tenants constituted one of the most powerful blocks of governmental regulatory clout ever gathered in one massive stack -- as if it had never happened. Not one word was offered to explain -- much less even acknowledge the occurrence of -- this profoundly incriminating event. (12.28)
- Ø An obviously newsworthy roster of prominent officials have gone on record to express their doubts about the veracity of the Official 9/11 Story. Included among them are many professional pilots, members of the US Congress, current and retired high-ranking officers of the US government, the US intelligence services, and the US military, the three leading third-party candidates for President in the 2004 election, a member of the 9/11 Commission who resigned in protest, a former high-ranking adviser to the George W. Bush administration, former high-ranking ministers to the Italian, German, British and Canadian governments -- notably including intelligence officials, the Commander-in-Chief of the Russian Air Force, 100 luminaries who signed the "9/11 Truth Statement," and the Presidents and Prime Ministers, past and present, of many of the world's nations. Though all have raised questions about one or more aspects of the Official Legend and the massive evidence of cover-up which has followed in its wake -- their questions have been studiously ignored. (12.29)

- Ø Scott Shuger of Salon.com, the very first journalist to raise questions about the obvious lies embedded somewhere in the conflicting reports of NORAD's inability to respond -- was found dead in a scuba diving accident not long after. (12.30)
- Ø Richard Siegel, an internet television producer who shot footage of the towers from across the Hudson River throughout the ordeal, was visited in his offices by the FBI, which summarily confiscated all of his computers. Siegel's simple but haunting work, however, has survived, as has his courage. His "9/11 Eyewitness" DVD is clear, irrefutable audio and video evidence of the repeated, massive explosions that wracked the buildings throughout their death throes. (12.31)
- Ø Michael Ruppert, the ex-LAPD detective who wrote the brave and brilliant book "Crossing the Rubicon," in which he makes a case for the indictment of Dick Cheney as complicit in the attacks, had his home and business offices ransacked, his computers ripped from their connections, piled in the center of a room and sledge-hammered into oblivion. (12.32)
- Ø Professor Steven Jones, whose White Paper "Why Indeed Did the WTC Towers Completely Collapse?" is as thoroughly non-accusatory as it is devastating to the Official Legend, drew the personal intervention of President Bush. Bush went to Utah, met with the Head of the Mormon Church, and censured BYU for having allowed one of its professors to employ science toward uncovering truth. Seven days later Jones was removed from his classes, and his paper withdrawn. (12.33)

Professor Jones' work has been distributed throughout the world, however, and can be accessed at:

His paper, "Why Indeed Did the WTC Buildings Completely Collapse?" is included in its entirety in Appendix H of this piece, and resides on the web at:

- Ø Indira Singh, a high level IT executive with JP Morgan Chase, survived 9/11 because she was late reporting for work in the company's offices on the 106th floor of the WTC. As fate would have it, it was Indira, early the following year, looking for outside help to instigate a very sensitive company-wide software upgrade, who would stumble on an amazingly well-funded and well-connected firm which wanted the job very badly.

Though small, this firm -- Ptech -- boasted a roster of clients which included the White House, the US Secret Service, the CIA, FBI, IRS, both houses of Congress, the US Air Force, Navy, and Department of Energy, IBM, Enron and Booz Allen & Hamilton (Dov Zakheim's future home). Obviously -- these Ptech guys were the go-to guys. Imagine Indira's chagrin, then, when the firm's chief scientist showed up in her office and suggested she immediately dump JP Morgan Chase's internal data onto his laptop so they could develop the new custom software on the spot -- an aggressive bit of weirdness that instantly stalled the deal.

Then imagine Indira's deepening chagrin as her subsequent investigation into the history of Ptech revealed that its chief early investor was Saudi terrorist financier Yasin Al Qadi (who is said to enjoy "cordial relations" with Dick Cheney); and that the FBI had been looking for many suddenly scarce Ptech employees immediately after 9/11. It seems that by 2001 -- "Care International" (notorious in intelligence circles as the Muslim "charity organization" at the center of the 1993 World Trade Center bombing) -- was being run out of Ptech.

In a previous incarnation, "Care International" was part of Maktab al-Khidamat (MAK), the accounting mechanism put in place by the CIA in 1988 to pass its illicit Iran-Contra BCCI money through to the Pakistani ISI -- and on to Usama bin Laden.

Indira went to FBI headquarters, told them what she'd learned and asked them to open an investigation. They demurred. When she insisted that the agent she spoke to should take it to his superiors -- he told her he'd already tried that: Ptech was not to be touched. Indira went to her own boss, seeking counsel. He responded by demanding she reveal her sources, and told her that the people who had educated her about Ptech "should be killed."

From that point forward, her own company's attitude toward Indira was that she should "shut up and stay in [her] place." She says her boss told her that if she could do that, she would have a long and prosperous career at JP Morgan Chase.

Indira no longer works there. (12.34)

- Ø Coleen Rowley was once the chief counsel in the Minneapolis office of the FBI. It was in that capacity in 2001 that she struggled to overcome the agency's high-level deceit in the case of Zacarias Moussaoui -- the so-called "twentieth hijacker." Rowley's office had been alerted to Moussaoui's dangerous nature thanks to a tip from a local flight school. His instructors had reported that the French Moroccan student was dutifully taking lessons on a simulator that would enable him to pilot a commercial airliner, but was refusing to learn to land it.

Local agents investigated and detained Moussaoui on an immigration violation. They were soon told of his public comments that it was okay to kill anyone who had harmed Muslims, and that he approved of Muslims who died as 'martyrs' in such attacks. When the agents asked to examine the contents of his computer, his response signaled that he had information he needed to hide. They immediately notified FBI headquarters in Washington of their discovery of this "TERRORIST IN WAITING" and petitioned for a FISA warrant to examine his stored data.

Though intelligence had been pouring in from around the world that a Jihadist attack involving airplanes was well beyond the planning stages -- intelligence which included an urgent FBI memo just three weeks earlier from the Phoenix office that Usama bin Laden's "foot soldiers" were now known to be training in American flight schools -- FBI headquarters refused to provide the warrant.

The Minneapolis office -- suddenly frantic for help -- contacted officials in French Intelligence in hopes of bolstering their case. Jackpot! They were told that Zacarias Moussaoui was associated with French Jihadists connected to Usama bin Laden. Now drowning in probable cause -- Minneapolis contacted FBI headquarters again. The agent at the center of the obstruction -- head of the Radical Fundamentalist Unit, SSA David Frasca -- refused once more to let them look at Moussaoui's computer, hanging his objection this time on the pathetic observation that there "might be more than one" Zacarias Moussaoui in France! Rowley and her colleagues were dumbfounded. They tried to go around Frasca -- directly to the CIA's Counter Terrorist Center. Frasca chastised and threatened them even as he re-wrote their requests for a warrant -- eliminating, in the process, all references to French knowledge of Moussaoui's bin Laden ties.

And finally, on the morning of September 11th, with the attacks in full swing and a desperate Rowley petitioning still for a look at Moussaoui's hard drive -- Frasca, on the phone from Washington, insisted that it might yet all be a "coincidence," and admonished her to "do nothing." Within days, FBI Director Robert Mueller began holding forth with such remarkable comments as, "There were no warning signs..." and "The fact that there were a number of individuals that happened to have received training at flight schools here is news, quite obviously..."

In May of 2002, Coleen Rowley wrote a memo to Mueller which very respectfully contrasted the active obstruction outlined above to the "if only we'd known" nature of his comments. She invoked the word "integrity." Shortly thereafter, she was demoted, and eventually left the agency. Dave Frasca got a raise. (12.35)

Ø Lt. Col. Anthony Shaffer is the distinguished, CIA trained senior intelligence officer and Bronze Star Medal recipient whose 22 year career as a cutting edge operative has seen him thrive in some of the highest risk operations ever undertaken by the United States. He was a key player in the Special Operations Command program known as Able Danger, a domestic surveillance operation which had uncovered two of the three "terrorist cells" which would be blamed for 9/11 -- a full year before the attacks. Mohammad Atta was shadowed by this program on thirteen separate occasions. Early in 2001, the Director of Operations for the (Pentagon commanded) Defense Intelligence Agency called Shaffer in for a meeting, and requested that he recite the details of the notably successful and ongoing operation. After which, the Director -- a two-star general -- told Shaffer that he wanted him and his unit to abandon the surveillance program. Over Shaffer's repeated objections: "Sir, this is important... Sir, if not us, then who?" -- the General told him that such concerns were none of his business and insisted that he drop his efforts on behalf of Able Danger.

Four years later, on the eve of Shaffer's congressional testimony about the history of Able Danger and this bizarre intervention against it in the months leading up to 9/11, his security clearance was yanked by the US military, instantly ending his career. Republican Congressman Curt Weldon intervened on Shaffer's behalf -- first in the House of Representatives and then to Lou Dobbs on CNN -- accusing the government in very blunt language of attempting to smear the good name of a great patriot. To no avail. Former FBI director Louis Freeh would later agree with Shaffer and Weldon that Able Danger was the kind of "tactical intelligence" that could well have made the difference in advance of 9/11. Why was it curtailed? Weldon: "The buck stops with Rumsfeld." Of course. (Is it necessary to re-state at this point that everywhere one looks in the brutal soup of 9/11 facilitation, one's eyes are assaulted by the bobbing head of yet another member of PNAC?) (12.36)

Ø Love of her adopted country led Sibel Edmonds to become a translator for the FBI following 9/11. She happily embraced the work, which involved the surveillance and translation of telephone calls conducted in foreign languages. But things began to change when a new colleague by the name of Melek Dickerson arrived and immediately began pressuring Sibel to join the American-Turkish Council (ATC), an organization which Sibel -- and Ms. Dickerson -- both knew was a target of FBI wiretaps. Sibel declined. Soon Ms. Dickerson, the new colleague, had conspired with their supervisor to ensure that she alone would audit all monitored communications within the group and judge their value and meaning. Several weeks later an FBI official came to Sibel with concerns that the new colleague's reports on many counterintelligence targets at ATC were following a pattern: Conversations -- even lengthy ones -- were dismissed as "not pertinent" or summarized, absent any detail, as containing "nothing of interest." The official asked Sibel to retrieve the calls from the archives and do her own translations of them.

Dickerson, it would later be learned, had neglected to mention on her FBI work application that she had actually spent two years working at the ATC -- the FBI-targeted organization for which she now controlled the FBI's investigation. Among the "people of interest" at the organization were close personal friends of hers. Perhaps this explains why calls she'd marked "nothing of interest" contained such non-pedestrian subject matter as "dead drops" of "money in exchange for secrets." Dickerson had buried such tidbits as: instructions from a Turkish official to a US State Department staffer on where he should report to pick up $7,000 in cash; payments to a Pentagon official who seemed to be involved in weapons-procurement negotiations; and suggestions that Turkish groups had been sponsoring doctoral students at US research institutions in order to acquire information about black market nuclear weapons. Much of what Sibel heard on the "not pertinent" recordings concerned old-fashioned crime: There was talk, she would later tell investigators, of laundering the profits of big money narcotics transactions and of selling classified military technologies to the highest bidder.

When Sibel blew the whistle on the suppression of this information, she was quickly encouraged by certain superiors to "re-think" her observations. The man who had asked her to investigate in the first place suddenly turned into a puff of smoke -- explaining that his own superiors had instructed him not to touch the case, calling it a "can of worms." He complied. Sibel did not. She was threatened. Then she was fired.

Before Edmonds left, Dickerson sought to stop her with a fear bomb. According to Edmonds, she asked some very pointed questions: "Why are you doing this, Sibel? Why don't you just drop it? You know there could be serious consequences. Why put your family in Turkey in danger over this?"

Outraged, Sibel sued, and went to congress. Attorney General John Ashcroft, in response, tried to wipe out her legal action by invoking the State Secrets Privilege. This recourse, which is derived from English common law, has never been the subject of any congressional vote or statute. Such privilege is invoked (rarely) when the government wants to resist the legal "discovery" in court of a specific piece of evidence that it claims might harm national security if publicized. But in Edmonds' case Ashcroft argued that the very subject of her lawsuit was a state secret. That even to air her claims in front of federal judges must remain forbidden.

Later, in 2004, an outside law firm sought to depose Sibel for a pending case on behalf of the families of 9/11 victims. Again, immediately, Ashcroft asserted the privilege. The law firm submitted a list of questions it wanted to ask Edmonds, almost all of which were prohibited. Among them: "When and where were you born?," "What languages do you speak?," and "Where did you go to school?"

In the observation of Sibel's attorney, such absurdity begs yet another question:

What in the world is the government trying to hide?

Meanwhile, Sibel's sister in Turkey was fortunate to not be at her home when the police arrived at her front door. They left a notice commanding her to appear at police headquarters to be interrogated regarding an "intelligence matter" -- or face arrest. Knowing that Turkey -- a longtime "friend" of the US -- routinely brings torture to bear in such interrogations, and that it is not uncommon for detainees to fail to return from them, Sibel's sister dropped her life and fled instead.

Though Sibel is forbidden by the State Secrets Privilege to even discuss the details of her ordeal, there are many people familiar with it who have rallied to her support and spoken in her place. And Sibel herself has been instrumental in forming an organization for the empowerment and protection of truth tellers, recently drawing members from the FBI, CIA, National Security Agency, Department of Homeland Security and other agencies to gather in Washington, where they briefed staffers from the House and Senate about the punishments they've faced. Their crimes? They have revealed the truth about the appalling government misconduct they've witnessed, which each of their original employment contracts bound them legally -- and ethically -- to do.

At a press conference after the briefings, Congressman Edward Markey, Democrat of Massachusetts, praised Edmonds and her colleagues as "national heroes," pledging that he would introduce a bill to make it a crime for any agency manager to retaliate against such individuals. "When they took on Sibel," says Mike German, who is now the coalition's congressional liaison, "they made the wrong woman mad."

When Sibel was eleven, Iranian fundamentalists had tried to arrest her for wearing an "immodest" head scarf. Her father, a surgeon who had saved the lives of many Iranian soldiers during the bloody war with Iraq, told the thugs that if they bothered his daughter, he would retaliate by making sure that the next soldier to appear on his operating table with an injured wrist would have his "arm cut off at the shoulder." The thugs shrank.

Her father's stance made a lasting impression on his daughter: "The day the Iranians tried to arrest me, my father told me, 'Sibel, you only live your life once. How do you choose to live? According to your principles, or in fear?'"

I have never forgotten those words." (12.37)

- Ø And finally -- during and after all of the preceding -- and in fulfillment of the Next Stage of the PNAC Manifesto (the stage after the "New Pearl Harbor"), the Bush Administration -- with its every prominent member spewing the same fear-drenched buzzwords, updated weekly and driven home relentlessly -- lied and lied and lied again: "Saddam and the WMD! The Anthrax! The Yellow Cake Uranium! Yipes! The yada yada yada sis boom bang -- MUSHROOM CLOUD!"

Until inevitably -- the very idea of reasoned inquiry was shouted down in a storm of "Save us daddy! We'll do anything!"

Excellent. Stand back and watch -- better yet, don't -- as we blast and bulldoze our way into the epic and deadly quagmire of ancient Mesopotamia one more time, where innocent people have now been killed and maimed by the hundreds of thousands, and from which the unprecedented international rage against American aggression will surely make its vengeful mark on our future.

But from which the original PNAC Business Model -- otherwise known as Empire 101 -- has proven infallible yet again: Convince the people that the Motherland is under attack from outside forces, and their love of country will move them to spill their blood. It works every time, exactly as it's working in Iraq, which continues to this day to bear the predictable fruit: a financial killing of truly historic proportions.

The hard part was the New Pearl Harbor.

Given that aggression requires justification, False Flag Operations are used often in the service of empire. They are risky undertakings, and though typically executed by the most daring and skilled of professionals, are rarely simple to accomplish. The architects of 9/11, however, enjoying certain obvious advantages, acted with remarkable boldness. They depended -- as they knew they could -- on the public's general lack of education in matters of science, and the corporate media's well-established reluctance to ask dangerous questions. They went for the grandest of grand statements: The single most terrifying day of all time. And they pulled it off.

Or did they?

For even with all that fear, deceit, and criminality in play --

It actually takes less than an hour of inquiry for anyone who cares to Grasp the Center of the 9/11 Lie:

Ø Play a video of the destruction of the South Tower.....

http://www.911research.com/wtc/evidence/videos/docs/wtc2_abc_3.mpg is excellent. It is one of many available at.....

<http://911research.wtc7.net/wtc/evidence/videos/index.html#southtower>

Ø Time how long it takes for the tower's roof (which stood at 1362 feet) to plunge to the ground. (The 9/11 Commission, relying on Seismic Data from nearby Columbia University, called it ten seconds.)

Ø Compare that observed time to how long it would have taken for the tower's roof to plunge to the ground in a complete vacuum. Which is easily learned, using.....

Galileo's Law of Falling Bodies

To Calculate the Time in Which an Object Will Travel a Certain Distance in Complete Free Fall

Galileo's formula which has served for nearly four hundred years, and is available all over the internet and in every physics book, reads:

$$\text{Distance} = 16.08 \times \text{Seconds Squared}$$

Reminder: To find the Square of any number, you simply multiply it by itself.

Example: 7 Squared is 49 (7 x 7) and the Square Root of 49, therefore, is 7.

We will solve the problem to find the number of SECONDS it would take for the roof to hit the ground if nothing were resisting it -- not even air.

- Ø First, to find the number of seconds squared, we divide the distance -- it was 1362 feet -- by 16.08.
 - Ø That leaves us with 84.7 -- which we now know is the number of seconds SQUARED that it would take for the roof to hit the ground in a vacuum.
 - Ø To get the actual seconds, we now calculate the SQUARE ROOT of 84.7.
 - Ø Using a calculator (the square root button is the one that looks like $\sqrt{\quad}$) we get the actual number of seconds it would have taken the roof to hit the ground = 9.2.

So it would have taken the roof of the South Tower to hit the ground in a complete free fall -- absent any resistance whatsoever.

9.2 Seconds

Add a couple of seconds for the resistance that the air would actually provide (the slight 'drag' of the air being pushed ahead of the falling roof's surface area) and you get roughly 11 seconds it would have taken in the real world -- if there had been nothing but air between the roof and the ground.

In other words.....

The roof hit the ground in virtually the same amount of time it would have taken if the 500,000 ton building supporting it had simply NOT BEEN THERE.

The entire structure of the building provided NO RESISTANCE WHATSOEVER.
Not even the MASSIVE CORE.

The lowest 85 STORIES of the CORE, which was constructed of 47 MASSIVE STEEL BOX COLUMNS, weighed 200,000 CROSS-BRACED TONS, was touched by NEITHER PLANE NOR FIRE -- and could not have been "PANCAKED" since there was NO WEIGHT ABOVE IT BUT THE WEIGHT OF THE ROOF, DISINTEGRATED

AT THE SPEED OF FREE FALL.

AND THEN BURNED
as a massive pool of molten metal, buried in a hole five to seven stories deep -- well beyond the reach of any efficient source of oxygen --
FOR THREE MONTHS.

THERMITE -- which contains its OWN OXYGEN, generates MOLTEN IRON as an END PRODUCT and is the most widely used compound in the world for the work of EXPLOSIVE DEMOLITION -- explains both of these phenomena.

Why do you suppose it is then, that the 9/11 Commission Report, which spent hundreds and hundreds of pages "examining" the crime, devoted exactly one paragraph to the death of this building, (which became the instrument of instant mass murder), and did not offer even a single word of explanation toward the actual mechanism of its demise, deeming it sufficient to observe that
"the building collapsed in ten seconds."

Call me old fashioned, but I was raised to believe that such an unconscionable dismissal of the violent murders of thousands of innocent human beings

IS AN OUTRAGE.

And must not be allowed to stand.

Rumor has it that the reason the 9/11 Commission could not bring itself to include the word "EXPLOSION" in its brilliant report -- is that they mistook this picture of a building for that of a low-lying cloud.....

Which leaves us... where?

In my own recent struggles to respond to such difficult knowledge, my conscience has begun to speak in simple terms: Courage is contagious.

As is the almost overwhelming urge to deny.

It is true that anyone can choose to ignore, out wait, dismiss, mock and/or attack those unpleasant voices among us who are urgently sounding warnings about this ongoing tragedy and asking for assistance at so pivotal a passage in America's history.

But the crimes will not stop screaming in the trade: Thousands of us were murdered. Hundreds of thousands of innocents have died in reaction. The lives of untold hundreds of thousands more -- and the future of life on the planet -- are exactly what hangs in the balance.

Covert operations and those who carry them out have many advantages over the efforts of any person or organization that conducts business with transparency.

That's why democracy is so hard. It is designed to depend on that transparency.

Those who work the "dark side," as Dick Cheney has referred to it, enjoy significant freedom from legislative oversight, their own source of constant, off-the-books funding (courtesy of their connections to the massive international drug trade) and the finest technology -- especially when it comes to the tools of the trade: weaponry, surveillance, disinformation.

The first thing that covert operators have to fear therefore, is -- by definition -- scrutiny.

If the people who have been profiting from all these heinous lies are not challenged to explain what it is they have really done to make such lying necessary -- it will be that much easier for them to do it the next time. And the time after that.

Any time they believe us restless worker bees need another dose of "Shock and Awe."

A dirty bomb, maybe?

On the west coast this time?

They have already signaled that they expect the next "attack on America" to be nuclear, and that a Shadow Government -- designed to replace the US Constitution -- is already in position and poised to provide a "seamless transition." (12.38) Everything else these men have signaled has come to pass.

On February 1, 2007, no less powerful an insider than former National Security Advisor Zbigniew Brzezinski himself -- the longtime geopolitical heavyweight and a Senior Member of both the Council on Foreign Relations and the Trilateral Commission -- went to the US Senate and warned it to stand vigilant against a sudden False Flag attack, "some provocation in Iraq or terrorist act in the US blamed on Iran, culminating in a 'defensive' US military action against Iran that plunges a lonely America into a spreading and deepening quagmire....."

This profound event tells us that the measure of the PNAC Calamity is taken at the very highest levels of Western power. That a man of Brzezinski's stature would sound such a warning in such a setting is clear evidence of the danger in the ongoing recklessness. It is evidence as well that the Meticulous Staging, Relentless Lying and Mythic Fear-Mongering that Erected the 9/11 Legend is not the work of "our government." It is the work of a well-focused gang. A gang that has made strong enemies in very high places.

The arrogance that drives such a group depends on a single, critical assumption: that those of us not benefitting in their crimes will continue to allow them. In that regard, each of us is encouraged to take on a supporting role: that of Victim One or Victim Two. Victim One plays the trusting innocent, offering a never-ending benefit of the doubt to leaders who have repeatedly trampled our laws, shamed our nation and sailed to fabulous wealth on a river of the deepest human suffering. Victim Two simply turns away from the whole sordid mess and refuses to do the math: that our dear, beloved country -- even as we strain to pretend otherwise -- is growing darker, more dangerous, and less able to sustain its own ruthlessly pillaged economy by the day.

Though history will record that as of November, 2007, fully 53% of US Citizens believed that Mr. Bush should be impeached and removed from office and 61% believed the same of Mr. Cheney (see the American Research Group poll), history will also record that only a tiny fraction of those citizens ever bothered to communicate that judgment to Congress -- the only place it can make a difference.

How can this have come to pass? How could we have become so dazed and confused as to willingly stand aside for the gutting of our country?

In his State of the Union Address of January 28, 2003, President Bush stood before the American people and said that Saddam Hussein had "recently sought significant quantities of uranium from Africa." Both the administration and the CIA knew at the time that this statement was false, which is why CIA chief George Tenet had explicitly instructed Bush not to use it in a speech only three months earlier in Cincinnati.

But false though he knew it to be, the President went ahead and used it against his own people anyway.

For this particular lie was the perfect set-up for his chilling pay-off punch -- the dependable emotional wound that he well understood would instantly enrage and re-terrorize the post 9/11 American mind: His viciously outrageous claim that failing to attack Iraq was to risk the horror of a "mushroom cloud."

After evidence of the use of this treasonous deception to launch an illegal war was leaked to the media -- thanks in no small part to the candor of Bush staffer Stephen Hadley -- Condoleezza Rice was compelled to sit down with reporter Tim Russert on national television to explain. Asked directly why the President had made the very same terrifying claim to all of America that his own Intelligence Agency had told him he could not truthfully make, Ms. Rice was left to answer -- with a straight face -- that it was because the White House "didn't remember."

One wonders.....

How long does it take to pick up the phone or send a simple email to a member of Congress? How long does it take to request that a member of Congress do what simple decency has demanded be done? To remind that member of a moral obligation to act in accordance with the sacred oath that each and every one of them swore on the day he or she assumed office -- a sacred oath to defend the Constitution of the United States? Would fifteen minutes cover it..... ?

Our forefathers included the remedy of impeachment in our Constitution for a wise and crucial reason -- to protect the Republic from treason. In our disgust, we find it difficult to dredge too deeply in the cesspool of criminality of men who would be tyrants. Even so, if we were to use a long stick to merely ripple the surface, we'd quickly recall them.....

Obstructing all legitimate investigation of the gravest crime ever committed against the United States -- the mass murder of thousands of Americans. Rushing to dispose of the forensic evidence crucial to the solving of that crime in direct violation of federal law. Instructing the Environmental Protection Agency to lie about the deadly poisons consumed by the thousands of men and women who rallied in their grief to help. Demanding and promoting fraudulent intelligence to drag our country to war. Spying without warrant on American citizens and lying about it. Revealing the identity of an agent of the CIA as political punishment. Refusing to enforce literally hundreds of laws by declaring them incompatible with the views of the Executive Branch of Government.

Systematically meeting to design -- in the residence of the President of the United States -- the depth and specific details of a clandestine program of torture which was inflicted worldwide against men who were kidnapped, rendered to secret, distant prisons and summarily deemed "enemy combatants" without benefit of counsel or trial.

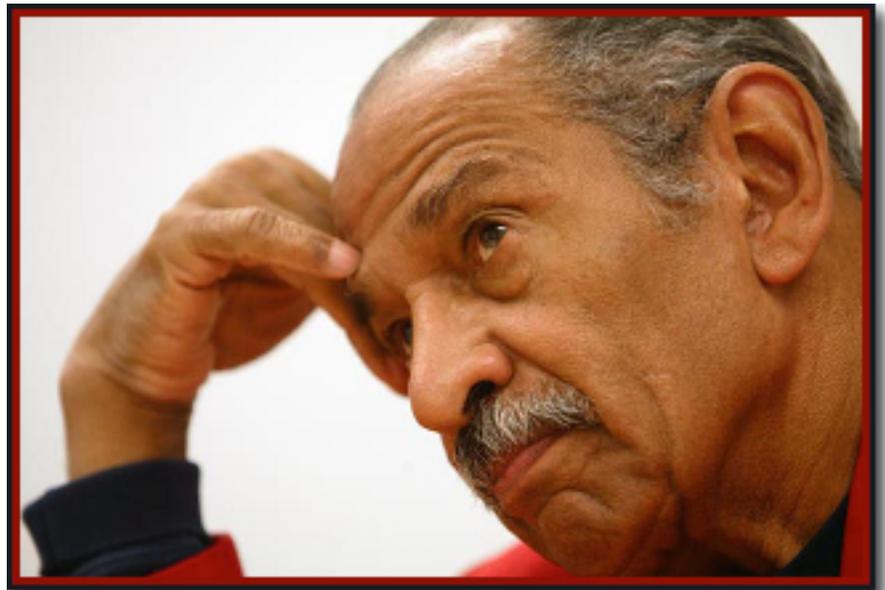

It bears recognition that at least one member of this torture planning group, which not only included Bush and Cheney and Rice, but Donald Rumsfeld, Colin Powell, George Tenet and John Ashcroft as well, expressed misgivings about defecating on the Geneva Conventions amid the halls where Lincoln once lived. "Why are we doing this in the White House?" Ashcroft is said to have asked. "History will not judge this kindly....."

Congressman John Conyers of Michigan was looking toward history as well in December of 2005 when he took it upon himself to generate a comprehensive, step-by-step report on the runup to the war (House Resolution 635, 182 pages long and backed with more than a thousand footnotes), which has very persuasively defined the Bush administration's invasion of Iraq as a crime perpetrated on the American people.

Journalist Lewis Lapham asked Conyers why he had gone to so much trouble -- given that the impeachment he has worked to achieve seemed highly unlikely given the quiet timidity of the populace and the "pragmatism" of so many of his colleagues.

Why, still, has he chosen to raise his voice? Lapham reported Conyers' answer:

"To take away the excuse," he said, "that we didn't know." So that two or four or ten years from now, if somebody should ask, 'Where were you, Conyers, and where was the United States Congress?' when the Bush Administration declared the Constitution inoperative and revoked the license of parliamentary government, none of the company now present can plead ignorance or temporary insanity, can say that 'somehow it escaped our notice' that the President was setting himself up as a supreme leader exempt from the rule of law."

*John Conyers
An Act of Conscience*

Would House Speaker Nancy Pelosi have dared to declare impeachment "off the table" if she knew that the literally tens of millions of Americans who want it "on the table" were actually going to insist that Congress hold these criminals accountable?

Such wise and decent action would encourage patriots of good character to step forward and reveal the Truth about our Reasons for Seizing Iraq. And given that the current targeting of that accursed country was first proposed by PNAC in 1997, the proceedings would almost certainly force a closer look at the "chain-of-incredible-coincidence" mechanisms by which PNAC's wish for a "New Pearl Harbor" was made to come true.

A Real Investigation, in other words, into the Murder of Three Thousand American Citizens on the Morning of September 11, 2001.

The mind reels at the scope of the possibilities. Though they sneak back to business having ducked all justice, calls for Election Fraud, Racketeering and War Crimes Trials might yet keep these thieves busy on the American Public's Agenda for a change.

Such trials would signal their sponsors that "We the People" are not necessarily going to drop to our knees over every Big Bang Fright Show they put up on our TV screens.

Congressman Dennis Kucinich of Ohio has promised to seek them. Will we support his constancy and courage -- his simple, unassailable will to do the right thing?

Think for a moment about just how much it would mean to our sense of national morality to see each of these arrogant liars put his hand once more on the Holy Bible -- with the powers of discovery and subpoena this time in play.

Think of each of them -- separately -- being asked to speak to the American people about why he fought so hard to obstruct a real investigation into 9/11.

Think of each of them -- separately -- being asked to speak to the American people about what he was really doing on that day.

And in the feverishly secretive months before.

What was actually being discussed by the members of your administration, gentlemen, during all those urgent summertime meetings with the very same man who paid Mohammad Atta the last of the 9/11 Blood Money?

What did you say to Justice Scalia before he ruled to deny our right to know what was being planned at the February 2001 Task Force Meetings on American Energy Policy? The ones with the maps of Iraq's oil fields spread across the table. Perhaps you missed the memo: In a democracy the public actually participates in the formation of policy.

To what degree was the secrecy surrounding the identities of the corporations present necessitated by their desire to avoid later culpability in the gasoline price-gouging these policies have inflicted upon us in the years since? Were the Saudis represented?

Feel the need to keep lying? Lie to our faces for a change. Under the weight of the laws you have sworn to uphold. Under the weight of your solemn oath -- so help you God.

Thomas Jefferson would dance in his grave. Thrilled to witness such a righteous and long overdue defense of the nation that he and his fellow patriots once risked their lives to build. And untold millions throughout the world -- including who knows how many young hope-starved Jihadists who have been radicalized by the cruelty of our government's decades-long support of the dictators who oppress them -- would be delivered instantly to an unprecedented new respect for the American People. (12.39)

No? Too bold, you say? Tuck me in tight then, mama, and lend me shelter through the coming storms of reckoning.....

- Ø It's not just Justice for the Mass Murdered that is begging to be addressed.
- Ø It's the Chance to Survive the next few years for Hundreds of Thousands of People in the mideast.
- Ø It's the way we will have to wise up and weed out the True Sponsors of Terrorism in America -- investigating and punishing Political Crimes the same way we investigate and punish all crimes -- with our privacy preserved and our rights to freely assemble and freely speak still intact.
- Ø It's the Lost Sanctity of our Elections.

It's now been six years since Congress sold off the right to count our votes to a handful of corporations which privately operate and repeatedly "tweak" the error-prone software they use, but won't allow the public to monitor its own election processes due to the companies' claims that their "trade secrets" -- in what are supposed to be adding machines -- would be put at risk by citizen oversight. The technology to easily "fix" any outcome -- illegal last minute code patches; hackable nonsecure uploads; and modems that aren't supposed to be installed (drive by wi-fi ready) -- has been slipped into these systems while we've been busy watching the "War on Terror" Show. The "results" they yield can no longer be challenged through recount since paper ballots have been abolished. This travesty is slated to eventually replace the ongoing disenfranchisement of literally millions of working class Americans by the cruder methods currently favored.

Is the protection of so critical a trust as the counting of our votes -- without which democracy cannot exist -- to be so cheaply abandoned now in the United States?

- Ø It's the Gathering Crisis in the Planet's Weather that has been denied for decades by the same deceitful big-money interests which wanted -- and got -- 9/11.

The threat of "Global Warming" has been attacked as a "Nutjob Theory" since scientists first raised it. Years of snide jokes about Better Sunscreen are a not-so-hilarious testament to the widespread ignorance these interests have carefully cultivated: No public discourse whatever regarding the violent storms, the epic flooding, the killing, famine-generating droughts and eventually the Ice Ages that have always attended such conditions as we are now boldly accelerating toward.

- Ø And along the way, as is just beginning to dawn in the minds of so many, this crisis is about The Undoing -- politically, physically, and economically -- of the American Middle Class. Make no mistake: the Loss of Our National Sovereignty -- the next sacrificial corpse on the altar of "Globalization" -- will not be far behind. It will begin with the folding of the United States into a North American Federation with Canada and Mexico, the secret talks for which are already underway.

In a political reality based on honesty, in which the greatest democratic government ever imagined would be allowed to function outside the clutches of mass deception that work so hard now to strangle it, the leaders of our country would be urgently spear-heading an effort to educate the American public as to the true nature of the global forces now aligned against us: Forces manifested according to class -- not religion.

They would be sounding sirens to warn us of a deepening global attack on the interests of all who are not rich. An attack born of The Empowerment Beyond All Government of the World's Biggest Multi-National Entities. An attack that would thin our ranks.

Indeed, our elected representatives would be telling the truth to the people who supposedly elected them about what is really in danger of happening to all of common humankind: a worldwide plunge into poverty and powerlessness that threatens to move the means of dignified survival beyond the reach of billions.

They won't all be Muslims. They won't all be citizens of other countries.

And our leaders would be telling us -- straight-up -- that we are about to engage in the most difficult environmental transition we have ever faced. A transition of barely imagined aspects; a gauntlet defined by a deepening worldwide scarcity of ever-more selfishly hoarded resources at a time when the planet itself will be growing less and less hospitable to the sustenance of human beings.

To navigate such a time with grace will require a profound commitment to reason and the most noble of all human values -- those of charity and a genuine accommodation to the basic brotherhood of all men -- our differences notwithstanding. Told the truth about the challenge, rather than constantly 'managed,' we could be making informed preparations and providing real counsel to our children. We could be examining our readiness -- or lack of it -- in the context of how we are actually living our lives.

The course our current leaders continue to dictate to us does not travel through such possibilities. It travels instead by way of constant, manipulative lies and an escalating, brutal domination of the many by the favored few. It leads without apology or troubled conscience to the outcome that billions may be fated to die before their time, but very few of them will be rich; that the planet may be poisoned into wildness and ice, but the rich on high ground will know shelter; that the violence born of unspeakably desperate conditions may be endless and horrific among the many, but the rich will keep excellent weapons. To leave this course unchallenged is a crime against humanity itself.

Its current, gathering momentum is not unrelated to the unprecedented new imposition of citizen surveillance -- as articulated by the Patriot Act, Domestic Wiretapping, Mass Coordinated Data Mining and such innocuous "innovations" as the coming move toward Mandatory GPS on every American Motor Vehicle. The total destruction of privacy would be joined to overwhelming new capabilities for the destruction of life.

The development of Global Weather Modification Applications capable of provoking hurricanes and tsunamis has been underway for years now, per the HAARP project in Alaska. Such Pentagon faves as the Earth Orbiting Hyperkinetic Technology Vehicle -- enabling precise delivery of a cleansing dose of highly focused electromagnetic energy anywhere on the planet within an hour -- are already proposed and in the works.

This misbegotten union -- all potential dissidence constantly surveilled in an environment of massive destructive capability -- would be institutionalized in the service of the same Predatory Lust for Global Dominion which has already inflicted the theft mechanisms of NAFTA, CAFTA, the World Bank and the WTO upon the lives and aspirations of working people the world over.

And again -- those of us in the United States who comfort ourselves with the assumption that the "rich" in such a scenario includes "us" and the "poor" refers to everybody else have not been paying attention to the clearly declining prospects of the American middle class.

In the throes of that illusion, it is instructive to remember that 70% of the American public was against the adoption of NAFTA. It was rammed down our throats anyway -- on the barest lubricant of lies from the likes of Bill Clinton and Bob Rubin, who were marketed to the American people as friends of the working class.

Like the song says: NAFTA put you in a world of hurt, Burt. But don't go lookin' to knock down NAFTA's door or call 'em up to complain. There ain't no door. And there ain't no phone.

Healthcare, energy, food and water -- the costs head for the horizon.

Jobs fly, unions break, pensions disappear. We barely blink in protest.

The domestic economy hollows out as our trade deficit swells to cosmic (or is it comic) proportions. A bottomless, mind-numbing national debt pools like a bloody lake beneath the gaping, jagged rupture of Iraq.

Where Social Security bleeds to death -- month by gruesome month -- in the gutters of Baghdad.

Which brings us one last time to the current crux of the issue.

The Keepers of This Glorious Game once vanquished their Most Difficult Rival by drawing the Soviet Union to its doom in Afghanistan. They created Al-Qaeda to do it.

Will Iraq mark doom? And if so -- for whom?

It is through this prism that we measure the brilliance of class war strategy.

Some would say that the wounds to working class America are made to come in waves.

- Ø First, our children who answer the call to service are damaged in theatre -- finding death, permanent loss of capability after terrible injuries, the ongoing depression which follows spiritual trauma, and for many the breaking of their families.
- Ø Second, these personal losses play against the grievous financial damage to all aspects of our long-term collective needs, as precious resources for investing in everything not related to war are poured into the black hole. We thus mortgage a future of dwindling productivity in the face of the favored "New Kid in Town" -- China -- beyond all reasonable possibility of recoupment.
- Ø Third, the Al-Qaeda credited 9/11 event which enabled Iraq also enables the ongoing attack on the American Bill of Rights, which has stood for almost two and a half centuries as a sentinel of freedom and democratic empowerment to every citizen of the United States.
- Ø Fourth, the globally-condemned suffering our intervention has unleashed -- acting as self-fulfilling prophecy -- creates new and widely dispersed converts to the cause of Jihadism in numbers not previously approached. We thus create the very thing we are told we must give up our rights to avoid: People who want us dead.

Brilliant.

The "war" was sold at home as self-financing, crucial to our security, likely to be short, and a gift to a grateful nation. The subsequent damage control has seen Don Rumsfeld move to a smaller office in the Pentagon, but the killing -- of all sorts -- continues.

A "war," about which our leaders continue to bicker, pathetically and unconscionably, in terms of "strategy" and "surge," but of which barely a handful dare to speak the simple truth:

That it is an ugly, criminal corporate heist of the assets of an entire nation -- and the economic prospects of another -- financed by the future of the American Republic.

And that it continues a pattern which has been in place for decades, whereby Big Oil -- ever since the Arab Loathing Winston Churchill first carved the borders of Iraq out of his brilliant, history cognizant imagination -- has illegally conspired to keep the international price of crude as inflated and profitable as possible.

*Arc of the Brutal Servant
From Rummy's Best Wishes to the End of His Rope*

Beginning as long ago as 1920, the international oil cartel policy that Iraq's massive reserves -- in service of "price stability" -- should remain underdeveloped and its national output limited has been repeatedly and violently enforced.

The real crime of the CIA installed thug puppet called Saddam was that he dared to play loose with that policy. Pressured, he toyed with the levers of consistent scarcity. All the rest of his transgressions, we somehow found a way to live with.

Mid-course adjustment summarily accomplished.

Blow up the whole country while you tie the broken puppet to a sturdy string, and the raging flow of wealth in an upward direction is restored once again. This time to history-breaking levels.

Or shall we mark it down as the seven hundred thousandth "coincidence" in the Ongoing 9/11 Horror Story that the five biggest US based Multi-National Oil Companies saw their profits triple in the first three years of the Bush Administration's Courageous Campaign to Protect America from the Threat of This Evil Man?

When the Dubya 2000 Mafia (led by Karl Rove and Dick Cheney with CFR Kingmaker James Baker in the Wings watching Brother Jeb do the Pre-Election Dirty Work in Florida) first hijacked the US Presidency -- oil could be had for about $18 a barrel.

The suppression of Iraqi output demanded by their corporate sponsors was dutifully accomplished in an attack that went purposefully beyond Iraq's government to obliterate the bulk of its social and economic and law enforcement institutions as well.

In a matter of weeks -- close to two-thirds of the working Iraqi public were "liberated" from their jobs. Such a strategy created hunger and panic among millions, hundreds of thousands of whom not only had suddenly desperate, hungry families to feed -- but weapons at hand. A production sabotaging 'insurgency' was thereby guaranteed.

The cost of crude has since exploded beyond $100 a barrel.

Which means, for example, that ExxonMobil -- which is, after the disgraced and ruined Enron, the biggest lifetime contributor to the Bush campaigns -- has seen the value of its oil reserves increase by one trillion dollars during the rigors of Operation Iraqi Freedom.

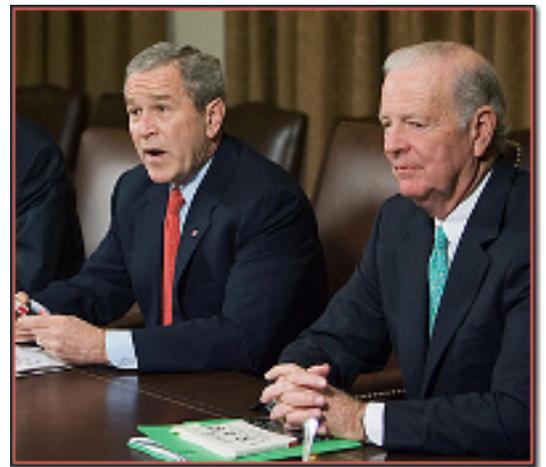

A trillion dollars -- lest our minds cloud over -- is one thousand billion dollars. Yet the amount now being extracted from the American public will eventually dwarf even that incomprehensible number. In the judgment of the Nobel Laureate Economist Joseph Stiglitz, the actual cost to the United States will finally surpass Three Trillion Dollars.

We are witnessing, therefore, a truly unprecedented event -- the largest illicit plunder of any nation's wealth in the history of the human race. A wealth that was once our own.

Meanwhile, such players as the above mentioned Super Lawyer Jim Baker, who recently stepped from the shadows to take a bow as co-author of the "Iraq Study Group" Report -- in which his "new plan" for "staying the course" failed to acknowledge his hand in the crafting of an "original plan" for "staying the course" -- are thriving as never before. This is especially true of Baker's clients: the Oil-Rich Dictators who rule Saudi Arabia.

As we bring this piece to a close, it is fitting to offer a nod to the wondrous powers of this man, whose presence at the pivot point of many of history's more dramatic recent crises -- 9/11 included -- cannot be ignored. It was Secretary Baker, after all, who signed off on the State Department's last message to Saddam as he pondered the 1990 invasion of Kuwait: "We have no opinion on Arab-Arab conflicts, like your border disagreement." The brutality that followed our "disinterest" included the day long "Fish in a Barrel" US Jet Fighter Video Kill-Game Murder of tens of thousands of trapped, retreating Iraqi conscripts on the "Highway of Death;" and the decade-long "Oil for Food" sanctions that are estimated to have killed 500,000 Iraqi civilians -- most of whom were children.

Until 2005, Mr. Baker -- who had earlier bragged to a gathering of Russian Oil Barons that he'd "fixed the election in Florida for George Bush" -- held sway as Senior Counsel for the Carlyle Group. Carlyle, of course, is the Global Weapons Dealing Organization which has provided such fine social connections and wildly profitable 'tools of death' investment opportunities for many of the most misunderstood blood money profiteers in the world. A group which has included not only the Bin Laden family -- in their noble struggle for a bigger piece of the ongoing global misery -- but the elder President Bush as well.

In his spare time, as Counsel for the Defense Ministry of Saudi Arabia, Mr. Baker has done excellent work to prevent the families of the victims of 9/11 from learning about the Ministry's funding of organizations known to front for Al-Qaeda. Though few would dare suggest that this well-placed patriot had anything to do with the 28 Pages of the Report of the US Congressional Investigation of 9/11 which were deemed too damaging to the sensibilities of the Saudi Royals to be shared with the American public for at least another thirty years -- it is nonetheless passing strange to behold the odd juxtaposition of seemingly conflicting interests so curiously poised in his "allegiances."

Not to be too picky about it, Jim -- but how many of the nineteen "9/11 hijackers" had Saudi passports? Was it only fifteen of them?

And as if Dick Cheney alone were not a sufficiently dependable shotgun for our President in these Days of Untraceable Terror, the great Mr. Baker has felt compelled to set up his own office in the White House. As Greg Palast points out in his hair-raising book, "Armed Madhouse" (the followup to "The Best Democracy Money Can Buy"): "This may be the first time in the history of the Republic that a lawyer in the employ of foreign sovereigns has an office in the presidential residence."

Who among us will take stock of such dynamics, think about them in terms of what has happened -- and what is happening -- to America, and fail to note the stench? As the rot of a literally murderous corruption is visited upon our beloved country, it has become urgently obvious that the time to stand up for her is now.

We've got to start making loud and serious noise -- right now.

We've got to start asking hard questions and demanding real accountability.

For truly -- how can we expect our representatives to assist us if we don't even signal we care?

Like many members of the corporate press, the members of Congress are under constant, well-financed and well-organized pressure to look the other way as crime disguised in the rhetoric of patriotism does its best to cut us down.

Against this, it is the call of our voices which lend our representatives strength.

It is our voices which stand to protect the clarity of good conscience.

On 9/11, a woman identified as Edna Cintron stands in the impact hole of the first plane, waiting to be rescued.

For it is imperative that we begin to learn as much as we can as quickly as we can, and share it with one another -- writing letters and conducting purposeful conversations.

Knowing as we do -- that it will always be easier to turn away from that which is painful and deeply troubling to observe. Treason is a brutal beast.

Some of us literally do not have the nerves or the stomach to call it by its name.

But those of us who are fortunate enough to still be strong, and capable of clear thinking; those of us who can actually handle the burden of hard knowledge, bear an obligation to the blessings of our station.....

We are Americans, by the grace of fate.

We are Americans.

How shall we dare, then, to turn away from the pressing alarms of so many of our fellow citizens -- without at least taking a look -- at what they've discovered?

Because someone on talk radio says that people who have found reason to raise questions are fools? Or traitors? Because it really makes us feel bad to think about it?

If our own sense of curiosity is so easily brushed aside --

If our own sense of justice is so easily removed from even the simplest inquiry --

We may find it horribly difficult in the years to come, when we are forced to answer up to our grandchildren for the greatest loss of the twenty-first century.

When we are forced to explain what happened -- on our watch -- to the profound, hopeful promise that had lived and flourished for more than two hundred years within the American Dream.....

“Yeah, it got away from me somehow. I knew things were getting a little too nasty to make sense, and I could hear some voices at the fork in the road.....

But I just didn't want to go there. It would've made me a conspiracy theorist.”

1.3 The Death of Elvis

OBITUARY: Rock Idol Elvis Presley Dies at 42

By Larry Rohter and Tom Zito
Washington Post Staff Writers
Thursday, August 17, 1977

Elvis Presley, who revolutionized American popular music with his earthy singing style and became a hero to two generations of rock 'n' roll fans, died yesterday in Memphis, Tenn. He was 42.

Shelby County Medical Examiner Dr. Jerry Francisco said last night an autopsy indicated Presley died of "cardiac arrhythmia," which he described as a "severely irregular heartbeat" and "just another name for a form of heart attack." He said the three-hour autopsy uncovered no sign of any other diseases -- though Presley had in recent years been treated at Baptist Memorial Hospital for hypertension, pneumonia and an enlarged colon -- and there was no sign of any drug abuse.

Presley's body was discovered at 2:30 p.m. Memphis time by his road manager, Jerry Esposito, in a bathroom in the singer's multimillion-dollar Graceland Mansion. He was rushed to the Baptist Memorial, where he was met by his personal physician, Dr. George C. Nichopoulos, and pronounced dead.

Dr. Willis Madrey, a specialist in liver disease at Johns Hopkins Hospital in Baltimore, said yesterday that two years ago Presley's doctors sent him a sample of Presley's liver for analysis. "It showed no significant abnormalities." Madrey said, "nothing of any help at all in evaluation."

"I had understood he was having some gastrointestinal problems his doctors were trying to evaluate," Madrey said. But "well over a year ago," Madrey added, he saw one of Presley's doctors and was told "he seemed fine" and "the only problem he had medically was obesity."

Ginger Alden reportedly Presley's fiancée and members of his staff were all at the mansion yesterday at the time the singer was found unconscious, Nichopoulos said.

In 1956, when Presley came crackling out of every radio and speaker in the land, young Americans notions about independence -- from parents, from religion, from the values of the time -- were forming. Elvis became "The King" of rock 'n' roll, but also of the emerging youth culture. He was a young, hip-thrusting, white singing music that was essentially black. Part of his attraction was that the '50s teenagers viewed him as epitomizing everything they thought their parents feared they would become -- cocky, slick, brash, tough, black-leather clad, motorcycle straddling, stiletto-shoed.

Their hunches of their parents' fears were well confirmed after Presley's appearance on a 1956 Ed Sullivan show. While millions of teenagers screamed in unison across the land, a Catholic priest in New York scorned Sullivan for this "moral injury" and condemned Presley for his "voodoo of defiance and frustration."

Overall, he sold more than 500 million records worldwide and made 33 films. He was a millionaire many times over and lived in a style that reflected it: ensconced in his Graceland Mansion behind locked gates, like the reclusive characters in "Citizen Kane," handing out jewels and Cadillacs to friends and even casual acquaintances.

No American performer had so broad an impact on culture around the world. In 1958, Communists blamed the influence of Presley for a riot in East Berlin as youths threatened to kill a border guard. In 1964, Presley received a write-in vote for President. A Memphis businessman who got in a fistfight with the singer had to close his shop because fans picketed the place.

His career began its ascent at virtually the same time of James Dean, another young star with a tough image, and Presley felt a sense of kinship with Dean.

Presley "knew I was a friend of Jimmy's," said Nicholas Ray, director of Dean's second film, "Rebel Without a Cause," so he got down on his knees before me and began to recite whole pages from the script. Elvis must have seen "Rebel" a dozen times by then and remembered every one of Jimmy's lines.

Presley's songs, particularly the early ones, expressed succinctly the rising rebellion of young people beginning to break from the Cold War doldrums of the Eisenhower era: "Have you heard the news/There's good rockin' tonight:" "You can do what you want/but lay off my blue suede shoes:" "Everybody in the whole cell block/Dancin' to the jail house rock:" "Don't be cruel/To a heart that's true:" "Baby, let's play house."

Born in Tupelo, Miss., on Jan. 8, 1935 -- his twin brother, Jesse Garon, died at birth - - Elvis Presley was 18 when he walked into a Memphis studio and paid $4 to record "My Happiness" and "That's When Your Heartaches Begin" as a present for his mother.

Raised in a religious atmosphere, Presley had begun his singing career by performing hymns and gospel tunes with his parents, Vernon and Gladys, at concerts and state fairs. His parents bought him his first guitar at age 11, and he remained close to them even after acquiring a rebellious image -- his feelings for his mother, who died at age 46 of a heart attack were known to be especially strong.

Sam Phillips, owner of the studio, intrigued by the rough, soulful quality of the young truck driver's voice, invited him back to practice with some local musicians. A few months later Phillips' Sam Records released Presley's version of the blues tune "That's All Right," backed by the country song "Blue Moon of Kentucky," and the singer's career was launched.

The synthesis of black blues and white country music made Presley a unique artist from the start and Memphis was quick to appreciate that. Presley's recording went to the top of the local charts almost immediately, eventually selling 20,000 copies, and Presley was invited to appear on the Louisiana Hayride country show and at the Grand Ole Opry.

At the Opry, however, the first of the many controversies that were to engulf Presley almost caused him to give up his career. Told by the talent booker there that he was no good, Presley broke into tears and left his performing costume in a filling station.

He recovered quickly, though, and went on to record a whole string of hits for Sun Records, which sold his contract for $40,000 -- then a record -- to RCA in 1955. His first record for RCA was "Heartbreak Hotel," which early in 1956 made him a nationwide sensation.

Months earlier, in November 1955, Col. Tom Parker, an established country music agent, had concluded a management agreement with Presley. Parker was instrumental in arranging Presley's switch from Sun to RCA and was to remain Presley's manager to the end, shrewdly guiding his client's career, limiting or encouraging public exposure in such a way that Presley was almost always able to command top dollar on the competitive concert and recording circuit.

Once, after Presley had been made an honorary narcotics agent by President Nixon, a White House staffer contacted Parker to request a musical performance. Parker told the staffer that Presley would be honored, and that his fee for the occasion would be $25,000. That ended that.

Six months after the record "Heartbreak Hotel" had rippled heartthrobs through teenage America, Ed Sullivan promised to bring "The King" into the nation's living rooms: for $50,000 Sullivan signed Presley to three performances.

When the first show hit the airwaves on Sept. 9, 1956, the response was predictable. Sullivan showed him only from the waist up, rocking around on the tube. Record sales soared, and the critics had new ammunition.

"It isn't enough to say that Elvis is king to his parents," wrote jazz musician Eddie Condon. "That still isn't a free ticket to behave like a sex maniac in public before millions of impressionable kids. According to a scholarly friend of mine, Jackie Gleason, we'll survive Elvis. 'He can't last,' said Gleason, 'I tell you flatly, he can't last.' "

New York Times critic Jack Gould observed: "Mr. Presley has no discernible singing ability. His specialty is rhythm songs which he renders in an undistinguished whine: his phrasing, if it can be called that, consists of stereotyped variations that go with a beginner's aria in a bathtub. For the ear he is an unutterable bore, not nearly so talented as Frank Sinatra back in the latter's rather hysterical days at the Paramount Theater.

"From watching Mr. Presley it is wholly evident that his skill lies in another direction. He is a rock-and-roll version of one of the most standard acts in show business: the virtuoso of the hootchy-kootchy. His one specialty is an accentuated movement of the body that heretofore has been previously identified with the repertoire of the blonde bombshells of the burlesque runway."

And at the Washington Post, Richard Coe, reviewing an early Presley movie, spoke of the singer's popularity as a manifestation of an "adulation of youth, youth that is raw, untrained, and undisciplined, youth which worships the most primitive urges and physical appeal, youth which has no truck with its elders.

"...This youth lives in a crowd and insists that it is lonely and misunderstood, appears to have no education, respect for customs or elders and no manners whatsoever."

Other performers, on shows with Presley, were puzzled by the strong reaction the young singer got from audiences. Jerry Lee Lewis took to closing his shows by standing on the piano in an attempt to upstage Elvis. But it did no good. Presley was even able to take others' material -- like Carl Perkins' "Blue Suede Shoes" -- and make it a hit of even greater magnitude.

"Elvis had the looks on me," Perkins once told an interviewer. "The girls were going for him for more reasons than music. Elvis was hittin' 'em with sideburns, flashy clothes and no ring on that finger. I had three kids. There was no way of keeping Elvis from being the man in that music."

A month after the first Sullivan appearance, 20th Century Fox was readying Elvis' first film for Thanksgiving release. Originally titled "The Reno Brothers," it was changed to "Love Me Tender" to capitalize on the song Presley had introduced on the Sullivan show. The studio made 575 prints of the film for its first run -- the largest in Fox's history.

A year later Presley was drafted into the U.S. Army. Boarding a troop ship for an 18-month tour of duty in Europe as a Jeep driver, he told a reporter: "The first place I want go is Paris and look up Brigitte Bardot."

Presley was just another cog in the military machine, stationed in Friburg, West Germany. But Col. Parker had ensured that Presley would not be forgotten during the two years he was away by having him record a stack of songs before leaving for Europe.

During his period of military service, Presley made no public appearances and completed only one recording session. Of the five singles released during Presley's absence from the U.S. rock 'n' roll scene, all eventually became million sellers.

When Presley was discharged a sergeant early in 1960, he was still "The King," though stars such as Ricky Nelson had come along in the interim.

Presley returned from the Army to find that rock 'n' roll tastes had changed dramatically in his absence. Presley himself underwent a drastic change of style, eschewing his trademark sideburns and hip-shaking music in favor of romantic, dramatic ballads, such as "It's Now or Never" and "Are You Lonesome Tonight?"

These records proved to be as popular as his hard-rocking numbers, but Presley by this time was more interested in making movies than anything else. After an appearance on a Frank Sinatra TV special, in which he alarmed old fans by performing in tails, Presley retired from concerts and television for nearly a decade.

His movies during this period included such potboilers as "Fun in Acapulco" and "Girls! Girls! Girls!" disilluioning some fans even further. But in 1968, Col. Parker engineered a change of direction, and Elvis who had seemed to many to be old fashioned after the emergence of the Beatles in 1964, once again became the hottest thing in pop music.

"It was a staggering moment," writes Greil Marcus in his book "Mystery Train." "In the months preceding, Elvis had begun to turn away from the seamless boredom of the movies and the hackneyed music of the soundtrack albums, staking out a style on a few half-successful singles, presenting the new persona of a man whose natural roughness was tempered by experience. The records had been careful, respectable efforts, but now he was putting everything on the line, risking his comforts and his case for his chance to start over."

The vehicle of Presley's comeback was a Christmastime TV special, broadcast by NBC. The response to that show encouraged Presley to get together with guitarist James Burton and pianist Glen D. Hardin; two of rock's top recording session musicians and go out on the road again.

His audience on that concert tour -- and on his subsequent tours, which brought him to the Washington area three times in recent years -- was more mature than that of a decade earlier, reflecting perhaps the fact that Presley himself was settling down.

On May 1, 1967, Presley had married Priscilla Beaulieu, the daughter of a U.S. Army colonel. On Feb. 1, 1968, a daughter, Lisa Marie, was born to the couple. The marriage ended, after lengthy and expensive divorce proceedings, in October 1973.

After the divorce, Priscilla Presley, who the singer had begun dating while in the Army, was given custody of the child. Presley never married again, but it was recently reported that he was about to marry 20-year-old Ginger Alden. She was reportedly spotted wearing a $50,000 diamond engagement ring from Presley.

Reports of Presley's declining health and increasing weight first date from the time of his divorce. By 1976, in the authoritative "Rolling Stone Illustrated History of Rock 'n' Roll," critic Peter Graining was moved to say, "It seems to be a continuing battle ... and Elvis is not winning. His hair is dyed, his teeth are capped, his middle is girdled, his voice is a husk, and his eyes film over with glassy impersonality. He is no longer, it seems, used to the air and, because he cannot endure the scorn of strangers, will not go out if his hair isn't right, if his weight -- which fluctuates wildly -- is not down. He has tantrums onstage and, like some aging politician, is reduced to the ranks of grotesque."

Earlier this year, Presley canceled several performances in Louisiana and returned to Memphis for what his physicians said was exhaustion. And in Baltimore, he cut short a show and disappeared from the stage for several minutes, only to return claiming he had merely been answering "the call of nature." But after hearing of Presley's death, Baltimore fan Beverly Hochstedt, who sat patiently outside the Baltimore Civic Center for 40 hours when tickets for his show there last March first went on sale, recalled not the erratic show, but the man.

"Oh, God, what can I say," sobbed the 31-year-old fan. "I just feel so lost, I feel shattered. I feel like I lost a very, very, close, very, dear friend, part of my own family."

Reaction among fans, performers and music industry executives elsewhere was also emotional. In Santiago, Chile, newspapers stopped the presses and radio stations changed their evening programming to recount the life of "El Rey de Rock 'n' Roll." In Memphis, the telephone system was reported unable to handle the volume of calls coming into the city from around the country. Hundreds of weeping fans gathered outside Baptist Memorial and Graceland Mansion last night.

Two European radio stations also suspended regular programming as soon as Presley's death was announced. Radio Luxembourg, the continent's most widely listened-to pop station, canceled all its commercials to play Presley's music nonstop.

"This is the end of rock 'n' roll," said Bob Moore Merlis, an executive with Warner Bros. Records, who compiled an anthology of Presley's early material several years ago for RCA. "The void he will leave is impossible to gauge," said Pat Boone, an early rival of Presley's.

"The King is dead," said former Beatle John Lennon last night. "But rock 'n' roll will never die. Long live the King."

"His music was the only thing exclusively ours," said Carl Wilson of The Beach Boys. "His wasn't my and mom and dad's music. His voice was a total miracle in the music business."

The White House said last night that President Carter will "probably issue a statement on Presley today."

No arrangements have been announced yet for Presley's funeral.

The NBC Television Special:

Elvis' Great Comeback

Elvis, starring Elvis Presley, was the title of a 1968 United States television special. It was directed by Steve Binder and produced by Binder and Bones Howe. The executive producer was Bob Finkel, musical director Billy Goldenberg. Sponsored by the Singer Sewing Machine Company, it aired on December 3, 1968 on the NBC television network. The special is commonly referred to as the '68 Comeback Special, because of subsequent developments in Presley's career, but the soundtrack album was released simply as NBC-TV Special.

Original Concept

Scheduled as a Christmas season broadcast, Presley's manager, Colonel Tom Parker, wanted the show to be little more than Presley singing Christmas carols. He believed the special could simply be a TV version of the Christmas radio show Presley had contributed to the year before. Binder argued that the special was an opportunity to re-establish the singer's reputation after years of formula movies and recordings of variable quality. He and Howe hired writers to script a show with specific themes: they envisaged large set designs, dance sequences and big productions of Presley's hits. However, Binder was open to any variations on this that would showcase the singer's talent, and Presley was apparently very happy to go along with this flexible approach.

The special eventually included an extravagant musical sequence featuring Gospel-style numbers, a semi-autobiographical "mini-movie" centered around the song

"Guitar Man" and other re-recordings given lavish set designs. Network censors forced the removal of one segment set in a bordello which featured the song "Let Yourself Go". The special ends with Presley appealing for world peace with the song "If I Can Dream."

Studio recordings for these segments were made at Western Recorders in Hollywood, California between June 20 and 23 and featured an orchestra and the The Blossoms as background vocalists: Fanita James, Jean King and Darlene Love (see 'Trivia'). Other musicians included drummer Hal Blaine, pianist Don Randi, guitarist Tommy Tedesco and harmonica player Tommy Morgan.

The Live Segments

It was after rehearsals at Western Recorders that Binder took special note of how Presley and the other musicians would spontaneously unwind by improvising old blues and rock 'n' roll numbers. Binder commented: "...and that's when I really got the idea: Wouldn't it be great if I had a camera in here and they didn't know I was here?"

Presley is said to have been very apprehensive about the idea of performing live. His last live concert had been at the Bloch Arena in Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, on March 25, 1961. Binder offered a lot of support and reassurance to stop the singer from rejecting the idea of any live segments. He realized some songs already re-recorded or scheduled would need to be cut (The special was only an hour long). He quickly arranged for rehearsals to take place to capture the feel of Presley's informal studio jamming, drafting in the surviving members of Presley's original backing band - Scotty Moore and D.J. Fontana. He also brought in Presley's friends Alan Fortas, Lance LeGault and Charlie Hodge to encourage Presley and make him feel at ease. Two sessions took place, each about two hours in length; the first on June 24 and the second on the 25th. Both took place in the informal surroundings of the dressing room at NBC. They were recorded by Presley's friend Joe Esposito using the singer's own tape recorder. Many songs were tried, including "Danny Boy", "Blue Moon", "That's My Desire" and "I Got A Woman", before the final repertoire was decided for the actual TV recording.

Subsequently, at 6.00pm, June 27, Presley took to the stage for the first time in over seven years, resulting in four one-hour live shows being taped at NBC's Burbank studios. A black-clad Presley sat down and jammed with band mates for two shows, each show having a different audience. There was a one hour break between them (enough time for Presley to shower and have his outfit dry cleaned after performing under the hot studio lights). In the second two, recorded at 8.00pm, June 29, he remained standing and sang live to a mix of live and pre-recorded backing, again in front of two different audiences. These four sessions are often referred to collectively as "The Burbank Sessions", the name coming from not just the venue, but the titles of two collectible bootleg LPs which feature them. The role of each musician at the two sit-down performances was:

- * Elvis Presley: vocals, guitars (acoustic and electric - he and Scotty Moore use the same ones and swap them)
- * D.J. Fontana: drumming, using a guitar case
- * Alan Fortas: guitar back-slapping, occasional vocals
- * Charlie Hodge: acoustic guitar, occasional vocals
- * Lance LeGault: guitar back-slapping, tambourine (see 'Trivia')
- * Scotty Moore: guitars (acoustic and electric)

Filmed in the round, only a small portion of these - and the stand-up sets - were included in the televised special. Presley and the others played and sang while interjecting personal stories of his music and early performances. Referring to music and his religious upbringing in a break between songs, Presley says: "Rock and roll is basically gospel (music), or rhythm & blues (is too). It sprang from that, people have been adding to it." He also makes reference to the new groups of the time, like The Byrds and The Beatles, and notes how things have improved and not just changed, like the standard of musicians and sound engineering. Presley is also prompted to speak about a Florida concert at which a judge had forbidden him to move and the police filmed the show.

Presley sings many of the songs he was famous for including: "That's All Right", "Heartbreak Hotel", "One Night", "Love Me" and "Are You Lonesome Tonight?". He also reprises Jimmy Reed's "Baby What You Want Me To Do" on several occasions and includes the less well known songs, "Tryin' To Get To You" and "When My Blue Moon Turns To Gold Again". As each session progresses, he can be observed playing and singing with such gusto that he occasionally feels the urge to rise up and sing off mike, even when he uses the electric guitar with no strap (during a reprise of "One Night").

In both sit-down shows, Presley sits between two of the women sat at the edge of the stage to sing the final song, "Memories". Although this move was Binder's idea, Colonel Parker had originally been concerned that the audiences would contain older, more reserved adults and that this might give the impression that Presley had lost some of his appeal (The only time Presley had 'bombed' at a live gig was in front of a mature audience in Las Vegas in 1956). Parker had therefore arranged that young women should be seen nearest the stage during filming.

The stand-up shows feature Presley performing a similar energetic set by himself, mostly without guitar. He performs on the same small stage (no more than ten feet square) which is closely surrounded by the audience. Musical backing this time comes from an unseen live orchestra and the Blossoms. Presley also sings to a pre-recorded track on a few songs that were intended to be integrated into other parts of the show.

Acclaim

The edited broadcast of December 3 - combining the big, choreographed numbers, lavish sets and some of the informal live sessions - was an enormous success. The show was the highest-rated television special of the year. According to Binder, it was probably the first one-man TV special to appear on commercial American television. Previously, TV specials tended to be packed with guest stars, like Frank Sinatra's Timex Special of 1960, in which Presley himself appeared with other celebrities.

At the beginning of the '68 Special project, a nervous Presley had said to the executive producer Bob Finkel: "I want everyone to know what I can really do." Critics generally agree that the broadcast did show what Elvis Presley really could do - in addition to making profitable, if generally uninspired movies and soundtracks. The '68 Special is widely credited with revitalizing his career: chart statistics for the summer of 1968 suggest that Presley's recording career was becoming all but non-existent. After the special, he began his stint in Las Vegas and toured, achieving a string of record-breaking sell-out performances across America. Chart successes returned, including a U.S. number one in 1969 ("Suspicious Minds") and a U.K. number one ("The Wonder of You", (1970)) - his first since 1965.

The live segments of the '68 Comeback Special in particular gave the audience more than a glimpse of Presley's charismatic and emotionally charged performing style that won him his first fans in the 1950s. This is arguably even more evident in the later uncut versions of the special (see below). His career had been considered by many to be artistically fallow since his return from the Army (1960), the subsequent Beatles invasion and since the new and varied musical directions forged by the likes of the Rolling Stones, Bob Dylan and Jimi Hendrix.

The dominant image of the special for many fans and critics is not of any of the lavish set pieces, though the giant red 'ELVIS' background sign is memorable. For many it will be the sight and sound of a toned 33-years-old Presley in a custom-made black leather outfit - an image of the performer arguably at his peak (The costume was preserved and has been on display with hundreds of other personal items at Presley's Graceland home in Memphis, Tennessee)

Top Ten Reasons to Believe Elvis is Alive

1. ELVIS IS IN THE WITNESS PROTECTION PROGRAM

Most people know about Elvis' famous meeting with President Nixon. What they don't know is that during this meeting Nixon issued Elvis Presley a DEA badge, a clue that Elvis was helping investigators with a major case and later had to enter the federal witness protection program. It's ludicrous to believe that the DEA would have issued a badge to someone not working for them, even Elvis Presley.

2. ELVIS' NAME IS MISSPELLED ON HIS TOMB.

Elvis' father, Vernon, misspelled Elvis' middle name on the grave—Aaron instead of Aron, as his mother named him. This is a sign that Vernon Presley knew that it was not his son in the tomb.

3. PHOTOGRAPHS OF THE CORPSE DON'T RESEMBLE ELVIS

In 1977, the National Enquirer paid a third cousin of Elvis to smuggle a mini-camera in to the viewing of Elvis' body. The resulting picture was published in the Enquirer, and caused shock waves among fans around the world. The eyebrows, chin, and fingers all looked unlike Elvis.

4. THE COFFIN WAS TOO HEAVY

The coffin weighed 900 pounds: Elvis is known to have been overweight at the time of his death ... but not that much. The only plausible account for that weight would be if the body was a wax dummy and there was an air conditioner inside the coffin to keep the wax dummy from melting.

5. COL. PARKER'S STRANGE QUOTE

Col. Tom Parker, Elvis' manager, said in a press conference shortly after Elvis' death: 'Elvis didn't die. The body did. We're keeping up the good spirits. We're keeping Elvis alive. I talked to him this morning and he told me to 'carry on.' Is it possible that there was a double entendre to those words: that they had literal truth to them that no one suspected at the time?

6. INCONSISTENCIES IN THE STORY

The circumstances of death are described in conflicting ways. Witnesses disagree as to how the body was found and what Elvis was wearing, when the body was found, whether it was dead already, when death was declared, and whether AR was tried.

7. THE BOOK DID NOT EXIST THEN

The book about the Shroud of Turin he is supposed to have been reading when he died was not published until a year later.

8. EVIDENCE THAT ELVIS WAS PLANNING ON THE END

There seems to be evidence that Elvis was preparing for the end:

- Ø Why, for instance, did he order no new costumes for a new tour due to start on August 16th, 1977?
- Ø Why did he fire several old friends shortly before his death?
- Ø During his last tour he sang 'Blue Christmas' although it was summer: was he warning his fans?
- Ø Five months before hand, family members were suddenly cut out of his will. Did he realize he would need that money for his new life?

9. MYSTERIOUS FIGURE LEAVING MEMPHIS THE DAY AFTER

On August 17th, 1977, one day after Elvis' death, a ticket to Buenos Aires was bought at Memphis airport by a man looking like Elvis and using the name John Burrows, a code name Elvis frequently used when making hotel reservations for the Elvis entourage.

10. NEW ELVIS RECORDING EMERGES WITH SONGS FROM THE 90'S

In 2002, an independent label released a CD entitled Kingtinued featuring Elvis' voice singing at least fourteen well known songs which were not written and did not exist prior to August 16th, 1977.

An Elvis Sighting:

Honor Elvis

Moon S. Duepre, a former railroad track walker, was looking for root berries in a field outside the town of Midlothian when he spied a man he was certain was Elvis stepping into an abandoned old schoolhouse. "I know it was him, because he had a cape on and white satin pants with bell bottoms and lots of them spangle things that catch the sun and glitter sewed onto them pants," said Duepre.

When he approached the building Duepre said he heard "a voice humming the strains of that Hunka Hunka Love song. There was no mistaking that voice. It was Elvis's sound. I went in the door real fast and surprised Elvis. He said he had just gone in there to find some momentary relief and asked me to respect his privacy. I told him I surely would because I truly had respect for him and his kind. He said he appreciated that and to thank me I could pick up a new Cadillac automobile at the Midlothian dealership, which I did the next day and put 214,000 miles on it before it quit on me.

The president's fiscal 2004 budget

Proof that life exists outside the boundaries of Earth continues to elude scientists, but President Bush's budget suggests that "space aliens" may be out there somewhere.

And it could just be a matter of time before they are discovered.

In a brief passage titled "Where Are the Real Space Aliens?" Mr. Bush's budget document says that several important scientific discoveries in the past decade indicate that "habitable worlds" in outer space may be much more prevalent than once thought.

The passage acknowledges that hard evidence of alien life has yet to emerge.

"Despite all the space aliens that appear in science fiction movies and books, we have yet to find conclusive evidence for life, even microbes, anywhere in the universe besides Earth," it reads, but then adds, "Researchers have found life in very harsh environments on Earth, which expands the possible kinds of places where life might exist."

Other recent finds include evidence of currently or previously existing large bodies of water — a key ingredient of life — on Mars and on Jupiter's moons.

Astronomers also are finding planets outside the solar system, including about 90 stars with at least one planet orbiting them.

"Perhaps the notion that 'there's something out there' is closer to reality than we have imagined," the passage concludes.

The budget justifies the funding for one space project by mentioning the chance that life exists beyond this planet.

The president calls for $279 million next year and $3 billion over five years for Project Prometheus, which includes building the Jupiter Icy Moons Orbiter.

"This mission will conduct extensive, in-depth studies of the moons of Jupiter that may harbor subsurface oceans and thus have important implications in the search for life beyond Earth," the budget reads.

Mr. Bush is not the first president to show an interest in the possibility of extraterrestrial life.

Clinton aide Webster Hubbell claims in his autobiography that after President Clinton appointed him to a Justice Department post, the president asked Hubbell to investigate whether UFOs existed, as well as determining who was responsible for the assassination of President Kennedy.

The budget is the second time in recent months that the Bush administration has addressed questions about life in space.

On Dec. 24, the White House issued a September determination by Mr. Bush in which he followed his predecessors' lead by issuing a determination exempting the Air Force facility near Groom Lake, Nevada, from environmental laws allowing the release of classified information about the area.

Groom Lake is the place that UFO buffs call Area 51.

"I find that it is in the paramount interest of the United States to exempt the United States Air Force's operating location near Groom Lake ... from any applicable requirement for the disclosure to unauthorized persons of classified information concerning that operating location," the president wrote.

Bush Links NASA Budget To Search For Space Aliens

When a Bush Watch reader called our attention to an ANANOVA news service story that "Bush Backs Alien Evidence" we did a double-take. The story said "The US President used his budget document to declare that there may be 'space aliens' to be discovered.," so we went to the same budget document that Congress is presently pouring over to see for ourselves. The relevant passage sandwiches its interest in space alien discovery between a request for $3 billion in power and propulsion technologies with requests for $31 million in communications technologies and $39 million in human research.

As you can see from the Bush Budget excerpt below, "important discoveries" suggest that the possibility of space aliens is not as far-fetched as previously believed, giving romantic members in Congress a provocative reason to approve the requested funds. At any rate, we wonder if Bush consulted with his faith-based friends to get their take on the subject. --Politex, Bush Watch, 02.04.03

Bush and the Aliens

The leader of the free world included in his Budget speech a section entitled Where are the space aliens? Now I'm not objecting to someone saying that extraterrestrial life may exist, I've been waiting for them to bring elvis back for a few years now, but using the term space aliens sort of reduces ones credibility a bit wouldn't you say?

Of course, if you need a distraction from that whole "war with Iraq" and "North Korea has nukes" thing, what better to use than "Space Aliens".

Posted on Thursday, February 06, 2003

"George W Bush says there is mounting evidence to suggest there is alien life on other planets.

The US President used his budget document to declare that there may be "space aliens" to be discovered.

A passage entitled, "Where are the Real Space Aliens?", states that important scientific research over the last 10 years indicates that proof of "habitable worlds" in outer space is becoming more of a reality.

Evidence for the current or previous existence of large bodies of water, an essential element for life, has already been found on Mars and on Jupiter's moons.

Astronomers are also discovering planets outside of our solar system, including around 90 stars with at least one planet orbiting them.

The document says: "Perhaps the notion that 'there's something out there' is closer to reality than we have imagined."

The Alien's Endorsement

The 1996 Presidential primaries are approaching, and while the candidates worry about CNN and influential newspapers, a lot of "real" Americans are getting their news in the checkout line, where the "Space Alien" wields the real influence. In 1991, Weekly World News, a Florida-based supermarket tabloid, stuck the image of an alien into an existing photograph of President Bush. Since then, the alien, in one composite photograph after another, has been seen with many American statesmen.

Selected headlines include: "Space Alien Meets With President Bush!" (1991), "Space Alien Meets With Ross Perot!" (1992), "Alien Backs Clinton!" (1992), "Alien Dumps Clinton and Goes Back to Perot!" (1993) and "Space Alien Meets With Newt Gingrich!" (1995).

So far he has not made his '96 endorsement. Hillary Rodham Clinton's reported adoption of an alien baby may play in Bill's favor. Rush Limbaugh has already been endorsed by rival aliens. But Phil Gramm may have an inside track. According to World News, Gramm is 1 of 12 Senators who are themselves space aliens.

Straw Man

per Wikipedia

A straw man argument is an informal fallacy based on misrepresentation of an opponent's position. To "set up a straw man" or "set up a straw-man argument" is to create a position that is easy to refute, then attribute that position to the opponent. A straw-man argument can be a successful rhetorical technique (that is, it may succeed in persuading people) but it is in fact a misleading fallacy, because the opponent's actual argument has not been refuted.

Its name is derived from the practice of using straw men in combat training. In such training, a scarecrow is made in the image of the enemy with the single intent of attacking it....

Setup of a straw man

One can set up a straw man in the following ways:

1. Present a misrepresentation of the opponent's position, refute it, and pretend that the opponent's actual position has been refuted.
2. Quote an opponent's words out of context -- i.e., choose quotations that are not representative of the opponent's actual intentions (see contextomy).
3. Present someone who defends a position poorly as the defender, refute that person's arguments, and pretend that every upholder of that position, and thus the position itself, has been defeated.
4. Invent a fictitious persona with actions or beliefs that are criticized, and pretend that the person represents a group of whom the speaker is critical.
5. Oversimplify a person's argument into a simple analogy, which can then be attacked.

Some logic textbooks define the straw man fallacy only as a misrepresented argument. It is now common, however, to use the term to refer to all of these tactics. The straw-man technique is also used as a form of media manipulation.

However, carefully presenting and refuting a weakened form of an opponent's argument is not always itself a fallacy. Instead, it restricts the scope of the opponent's argument, either to where the argument is no longer relevant or as a step of a proof by exhaustion.

Examples

An example of a straw man fallacy:

Person A: I don't think children should run into the busy streets.

Person B: I think that it would be foolish to lock children up all day.

By insinuating that Person A's argument is far more draconian than it is, Person B has side-stepped the issue. Here the "straw man" that person B has set up is the premise that "The only way to stop children running into the busy streets is to keep them inside all day".

A common example of a real world use of this fallacy might concern capital punishment:

Person A: The death sentence would also remove some financial stresses on the prison system.

Person B: It's terrible that you think we should kill people just to clear out prisons.

The fallacy here is how Person B takes an inconsequential benefit of capital punishment and portrays it as Person A's main argument.

Liberal Lies and Straw Men

By Gary Larson

Editorials in the Minneapolis Star-Tribune demean Bush and libel Rumsfeld, stirring hate, inciting enmity, making a mockery of rational discourse.

– David Horowitz, "The Politics of Bad Faith" (1998)

Set up a straw man. Kick it. Rip it. Set it ablaze. Nasty trick in demagogues' bags? Sure it is. And one of the oldest Machiavellian tricks in the book, easy.

It's a tactic used by politicians both left and right, also by unhinged news media nowadays doing their best imitations of Party organs. The latter include a Midwest mainstream daily where I live, whose editorials defame President George W. Bush, and libel Donald Rumsfeld, clearly to incite enmity, thus to stir an angry party base. Works, too, gauging from uninformed, sometimes hateful letters to editors from party faithful, reciting spin as fact and partisan invective as reason.

That newspaper is the Minneapolis Star Tribune, a mouthpiece of and for the ardent liberal class. The Wall Street Journal's John Fund dubs it "one of the most left-wing newspapers in the nation," a tag it richly deserves, if recent con jobs on its readers are any measure of that. Think of a newspaper equivalent to The Nation magazine and you'll get the picture.

Straw man tactics invite clueless, often livid letters to editors, but these fail to do true justice to a democracy in which informed citizens are expected to weigh in on issues. When "advertisements contain the only truths to be relied upon in a newspaper," as Thomas Jefferson facetiously wrote, we're in perilous straits.

Alas, his facetiousness becomes reality!

Straw Man Politics and The Great Rhetorical Divide

Karl Rove's recent comments regarding the "liberal" response to 9/11 have deeply offended most liberal Americans (myself included). The reason Rove's remarks are so infuriating is that they baldly mischaracterize the position of nearly all serious minded liberals. Yet this should surprise no one. Rove's remarks are just another example of the rhetorical device that has become the primary method of persuasion among conservative pundits and politicians over the last decade: the straw man argument. In this age old method of argumentation, an advocate manufactures a position (a straw man) and claims that it's the position held by his opponent. He then contrasts this looney position with his own, setting up a false dichotomy. The straw man argument has been a staple of American political discourse since the founding of our country. In the past, however, the use of this particular rhetorical device was limited in large part by the nature of the news media. For most of our country's history, the mainstream press corps served as a check on excessive straw man politics (and deception in general). A politician or pundit who went too far in mischaracterizing his opponents' positions (or basic facts) would lose credibility in the eyes of the media gatekeepers. He would be marginalized and his views would be debunked or simply ignored. If politicians wanted coverage, they had to confine their rhetoric to a zone of reasonableness, and this meant refraining from grossly mischaracterizing the views of the opposition.

But the major media outlets no longer have this gatekeeping power. The arrival of alternative media outlets like FoxNews, talk radio, and the internet have allowed politicians and pundits to bypass the old media filter. They are now free to say whatever they want, whenever they want, and they can be assured that the message will find an audience. As a result, our political discourse today essentially operates on the honor system. In such [a] system, those who do not wish to fight fair can use straw man tactics to great effect.

Straw-Man Anti-Evolution Tactics in Louisiana

Not to be outdone by Arkansas, Louisiana is now resorting to straw-man tactics to discredit Darwin's theory of evolution.

State Representative Sharon Broome introduced a resolution saying the legislature rejects "the core concepts of Darwinist ideology that certain races and classes of humans are inherently superior to others and does hereby condemn the extent to which these philosophies have been used to justify and approve racist practices." It urges the state education system to address "the commonalities of people groups and the weaknesses of Darwinian racism."

This tactic is a common logic fallacy known as the "straw man" argument. The moron using the tactic misrepresents the opposing position, and then attacks the opposing position on that basis. This qualifies because no core concept of Darwin's theory of evolution states that any race is superior to any other. According to Joseph Graves, an Arizona State University professor of evolutionary biology, Darwin actually spoke out against racism, saying the differences in races of a species were so minor as to be inconsequential as far as evolution was concerned.

Bush Throws the Straw Man at Powell

September 27, 2006

The dispute between Colin Powell and President Bush gave us a perfect example of how Bush uses the strawman tactic to attempt to fool the public.

Powell said, "The world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism."

Bush has no way of countering that true statement of fact. So he comes back with, "If there's any comparison between the compassion and the decency of the American people and the terrorist's tactics of extremists, it's flawed logic."

Of course, neither Powell nor any of the other prominent critics of Bush ever made such a statement.

That he uses these tactics on a war hero like Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., shows just how evil he has become.

Elvis Abducted by Aliens

Elvis Gone Wild

There are those of us who believe that Elvis did not die;

He was abducted by aliens, who used his DNA to impregnate women all over the world.

We are the results of these alien experiments; young urban professionals with a hunk of burning love.

To celebrate our heritage, we suit up like daddy, hit the bar scene in the Tampa Bay, Florida area, and reclaim our birthrights as the illegitimate alien-engineered children of Elvis.

Hail to the King!

I am sick and tired of the viral marketing. When will people finally wake up and realize that this is all being perpetuated by the static control industrial complex? Wake up people! You aren't being abducted by "aliens," your wallets and your minds are being robbed blind by 3M. There is no "Michael Menkin," he's just a fabrication of the 3M marketing department. And "his" sole purpose is to get you to buy more Velostat.

And the scary thing is that this is just the test run. When they unroll the real operation in China, in 2008, the stampede of orders for Velostat are going to come crashing in. Imagine, billions of Chinese heads covered in Velostat. People will need multiple hats for differing fashion tastes, moreso for the ladies. That's millions of miles of Velostat, at $117 a unit! And of course, no ordinary tinfoil will do, only 3M Velostat will "work".

Want to know just how brainwashed "Michael Menkin" has you? Velostat isn't even tinfoil!

Wake up people!

The Protocols and the Holocaust

The war that the Nazis waged against the Jews was not just a war of physical annihilation. It was an international war of propaganda to convince the rest of the world of the evils of Judaism. One of the primary weapons that the Third Reich used for this international effort was a forgery known as "The Protocols of the Elders of Zion." It is claimed that the Protocols are the minutes of a meeting of Jewish leaders at the first Zionist Congress in Basel, Switzerland, in 1897, in which Jews plotted to take over the world. The Protocols are a complete forgery most of which was copied from an obscure satire on Napoleon III by Maurice Joly called "Dialogue aux Enfers entre Montesquieu et Machiavel" ("A Dialogue in Hell Between Montesquieu and Machiavelli").

The story of the Protocols starts with a chapter in a novel called "Biarritz" by a German bureaucrat named Hermann Goedesche writing under the pseudonym "Sir John Retcliffe" (sometimes altered to "Sir John Readcliffe" in later literature). Goedesche was an anti-Semite in the middle of the 19th century who believed in a conspiracy between Jews and Masons to dominate the world. One chapter of the novel, titled "In the Jewish Cemetery in Prague" relates a speech by a Rabbi named Eichhorn or Reichhorn which reveals a Jewish plot against European civilization. Although it was part of a novel, it was printed separately as an anti-Semitic pamphlet in Russia as early as 1872. It was widely circulated as a truthful account for the rest of the 19th century and represents the precursor of the Protocols. It is still occasionally attached to current editions of the Protocols.

The Protocols were actually written in Paris sometime between 1895 and 1899 by an agent of the Russian secret police Pytor Ivanovich Rachovsky, who is known to have forged other documents for the various intrigues in which he took part. While the Protocols are overtly anti-Semitic it is believed that the Russian minister of finance, Sergei Witte, was also a target of the Protocols. At the time Witte was the leader of the movement to modernize Russia and limit the influence of the old Russian aristocracy. The Protocols attempt to discredit Witte's reforms of the Russian economy by linking Witte's program to a Jewish plot to destroy western civilization.

The Protocols, as they are usually published, are divided into twenty-six separate chapters each of which are a lecture on how to subvert western civilization, although some versions, including the first in English, did not have this division. The "program" set forth in the Protocols is vague and generalized. The Protocols advise, for example: "Therefore in governing the world the best results are obtained by violence and intimidation, and not by academic discussions." (Protocol 1). Some are just silly. One Protocol (23) advocates making people unhappy by passing laws prohibiting drunkenness. The Protocols are vigorously anti-democratic as well. Protocol 25 advises: "Several members of the seed of David will prepare Kings and their successors, who will be elected not by right of inheritance but by their own capabilities. These successors will be initiated in our secret political mysteries and plans of governing, taking great care that no one else should acquire them."

The parochial political controversies that sparked the writing of the Protocols was soon forgotten but the anti-Semitism remained. The Protocols were first published in full by Sergei Nilus, another agent of the Russian secret police, in 1905. Nilus, who might have been one of the authors of the Protocols, became their main promoter; he circulated several editions of the Protocols in Russia as part of an campaign of anti-Semitism. While the early publications of the Protocols were in Russia, it was spread to the rest of Europe by Russian expatriates after the fall of the Tsars in 1917, where they claimed that it provided proof that the Jews were behind the Russian Revolution. Another expatriate Russian, Boris Brasol, brought it to the United States around 1920 where it became the core of Henry Ford's anti-Semitic program. By the time Nilus died in 1930, Europe had been saturated by millions of copies of the Protocols. It had also been exposed as a forgery.

The Protocols reached Germany sometime around 1918. One of those who brought them to Germany was Alfred Rosenberg, an Estonian of German heritage who first encountered the Protocols when a student in Moscow. According to Rosenberg a stranger entered his room, placed the book on the table and silently departed. Whether his tale was true or not, Rosenberg soon became an anti-Semite convinced of the authenticity of the Protocols. When he fled Raval (now Tallinn) in the civil war that followed the Russian Revolution, he took the Protocols with him.

In Germany Rosenberg soon became involved with a mystical group that was a precursor to National Socialism known as the Thule Society where he frequently lectured about the Protocols. Rosenberg was there to explain the mysteries of the Protocols when Adolf Hitler appeared on the stage of right-wing politics in 1921. Rosenberg was at Hitler's side during the attempted putsch in Munich in 1923. By then the Protocols had become one of the central themes of Nazi thought. The Protocols were the basis for much of Mein Kampf, and Rosenberg's book The Myth of the 20th Century became the most important exposition of Nazi philosophy.

It was already known that the Protocols were a forgery when Hitler received his first copy. The exposure of the forgery began as soon as the Protocols began to appear in western Europe but the coup de grâce occurred in 1921, one year after the Protocols were first published in Great Britain. In August, 1921, the Times of London printed a devastating exposure of the forgery by printing extracts from the Protocols side-by-side with the passages from Joly's book that had been plagiarized. From that point, the Protocols were dismissed by thinking people everywhere. It did not, however, stop the wide circulation of the Protocols by Russian expatriates and later by Hitler. Even the decision by a Swiss court after consultation with three experts (one appointed by the publisher) in May, 1935 did not affect the distribution of the Protocols by the Third Reich.

The anti-Semitic agitation of the Nazis was international in scope. The Protocols was the chief weapons used in the propaganda campaign against the Jews. Under the direction of Joseph Goebbels, the Protocols were translated into many other languages and the world was flooded with cheap editions of the forged document. With Henry Ford's "The International Jew" (also based in large part on the Protocols), it became the staple text for the anti-Semitism exported by the Nazis around the world. In Mein Kampf, Hitler described the importance of the Protocols to his program of anti-Semitism:

... To what extent the whole existence of this people is based on a continuous lie is shown incomparably by the Protocols of the Wise Men of Zion, so infinitely hated by the Jews. They are based on a forgery, the Frankfurter Zeitung moans and screams once every week: the best proof that they are authentic. What many Jews may do unconsciously is here consciously exposed. And that is what matters. It is completely indifferent from what Jewish brain these disclosures originate; the important thing is that with positively terrifying certainty they reveal the nature and activity of the Jewish people and expose their inner contexts as well as their ultimate final aims. The best criticism applied to them, however, is reality. Anyone who examines the historical development of the last hundred years from the standpoint of this book will at once understand the screaming of the Jewish press. For once this book has become the common property of a people, the Jewish menace may be considered as broken.

Hitler, Adolf. Mein Kampf (München: Zentralverlag der N.S.D.A.P. Franz Eher Nachf., G.M.B.H., 1935). Volume 1; Chapter XI: Nation and Race (pp. 307-308; Mannheim translation).

Even today the Protocols of the Elders of Zion is one of the principal propaganda weapons of anti-Semitism. In the United States it continues to be circulated by the Christian Identity movement, the Ku Klux Klan and neo-Nazi groups. It is still distributed by those who deny the Holocaust as well. The Institute for Historical Review -- the intellectual center of the movement denying the Holocaust -- continues to sell the Protocols and it is still used to attack Jews. Ernst Zündel, who states openly that he is an admirer of Hitler and claims the Holocaust never happened, still repeats the lies of the Protocols:

Could it be that word is out that, according to the Protocols of the Wise Elders of Zion, the New World Order is soon going to be locked in place, with Israel the hub of power and the United States its dedicated slave?

<http://www.lebensraum.org/english/zgrams/zg1997/zg9709/970912.html>

Nor is the United States the only country and English the only language where the Protocols are still being distributed as fact. The Protocols are available in virtually every European country. Translated into Arabic, the Protocols have become a standard text for anti-Semitism in the Middle East. Translated into Japanese, millions of the copies of the Protocols are still being distributed around the Pacific Rim.

"The Protocols of the Elders of Zion" has become a lie that will not die, no matter how often it is exposed as a forgery.

The Protocols of the Elders of Zion:

The Most Notorious and Most Successful Work of Modern Antisemitism

by Daniel Keren

The "Protocols of the Elders of Zion", the most notorious and most successful work of modern antisemitism, draws on popular antisemitic notions which have their roots in medieval Europe from the time of the Crusades. The libels that the Jews used blood of Christian children for the Feast of Passover, poisoned the wells and spread the plague were pretexts for the wholesale destruction of Jewish communities throughout Europe. Tales were circulated among the masses of secret rabbinical conferences whose aim was to subjugate and exterminate the Christians, and motifs like these are found in early antisemitic literature.

The conceptual inspiration for the Protocols can be traced back to the time of the French Revolution at the end of the 18th century. At that time, a French Jesuit named Abbe Barruel, representing reactionary elements opposed to the revolution, published in 1797 a treatise blaming the Revolution on a secret conspiracy operating through the Order of Freemasons. Barruel's idea was nonsense, since the French nobility at the time was heavily Masonic, but he was influenced by a Scottish mathematician named Robison who was opposed to the Masons. In his treatise, Barruel did not himself blame the Jews, who were emancipated as a result of the Revolution. However, in 1806, Barruel circulated a forged letter, probably sent to him by members of the state police opposed to Napoleon Bonaparte's liberal policy toward the Jews, calling attention to the alleged part of the Jews in the conspiracy he had earlier attributed to the Masons. This myth of an international Jewish conspiracy reappeared later on in 19th century Europe in places such as Germany and Poland.

The direct predecessor of the Protocols can be found in the pamphlet "Dialogues in Hell Between Machiavelli and Montesquieu," published by the non-Jewish French satirist Maurice Joly in 1864. In his "Dialogues," which make no mention of the Jews, Joly attacked the political ambitions of the emperor Napoleon III using the imagery of a diabolical plot in Hell. The "Dialogues" were caught by the French authorities soon after their publication and Joly was tried and sentenced to prison for his pamphlet.

Joly's "Dialogues," while intended as a political satire, soon fell into the hands of a German antisemite named Hermann Goedsche writing under the name of Sir John Retcliffe. Goedsche was a postal clerk and a spy for the Prussian secret police. He had been forced to leave the postal work due to his part in forging evidence in the prosecution against the Democratic leader Benedict Waldeck in 1849. Goedsche adapted Joly's "Dialogues" into a mythical tale of a Jewish conspiracy as part of a series of novels entitled "Biarritz", which appeared in 1868. In a chapter called "The Jewish Cemetery in Prague and the Council of Representatives of the Twelve Tribes of Israel," he spins the fantasy of a secret centennial rabbinical conference which meets at midnight and whose purpose is to review the past hundred years and to make plans for the next century.

Goedsche's plagiarism of Joly's "Dialogues" soon found its way to Russia. It was translated into Russian in 1872, and a consolidation of the "council of representatives" under the name "Rabbi's Speech" appeared in Russian in 1891. These works no doubt furnished the Russian secret police (Okhrana) with a means with which to strengthen the position of the weak Czar Nicholas II and discredit the reforms of the liberals who sympathized with the Jews. During the Dreyfus case of 1893-1895, agents of the Okhrana in Paris redacted the earlier works of Joly and Goedsche into a new edition which they called the "Protocols of the Elders of Zion." The manuscript of the Protocols was brought to Russia in 1895 and was printed privately in 1897.

The Protocols did not become public until 1905, when Russia's defeat in the Russo-Japanese War was followed by the Revolution in the same year, leading to the promulgation of a constitution and institution of the Duma. In the wake of these events, the reactionary "Union of the Russian Nation" or Black Hundreds organization sought to incite popular feeling against the Jews, who they blamed for the Revolution and the Constitution. To this end they used the Protocols, which was first published in a public edition by the mystic priest Sergius Nilus in 1905. The Protocols were part of propaganda campaign which accompanied the pogroms of 1905 inspired by the Okhrana. A variant text of the Protocols was published by George Butmi in 1906 and again in 1907. The edition of 1906 was found among the Czar's collection, even though he had already recognized the work as a forgery. In his later editions, Nilus claimed that the Protocols had been read secretly at the First Zionist Congress at Basle in 1897, while Butmi in his edition wrote that they had no connection with the new Zionist movement, but rather were part of the Masonic conspiracy.

In the civil war following the Bolshevik Revolution of 1917, the reactionary White Armies made extensive use of the Protocols to incite widespread slaughters of Jews. At the same time, Russian emigrants brought the Protocols to western Europe, where the Nilus edition served as the basis for many translations, starting in 1920. Just after its appearance in London in 1920, Lucien Wolf exposed the Protocols as a plagiary of the earlier work of Joly and Goedsche, in a pamphlet of the Jewish Board of Deputies. The following year, in 1921, the story of the forgery was published in a series of articles in the London Times by Philip Grave, the paper's correspondent in Constantinople. A whole book documenting the forgery was also published in the same year in America by Herman Bernstein. Nevertheless, the Protocols continued to circulate widely. They were even sponsored by Henry Ford in the United States until 1927, and formed an important part of the Nazis' justification of genocide of the Jews in World War II.

2.4 Oswald as a "Marksman"

The Marksmanship Ability of President Kennedy's Alleged Assassin by Michael T. Griffin

Mark Lane: Do you feel that the agents of the FBI actually tried to get you to change your statement that Oswald was a poor shot?

Nelson Delgado: Yes, sir, I definitely do.

Sherman Cooley: If I had to pick one man in the whole United States to shoot me, I'd pick Oswald. I saw the man shoot. There's no way he could have ever learned to shoot well enough to do what they accused him of doing in Dallas.

Many of the Marines mentioned that Oswald had a certain lack of coordination that, they felt, was responsible for the fact that he had difficulty learning to shoot. They believed it was the same deficiency in coordination responsible for his reported inability to drive a car.

US Marine Corps Master Snipers Fail Repeatedly to Duplicate Oswald's Purported Feat

Former US Marine snipers, Craig Roberts, and Gunnery Sergeant Carlos Hathcock, (who was the senior instructor for the US Marine Corps Sniper Instructor School at Quantico, Virginia) both said it could not be done as described by the FBI investigators.

"Let me tell you what we did at Quantico," Hathcock said. "We reconstructed the whole thing: the angle, the range, the moving target, the time limit, the obstacles, everything. I don't know how many times we tried it, but we couldn't duplicate what the Warren Commission said Oswald did. Now if I can't do it, how in the world could a guy who was a non-qual on the rifle range and later only qualified 'marksman' do it?"

The JFK Assassination Chronology

Compiled by Ira David Wood III

EXCERPT:

"Army code breaker Pfc. Eugene Dinkin is taken into custody by Army officials and hospitalized in a closed psychiatric ward. He is kept virtually incommunicado for approximately one week. Dinkin had gone AWOL weeks before and alerted various embassies across Europe about a conspiracy to assassinate the president involving the military and perhaps an "ultra right economic group." Dinkin eventually ends up in Walter Reed Army Hospital for four months -- where it appears that a "cover story" may have been induced to obfuscate whatever legitimate advance knowledge he possesses. Dinkin says that he believes that the psychiatric evaluation given him by the Army psychiatrist is, in fact, an attempt on their part to cover up the military plot which he has attempted to expose.

There is evidence that the White House, the CIA and the Attorney General's office were all in possession of Dinkin's explicit and detailed warning prior to JFK's assassination.

NOTE As of November 21, 1963 (the eve of the assassination) Private Eugene B. Dinkin, Richard Case Nagell, Gilberto Alvarado Ugarte, Joseph Milteer, Rose Cheramie and Abraham Bolden have all made public statements concerning the imminent assassination of JFK. Of these people, Dinkin, Cheramie, Nagell, and Ugarte are threatened with being declared to be mentally unstable. Secret Service Agent Bolden will be sent to prison on a charge of discussing a bribe with two counterfeiters. He will be subsequently released and will claim that he was framed by the Secret Service and convicted in order to silence him regarding the Kennedy threat.

3.1 General Edwin Walker

EXCERPTS: "Warren Commission Errors"

by Martin Shackelford

#23) The Commission flatly states that Oswald tried to kill General Edwin Walker, despite the fact that the bullet recovered from the scene was not compatible with his rifle. It only "became compatible" after the assassination, when it turned out to be a different kind of bullet than Dallas Police had reported it to be in April.

#24) We learn that Oswald returned to New Orleans, but not that he returned to the milieu of the Marcello crime family. We are also not told of the many employees of right-wing private detective Guy Banister who remember Oswald as another Banister employee -- or the students at Louisiana State University who recall seeing Banister and Oswald visiting the campus together -- or the editor of a CIA-supported newsletter on Central America who reported seeing them on the street, and in Mancuso's Restaurant (in the same building as Banister's office). David Ferrie also worked with Banister.

Walker Assassination Attempt Witness: "Two men ... different cars."

Car License Plate Obliterated in Photo Linking Oswald to the Attempt

On 10th April, 1963, Walker was victim of an assassination attempt while he sat at a desk in his Dallas home. It was later claimed that Lee Harvey Oswald had taken the shot at Walker. Marina Oswald reported that she "asked him what happened, and he said that he just tried to shoot General Walker. I asked him who General Walker was. I mean how dare you to go and claim somebody's life, and he said "Well, what would you say if somebody got rid of Hitler at the right time? So if you don't know about General Walker, how can you speak up on his behalf?" Because he told me ... he was something equal to what he called him a fascist."

However, there was a witness to the shooting. Kirk Coleman saw two men making their escape, one stopped to place something in the back of his Ford sedan, then they both drove off in different cars. As Oswald could not drive this has raised serious doubts if he could have been involved in this attempt on Walker's life.

After the assassination of President John F. Kennedy, a photograph of Walker's home was found among Oswald's possessions. When the photograph was turned over to the Warren Commission by the FBI, a hole had been pushed through it right in the spot where the license plate on the car had been, making the car unidentifiable (it did not belong to Walker). Another photograph, taken by the Dallas police, showed Oswald's possessions laid out on the floor of police headquarters. This included the photograph of Walker's home, without the hole obscuring the license plate.

"You had to see Dave Ferrie to believe him," says a New Orleans newsman, "and once you saw him you could never forget him." Ferrie was 48, completely hairless, and habitually wore glued-on eyebrows and had tufts of hair fastened at random on his head with spirit gum. He had a nasal voice, an antipathy to soap and a penchant for authoritative statements. He also had a long record of failure in a wildly disparate series of endeavors. Ferrie had been a teacher, an unsuccessful candidate for the priesthood, a pilot who had been discharged by Eastern Air Lines for homosexual activity, a "psychologist" with a "degree" from a diploma mill, a private investigator, a self-proclaimed cancer-cure researcher and an amateur hypnotist. In New Orleans he had become enmeshed with a group of anti-Castro Cubans and had been training teams of "guerrilla jungle fighters" for some future assault on Cuba.

Oswald Used Bannister's Address on His Leaflets

EXCERPT: Rearview Mirror, by William Turner

"I walked over to 531 Lafayette Place. There was no inscription on the door denoting it as Banister's business, only a realtor's shingle and a sticker of the then-nascent Republican Party of Louisiana. The door opened to stairs leading to a second-floor space that was unoccupied. Diagonally across the space was a second set of stairs, which led down to a door on Camp Street. The number over the door read "594." 594 Camp Street was the return address Lee Harvey Oswald had stamped on the first batch of pro-Castro literature he handed out on the streets of the Crescent City in August, 1963. Subsequent batches bore a post office box number, suggesting that the use of the street address had been a lapse. What was Oswald's connection to Banister?"

3.10 Eladio Del Valle

Pre-Castro Cuban Power Broker A Member of the "A Team" in Dallas

Before Fidel Castro's ascendance, Del Valle was a major player in Cuba, serving in military intelligence and running the narcotics wing of the police department. Exiled to Miami, Del Valle, having committed his life to taking Castro down, travelled to Dallas for the events of November 22nd. Robert Morrow, in his book, First Hand Knowledge, recalls Del Valle:

"On July 1, [1963], I was contacted by (CIA head of Domestic Operations Officer) Tracy Barnes. He requested that I purchase four Mannlicher 7.35 mm surplus rifles. According to Barnes, the rifles were available in the Baltimore area from Sunny's Supply Stores. Upon my agreement to make the purchase, Barnes requested that I alter the forepiece of each rifle so that the rifles could be dismantled, hidden and reassembled quickly. I thought this last request odd until I was informed that the rifles were to be used for a clandestine operation.

One day later I received a second phone call. It was Eladio del Valle calling from, I assumed, Miami. He asked me to supply him with four transceivers which were not detectable by any communications equipment then available on the market. Although his request seemed impossible, I told him that I had an idea which might fulfill his requirement. I could provide him with sub-miniaturized units whose operation would be confined to a range of fifty or one hundred kilohertz. To operate any sizable distance, the units would require an antenna at least several feet in length. A wire taped to the user's leg would easily suffice for this purpose. The set-up would not be pretty, but I could assure him that no one would be monitoring these low frequencies..."

In Dallas, at the O'Neil Funeral Home, Kennedy's body was tenderly wrapped in a linen shroud and placed in a bronze ceremonial casket.

By the time the body arrived in Bethesda Kennedy was in a cheap shipping casket, and wrapped in a body bag. Not content with this brutal murder carried out before women and children, Johnson's boys bereft Kennedy of his shroud, and he was found stripped naked when they unzipped the bag.

The Warren Commission Revisited: Forty Years of Lies
by John Chuckman

The doctors who worked to save the President at Parkland Hospital in Dallas said that the major visible damage to the President was a gaping wound near the rear of the skull, the kind of wound that typically reflects the exit of a bullet with the shock wave generated by its passing through layers of human tissue. We've all seen a plate glass window struck by a B-B where a tiny entrance puncture results in a large funnel-shaped chunk of cracked or missing glass on the opposite side.

The President's head wound, as described in Dallas, is not present in published autopsy photographs. Instead, there is a pencil-thin entrance-type wound in an unknown scalp. Although the Secret Service agent, Clint Hill, who climbed aboard the President's car after the shots, testified to seeing a large chunk of skull in the car and looking into the right rear of the President's head, seeing part of his brain gone, the autopsy photos show no such thing.....

"The case against Oswald is a flimsy tissue. It includes a poor autopsy of the victim offering no reliable evidence; a rifle whose ownership is not established; a rifle never definitively proved to have actually killed the President; a claim that jacketed bullets were used, a type of ammunition that could not possibly cause the kind of wounds to which many testify; the accused's record of mediocre marksmanship in the Marines; a paraffin test which showed no residue on his cheek despite his supposedly firing three shots from a bolt-action rifle; a single palm print claimed to have been obtained from the rifle after earlier failed attempts; gimmicky, suggestive photographs of Oswald with a rifle declared montages by several experts; a completely unacceptable evidence chain for the shell casings from the site of Officer Tippit's shooting, those submitted as evidence being almost certainly not those found at the scene; a bizarre history for the bullets supposed to have killed Tippit; an illogical weighting of witnesses who told different stories about Tippit's shooting; plus many other strange and contradictory details."

3.18 Oswald had FBI Agent James Hosty's Phone Number in his Wallet when Arrested

"Hosty's name, phone number and license plate number were in Oswald's wallet when he was arrested. Voice stress analysis as a lie detector method is widely accepted in Canadian courts of law and is allowed as legal lie detector evidence in over a dozen U.S. states...

The Dallas police radio system was jammed by a signal of unknown origin from two minutes before the fatal shots, to five minutes after, blocking all police communications on the main channel.

Before the House Assassinations Committee Hearings in 1976 the FBI and the CIA both admitted to obstructing justice and withholding evidence from the Warren Commission, major felonies that were never prosecuted.

Hosty Referenced in a November 12th Letter from "Oswald" to the Russian Embassy

... A letter, purportedly from Oswald ... was mailed from Irving, Texas on November 12 to the Soviet Embassy in Washington. In this letter, the writer spoke of "my meetings [sic] with comrade Kostin in the Embassy of the Soviet Union, Mexico City." The letter also alluded suggestively to the lack of time there "to complete our business." Even more alarmingly, the author revealed knowledge that the Consul in the Cuban Embassy had been "replaced." (The CIA confirmed later that Consul Azque "was scheduled to leave in October but did not leave until November 18.") And finally the writer spoke of speaking with Dallas FBI Agent James Hosty on November 1, a claim which would cause considerable post-assassination embarrassment to the FBI at the very highest levels.

3.20 The Paraffin Test on Oswald's Cheek

Sixteen Questions on the Assassination
By Bertrand Russell

The first theory announced by the authorities was that the President's car was in Houston Street, approaching the book depository building, when Oswald opened fire. When available photographs and eyewitnesses had shown this to be quite untrue, the theory was abandoned and a new one formulated which placed the vehicle in its correct position. Meanwhile, however, D.A. Wade had announced that three days after Oswald's room in Dallas had been searched, a map had been found there on which the book depository building had been circled and dotted lines drawn from the building to a vehicle on Houston Street, showing the alleged bullet trajectory had been planned in advance. After the first theory was proved false, the Associated Press put out the following story on November 27: "Dallas authorities announced today that there never was a map."

In the name of national security, the [Warren] Commission's hearings were held in secret, thereby continuing the policy which has marked the entire course of the case. This prompts my second question:

If, as we are told, Oswald was the lone assassin, where is the issue of national security?

Indeed, precisely the same question must be put here as was posed in France during the Dreyfus case: If the Government is so certain of its case, why has it conducted all its inquiries in the strictest secrecy?

The authorities interrogated Oswald for nearly 48 hours without allowing him to contact a lawyer, despite his repeated requests to do so. The director of the FBI in Dallas was a man with considerable experience. American Civil Liberties Union lawyers were in Dallas requesting to see Oswald and were not allowed to do so. By interrogating Oswald for 48 hours without access to lawyers, the FBI created conditions which made a trial of Oswald more difficult. A confession or evidence obtained from a man held 48 hours in custody is likely to be inadmissible in a U.S. court of law. The FBI director conducted his interrogation in a manner which made the use of material secured in such a fashion worthless to him.

This raises the question of whether he expected the trial to take place.

Another falsehood concerning the shooting was a story circulated by the Associated Press on November 23 from Los Angeles. This reported Oswald's former superior officer in the Marine Corps as saying that Oswald was a crack shot and a hot-head. The story was published widely.

Three hours later AP sent out a correction deleting the entire story from Los Angeles. The officer had checked his records and it had turned out that he was talking about another man. He had never known Oswald. To my knowledge the correction has yet to be published by a single major publication.

The Dallas police took a paraffin test on Oswald's face and hands to try to establish that he had fired a weapon on November 22. The Chief of the Dallas Police, Jesse Curry, announced on November 23 that the result of the test "proves Oswald is the assassin." The Director of the FBI in the Dallas-Fort Worth area in charge of the investigation stated: "I have seen the paraffin test. The paraffin test proves that Oswald had nitrates and gunpowder on his hands and face. It proves he fired a rifle on November 22." Not only does this unreliable test not prove any such thing, it was later discovered that the test on Oswald's face was in fact negative, suggesting that it was unlikely he fired a rifle that day. Why was the result of the paraffin test altered before being announced by the authorities?

4.1 Phony Secret Service Agents in Dealey Plaza

The Man Who Wasn't There... Was There
by Michael T. Griffith

"After the shooting, Dallas Police officer Joe M. Smith encountered another suspicious man in the lot behind the picket fence [on the grassy knoll]. Smith told the Warren Commission that when he drew his pistol and approached the man, the man "showed [Smith] that he was a Secret Service agent." ... These reports continue to be the subject of much controversy. Why? Because it has long been established that no genuine Secret Service agents on the ground in Dealey Plaza until later that afternoon.

Dallas: Many Teams of Men--
Isolated on a "Need-to-Know" Basis

Twyman's interview with Hargraves confirmed an initial 1964 report to the FBI of Hargraves as JFK suspect with Hargraves admitting going to Dallas as part of a team used to support the President's assassination. Hargraves admitted to holding false secret service identification and also identified Vidal Santiago as the leader for this team, stating that its orders came from individuals at CIA JM WAVE headquarters in Miami.

Chauncey Holt: Roused at the Scene

The Third of the "Three Tramps" -- CIA Provider of Forged Documents

When the Kennedy motorcade reached the Dealey Plaza Holt was in the parking lot behind the Grassy Knoll. After the shooting took place Holt went to hide in a railroad car. He was joined by Charles Harrelson and Charles Rogers. However, soon afterwards, Dallas police officers entered the railroad car and arrested all three men. The three men along with Jim Brading were interviewed by Gordon Shanklin of the FBI and then released...

EXCERPT: Interview with Chauncey Holt

“So we started looking into an old line company -- the Los Angeles Stamp and Stationary Company, LASCO, which was owned by Philip Shore. He was the board director, and he was in dire financial straits. So the Company came in and bailed him out. They did all types of badges, banners, that sort of thing. They had police badges actually, from every municipality in the United States. They had drawers of them. So it was the type of operation the CIA was looking for...

Sometime between April and June of 1963 was when we first delivered the first documents and leaflets to Oswald. We were given instructions, Dave Palmer gave us instructions. He gave us the copy for them, and we printed them up...

As far as who Oswald was, we got to see that there was some kind of a disinformation program because Oswald's name was on documentation and it wasn't his picture. And others had his picture and his name, although at the time we had never seen Oswald and we didn't know which one was the real guy... I mean it could have been one of the others...

As it wore on, we began getting inquiries as to whether we could do the Secret Service documents, which is very different than doing other types because its in book form and it includes little recognitions like the lapel pins they wore every day.

In an emergency, in their coming and going, they are recognized by those pins. LASCO was set up nicely to do this kind of thing because they provide badges for police departments. They do all kinds of badges. So action really picked up and we were asked, in November, to produce a whole range, not all the Secret Service documents, just certain ones. We produced about, between November 15th... we received orders on November 15th, on the type of pins that were going to be worn in Dallas that day. The pins themselves, it wasn't the background, that never changed, it was the markings on the pins that determined what was going to be used that day...

We were under a time constraint for when we received the order November 15th, and were told that we had to be in Dallas on the night of the 21st...

The Murder of Mary Pinchot Meyer

Meyer asked [Ann] Truitt to take possession of a private diary "if anything ever happened to me"... Ann Truitt was living in Tokyo at the time of the murder. She phoned Ben Bradlee at his home and asked him if he had found the diary. Bradlee, who claimed he was unaware of his sister-in-law's affair with Kennedy, knew nothing about the diary. He later recalled what he did after Truitt's phone-call: "We didn't start looking until the next morning, when Tony and I walked around the corner a few blocks to Mary's house. It was locked, as we had expected, but when we got inside, we found [CIA counterintelligence chief] Jim Angleton, and to our complete surprise he told us he, too, was looking for Mary's diary."

Scott was introduced to a "high-ranking officer who had obviously read the manuscript," who told him that "they had been forced to delete portions of the manuscript for national security."

"What portions?" the surviving Scott inquired.

"Well, there was some mention of Lee Harvey Oswald in some area," the CIA officer said, "and we don't want to make that public."

Jack Ruby died of "a galloping cancer" in 1967. When he visited Ferrie's apartment in the summer of 1963, Judyth showed him the lab and told him about the cancer cell injections --including where on the body the injections should be administered
Note: In jail, Ruby insisted he was injected with cancer cells, but no one took him seriously. His mind was shot and they just assumed it was incoherent babbling.

<http://members.aol.com/doestar/jb.html>

Jack Ruby's Death by Cancer

Keep in mind that the CIA developed methods to "make it look like an accident." This was documented through the testimony of CIA technicians to the Church committee who told of TWEP technology (Termination With Extreme Prejudice) in 1975. These methods are designed to not be detected in postmortem examinations. I have a couple of excerpts of declassified CIA documents to demonstrate the case. One of the techniques involves the injection of cancer cells, heart attack inducement, as well as non- chemical techniques which require no special equipment.

Based on the strange circumstances of Jack Ruby's death in prison (he died from lung cancer but the cancer cells were not the type that originate in the respiratory system), Ruby wrote notes and spoke to several people saying that JFK was killed by a conspiracy and that he had been maneuvered into killing Oswald who was a fall guy. He claimed to have been injected with cancer cells when treated with shots for a cold. He died just before he was to testify in Congress. He had told congressional investigators that he wanted to talk but he needed protection.

4.12 Santo Trafficante and Frank Ragano

A Parting Observation.

<http://www.spartacus.schoolnet.co.uk/JFKraganoF.htm>

Richard Nixon's Greatest Cover-Up:

His Ties to the Assassination of President Kennedy by Don Fulsom

On the morning after the assassination, Nixon convened a meeting of Republican leaders at his New York apartment. Those assembled were "already assessing how this event would affect or recreate the possibilities of Nixon running for president," according to Hess.

Boasting that he was the mastermind of a Mob/CIA plot to kill President Kennedy, Chicago godfather Sam Giancana told relatives he was in Dallas on Nov. 22, 1963 to supervise that plot. Giancana claimed that both "Richard Nixon and Lyndon Johnson knew about the whole damn thing" -- adding that he had met with both future presidents in Dallas "immediately prior to the assassination."

Giancana's half-brother Chuck and nephew Sam claimed in their 1992 book Double Cross that the Mafia don had a long, warm, and mutually rewarding relationship with Nixon that dated back to the 1940s. In those times, Giancana was helping Chicago Syndicate boss Anthony Accardo consolidate the city's rackets and gambling operations, and Nixon was a freshman congressman from California.

In recounting for his relatives a big favor the congressman did for Giancana back then, the gangster established a direct link between Nixon and a Chicago hoodlum who later moved to Texas and went on to shoot Lee Harvey Oswald: "Nixon's done me some favors, all right, got us some highway contracts, worked with the unions and overseas. And we've helped him and his CIA buddies out, too. Shit, he even helped my guy in Texas, (Jack) Ruby, get out of testifying in front of Congress back in forty-seven By sayin' Ruby worked for him."

A 1947 memo, found in 1975 by a scholar going through a pile of recently released FBI documents, supports Giancana's contention. In the memo, addressed to a congressional committee investigating organized crime, an FBI assistant states: "It is my sworn testimony that one Jack Rubenstein of Chicago is performing information functions for the staff of Congressman Richard Nixon, Republican of California. It is requested Rubenstein not be called for open testimony in the aforementioned hearings."

4.14 Mac Wallace: Lyndon Johnson's "Wet Man"

How Johnson Got His Hooks In.....

Wallace was charged with murder but was released on bail after Edward Clark arranged for two of Johnson's financial supporters, M. E. Ruby and Bill Carroll, to post bonds on behalf of the defendant. Johnson's attorney, John Cofer, also agreed to represent Wallace.

On 1st February, 1952, Wallace resigned from his government job in order to distance himself from Lyndon B. Johnson. His trial began seventeen days later. Wallace did not testify. Cofer admitted his client's guilt but claimed it was an act of revenge as Kinser had been sleeping with Wallace's wife.

The jury found Wallace guilty of "murder with malice aforethought." Eleven of the jurors were for the death penalty. The twelfth argued for life imprisonment. Judge Charles O. Betts overruled the jury and announced a sentence of five years imprisonment. He suspended the sentence and Wallace was immediately freed.

According to Bill Adler of The Texas Observer, several of the jurors telephoned John Kinser's parents to apologize for agreeing to a "suspended sentence, but said they did so only because threats had been made against their families."

4.15 Bobby Baker:

The Short Strokes of His Underworld Connections

http://www.demopedia.democraticunderground.com/index.php/Bobby_Baker

EXCERPT: from the Gathered Commentary of a Multitude of Observers

"LBJ faced some pretty awful prospects, including not only being dumped from the 1964 ticket but also spending a long, long time in the slammer as a result of his role in the rapidly expanding Bobby Baker case -- something few have speculated about because the full facts were never revealed by the media, which didn't want to know, or report, the truth Bobby Kennedy called five of Washington's top reporters into his office and told them it was now open season on Lyndon Johnson. It's OK, he told them, to go after the story they were ignoring out of deference to the administration. And from that point on until the events in Dallas, Lyndon Baines Johnson's future looked as if it included a sudden end to his political career and a few years in the slammer. The Kennedys had their knives out and sharpened for him and were determined to draw his political blood -- all of it.

In the Senate, the investigation into the Baker case was moving quickly ahead. Even the Democrats were cooperating, thanks to the Kennedys, and an awful lot of really bad stuff was being revealed -- until Nov. 22, 1963. By Nov. 23, all Democrat cooperation suddenly stopped. Lyndon would serve a term and a half in the White House instead of the slammer, the Baker investigation would peter out and Bobby Baker would serve a short sentence and go free.

Dallas accomplished all of that."

4.16 Richard Nixon

Nixon's Cover-Up of His Ties to the Assassination of President Kennedy by Don Fulsom

[This is a Reiteration of Reference 4.12]

On the morning after the assassination, Nixon convened a meeting of Republican leaders at his New York apartment. Those assembled were "already assessing how this event would affect or recreate the possibilities of Nixon running for president," according to Hess.

Boasting that he was the mastermind of a Mob/CIA plot to kill President Kennedy, Chicago godfather Sam Giancana told relatives he was in Dallas on Nov. 22, 1963 to supervise that plot. Giancana claimed that both "Richard Nixon and Lyndon Johnson knew about the whole damn thing" -- adding that he had met with both future presidents in Dallas "immediately prior to the assassination."

Giancana's half-brother Chuck and nephew Sam claimed in their 1992 book Double Cross that the Mafia don had a long, warm, and mutually rewarding relationship with Nixon that dated back to the 1940s. In those times, Giancana was helping Chicago Syndicate boss Anthony Accardo consolidate the city's rackets and gambling operations, and Nixon was a freshman congressman from California.

In recounting for his relatives a big favor the congressman did for Giancana back then, the gangster established a direct link between Nixon and a Chicago hoodlum who later moved to Texas and went on to shoot Lee Harvey Oswald: "Nixon's done me some favors, all right, got us some highway contracts, worked with the unions and overseas. And we've helped him and his CIA buddies out, too. Shit, he even helped my guy in Texas, (Jack) Ruby, get out of testifying in front of Congress back in forty-seven By sayin' Ruby worked for him."

A 1947 memo, found in 1975 by a scholar going through a pile of recently released FBI documents, supports Giancana's contention. In the memo, addressed to a congressional committee investigating organized crime, an FBI assistant states: "It is my sworn testimony that one Jack Rubenstein of Chicago is performing information functions for the staff of Congressman Richard Nixon, Republican of California. It is requested Rubenstein not be called for open testimony in the aforementioned hearings."

The Tragic Plane Crash Death of Dorothy Hunt

Wife of Watergate Burglar (and Dallas Operative) E Howard Hunt (She was Carrying the Hush Money Howard Had Blackmailed Nixon to Get)

Excerpt of an interview with independent investigator Sherman Skolnick from The Spotlight, a nightly radio call-in talk forum hosted by Tom Valentine on Radio Free America. February 14, 1994

TV: The Watergate plane crash is the first investigation you and I worked on together.

SS: This subject is one of the great forbidden subjects of this country. You are not supposed to talk publicly about airplanes that have been sabotaged. If sabotage is ever brought up, it's always in some foreign country where a bomb blows up the airplane.

TV: Then the loss of the United Airlines flight 553 was not just fog or pilot error or something like that.

SS: In the history of aviation there have been a number of situations where there was actual sabotage - not necessarily a bomb - and that sabotage put the plane down and killed people for political reasons.

I started writing a book about airplane sabotage right after the plane crash. I called it "The Watergate Plane Crash." The reason why was because on this one plane were 12 people connected with the Watergate affair.

The disaster happened exactly one month after Richard Nixon had been re-elected. The Watergate affair had started, but it was not widely known at the time.

Former CIA man (and Watergate burglar) E. Howard Hunt, part of the so-called White House Plumbers, was under arrest. It later came out that Hunt was threatening to blow the lid off the White House if Nixon didn't take care of him. Hunt wanted $2 million.

What Hunt reportedly had was information tending to show that Nixon, who was in Dallas at the time John F. Kennedy was murdered, was complicit in the assassination. Hunt's wife Dorothy was carrying around "hush" money to various witnesses in an effort to silence them about the Watergate affair.

She was on flight 553, and this time she was traveling under her own name. She was so concerned about the baggage (which contained $2 million worth of cashier's checks and money orders, which some astute people could have traced back to the Nixon White House) that she bought an extra first class seat for her baggage (and the valuables therein).

The press later said there was only $10,000 in her possession, but that was false. We know about this because of records of the National Transportation Safety Board which had the manifest of the airplane.

It was here that Hoffa recorded the president having sex with Marilyn Monroe, and in between, he also recorded highly confidential conversations about firing the FBI Director.”

EXCERPTS :

From the Manuscript of Deputy Craig (who Saw Oswald Picked Up Behind the Depository, and Claimed that the Rifle Found on the Sixth Floor of the Depository was a Mauser)

AND MORE:

Based on an apparent lack of other bullets recovered from the President's body or the limousine or elsewhere, the Commission concluded that CE 399 [the "magic bullet"] had inflicted all of the non-fatal wounds upon President Kennedy and Governor John B. Connally. There were seven non-fatal wounds to account for. The Commission said that one bullet struck Kennedy in the upper back or neck area; exited through the front of his neck; struck Connally in the back; transited his torso, shattering several inches of rib; exited his chest; struck Connally's wrist, shattering the radius; exited the other side of his wrist; entered his left thigh; and someone made its way out again, to be found wedged under the mattress on an unidentified stretcher at Parkland Memorial Hospital, in nearly pristine condition (i.e., unmutilated by contact with skin, bone, etc.) with no blood or tissue on its surface.

This "single bullet theory" was necessary when the Commission recognized that a) Oswald could not have fired more than three shots in the allotted time span, which happened to coincide with the three spent shells found in the Book Depository; b) one shot missed the limousine altogether, striking the road near James Tague, where the bullet mark was photographed by a newsman in Dealey Plaza, as well as a shot of Tague's bleeding cheek; and c) that one bullet caused President Kennedy's fatal head wound, which was known to have been inflicted some seconds after the other known wounds. That left one bullet, one bullet which had to have caused all the other wounds, or else Oswald couldn't possibly have been the lone assassin -- and the Commission would have to conclude that a conspiracy killed President Kennedy.

A startling, new fact has emerged recently, from where it had been buried deep inside the National Archives for thirty-five years: Newly discovered documents prove that the Dallas Police did not find three spent shells in the Texas School Book Depository; they found TWO, along with one LIVE (unfired) round.

These documents include:

1) A Dallas Police Department report dated November 22, 1963, signed by Lt. Carl Day, the DPD's identifications expert, noting that evidence is being turned over to the jurisdiction of the FBI. It states that the listed items were found in the Texas School Book Depository between 1:30 and 2:15 pm that day. The items are the Mannlicher-Carcano rifle, serial number C2766 (allegedly traced later to Oswald), and, an exact quote: "2 Spent Hulls from 6th floor window." Lt. Day's signature is followed by that of Officer R. L. Studebaker, who witnessed the transfer of the evidence from Lt. Day to FBI Agent Vince Drain, who "took possession of all evidence."

2) A copy of the receipt of these items by the FBI: "1 6.5 Rifle #C2766" and "2 Spent hulls found at [illegible] School Book Depository."

- 3) A handwritten receipt for these additional items from the DPD: "2 [photographic] negatives + 4 prints of each of two 6.5 hulls + 1 "live" round of 6.5 ammunition from rifle found on 6th floor of Texas school [sic] Book Depository, Dallas on 11-22-63."
- 4) The original FBI evidence sheet for all items in their possession purportedly belonging to Lee Harvey Oswald, which lists "Live round 6.5" and "6.5 spent rounds (2)." This report was originally introduced into evidence as Commission Exhibit 2003, and published on page 260 of the Warren Commission's twenty-fourth volume of evidence, but -- as J. Gary Shaw and Larry Harris noted in their 1976 book, Cover-Up -- the published version's "6.5 spent rounds (2)" has the two altered to a three that appears to be handwritten. These and the following items are reproduced in full in Noel Twyman's 1997 book Bloody Treason.
- 5) Commission Exhibits 510 and 512, two police photographs of the three spent shells as they were allegedly found near the sixth floor window. Noel Twyman points out that in CE 510, one of the three hulls appears to be a live round; while the same hull in CE 512 (63) has been conspicuously blacked out, with a crude forgery of a shell drawn or scratched onto the negative.
- 6) The original FBI evidence envelope, signed by Special Agent J. Doyle Williams, which once contained the above-mentioned negatives and photographs of the spent shells from the Book Depository: "2 negatives and 4 prints of each," listing, "two 6.5 bullet hulls + 1 "live" round of 6.5 ammunition from rifle found on 6th floor of Texas Book Depository [sic], Dallas on 11-22-63."
- 7) And the frosting on the cake, discovered in the National Archives recently by researcher Anna-Marie Kuhns-Walko, one of the actual DPD photographs depicting (you guessed it) two spent shells and one live round.

Subsequently a third spent shell was added to the evidence. Whoever it was who ordered this third shell planted was also powerful enough to ensure not a single Dallas policeman, Sheriff's deputy or official would reveal to the Warren Commission that their signed, dated records of evidence had been altered and replaced, and that a third spent shell had been introduced as being from the Book Depository.

5.1 CIA Support for Radical Islam in Central Asia

Born in the CIA

by Amjad Hussain

“There are hundreds of similar madrassas in Pakistan and Afghanistan. How a religious school located along the turbulent North Western Frontier of Pakistan came to be the training ground for the likes of Taliban of Afghanistan and their supporters in Pakistan is an interesting question. The answer, however, lies not in the devastated Afghan countryside or in Pakistan but in Langley, Virginia, the home of America's Central Intelligence Agency.”

http://www.totse.com/en/politics/central_intelligence_agency/162381.html

In the Name of Allah

by Nadeem Maik

“There are an estimated 10,000 to 15,000 madrassas across Pakistan. These schools, largely frequented by destitute Afghans and poor Pakistanis, are run by individual charities and rely almost exclusively on donations. During the Afghan jihad days in the 1980s, the US Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), Saudi Arabia and the other Gulf states generously financed them. Some estimates suggest that the CIA also recruited almost 30,000 jihadis from the Middle East to fight against the Soviets, and channeled billions of dollars to run the operation.”

http://www.atimes.com/atimes/South_Asia/GG27Df02.html

The United States and Pakistan:

A Treacherous Alliance

When the Soviet Union [in response to an American sponsored Coup d'Etat] invaded Afghanistan in the fall of 1979, the U.S. began offering aid to General Zia-al-Haq's brutal military regime in Pakistan. ... Pakistan was enlisted to train Afghan fighters, supply them with modern weapons, and provide logistical and diplomatic support. And in return, the U.S. gave Pakistan an impressive amount of military and economic aid. Pakistan's intelligence agency, the Inter-Services Intelligence bureau (ISI) became the CIA's chief conduit for weapons and billions of dollars in funding for the anti-Soviet effort in Afghanistan.

And when the CIA and Pakistan's ISI trained tens of thousands of Muslims from around the world to fight in Afghanistan, Osama bin Laden was one of the key organizers of the effort.

Poverty-stricken refugee camps sprung up along the Pakistani border. And young men in these camps were educated in the madrassas (Islamic schools) and then recruited to be cannon fodder for the CIA/Pakistani-sponsored war in Afghanistan.

Afghanistan: The History

By 1987, the US is sending more than 65,000 tons of arms annually to the Mujahideen, especially Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, leader of the most ruthless and puritanical faction [and King of the Heroin Trade].. CIA and Pentagon operatives help the ISI establish a network of schools in Pakistan and bases in Afghanistan to train the Mujahideen in secure communications, covert financial transactions, guerilla warfare, urban sabotage and heavy weapons.

“It is well-known that the ISI was a CIA cut-out in the arming of Afghan guerillas, and that BCCI laundered opium profits for the war against the Soviets. (Dozens of al Qaeda histories and timelines on the Internet weave the Byzantine maze of Bush administration/CIA/bin Laden connections to BCCI, so the banking network won't be discussed in this account unless necessary.)”

1984-1994: US Supports Militant Textbooks for Afghanistan per 911 Timeline

The US, through USAID and the University of Nebraska, spends millions of dollars developing and printing textbooks for Afghan schoolchildren. The textbooks are filled with violent images and militant Islamic teachings, part of covert attempts to spur resistance to the Soviet occupation.

For instance, children are taught to count with illustrations showing tanks, missiles, and land mines. Lacking any alternative, millions of these textbooks are used long after 1994; the Taliban are still using them in 2001.

In 2002, the US will start producing less violent versions of the same books, which President Bush says will have “respect for human dignity, instead of indoctrinating students with fanaticism and bigotry.” (He will fail to mention who created those earlier books.)

John P. O'Neill per Reference.com

On his first day, he received a call from Richard A. Clarke, who had just learned that Ramzi Yousef had been located in Pakistan. O'Neill worked continuously over the next few days to gather information and coordinate the successful capture and extradition of Yousef. Intrigued by the case, O'Neill continued to study the 1993 bombing Yousef had masterminded and other information about Islamic militants. He was directly involved in the investigation into the 1996 bombing of the Khobar Towers in Saudi Arabia. Frustrated by the level of cooperation from the Saudis, O'Neill purportedly vented to FBI director Louis Freeh, saying that they were "blowing smoke up your ass."

5.5 John O'Neill Not Sent to Africa to Head Up the Embassy Bombings Investigation Interview with Former US Deputy Attorney General Fran Townsend

"..... The FBI's ... going to deploy people initially to Kenya and Tanzania, and who's going to be the on-scene commander? Who's going to have responsibility for the investigation on the ground in those countries? ...

..... As Jimmy Kallstrom has said to you, he was a great leader, and he really wanted to roll up his sleeves and get into it; he wanted to be there and wanted responsibility. He believed -- and I think rightly -- the New York field office had the greatest depth of expertise of anybody in the country on this issue.

If it's Al Qaeda, how could you send anybody else but the people who know the most?

[Deputy Director Tom] Pickard decides, at least in the initial stage, to assign the office of origin responsibility to the Washington field office. ... 5.6 Barbara Bodine Undercuts the FBI Investigation into the Bombing of the USS Cole
by Mark Ames

“... As O'Neill and his team probed deeper into the Cole bombing, his investigation was abruptly thwarted by, of all people, the United States ambassador to Yemen, Barbara Bodine. In the official version reported in the American press almost a year later, O'Neill's team was booted out of Yemen in November, 2000, because Bodine objected to O'Neill's "heavy-handed style." Another State Department source at the time confirmed that Bodine refused to allow O'Neill and his team to return to continue their investigation because his team was "too large" and many of the agents carried "heavy weapons" -- automatics -- that she found objectionable.

This account of how a local ambassador was able to thwart the single most important investigation to America's national security just because she didn't like the lead investigator's manners is impossible to swallow. What's more incredible is that the FBI allegedly wasn't allowed to return to Yemen to continue their investigation until Bodine left her ambassadorship in August 2001. Keep that date in mind, August 2001. A lot of people seemed to retire right around then..... “

New Light on the Life and Death of John O'Neill
By Tom Griffin

“... There were some obstacles that O'Neill's charismatic persona couldn't overcome, however. That first became clear after the Khobar Towers bombings in Saudi Arabia in 1996, which killed 19 American soldiers. According to his friend Chris Isham, O'Neill "felt the Saudis were definitely playing games and that the senior officials in the US government just didn't get it".

Similar problems dogged O'Neill's investigation of the 2000 bombing of the USS Cole in Yemen, when he clashed so severely with US ambassador Barbara Bodine that he was refused clearance to enter the country.“

Who Killed 9/11 Hero John O'Neill?

If you believe the media, John P. O'Neill was simply another innocent victim killed in the September 11 attacks on the World Trade Center. But you don't need much imagination to suspect something deeper was at work.... "The main obstacles to investigate Islamic terrorism were US oil corporate interests, and the role played by Saudi Arabia in it," O'Neill reportedly told the authors of an explosive new book, Hidden Truth (Forbidden Truth in the US), by intelligence analysts Charles Brisard and Guillaume Dasquie. Brisard met O'Neill several times last summer and reports that O'Neill complained bitterly that the US State Department -- and behind it the oil lobby who make up President Bush's entourage -- blocked attempts to prove bin Laden's guilt.

US Government Obstruction of Terrorism Investigations

FBI agents allegedly had advance knowledge of dates, targets, financial transactions, and the names of the perpetrators of the impending terrorist attacks. But they claim that they were ignored or legally obstructed.

Experienced FBI agent John O'Neill claims that his investigation of Osama bin Laden was opposed and obstructed by the White House. And FBI agent Ken Williams, who investigated terrorist suspects at flight schools in Phoenix, was reallocated halfway through his investigation.

The Minneapolis FBI sought permission from FBI central headquarters to examine the laptop computer belonging to flight student Moussaoui, as they suspected he had plans to "fly something into the World Trade Center." They were refused four times.

The FBI, CIA, and Federal Aviation Administration had been aware as far back as 1995 that al-Qaeda had developed a plan to use passenger aircraft as bombs -- although today the existence of such information is denied.

Now it is being alleged that both the FBI and the CIA intentionally blocked investigations that could have averted the catastrophe.

The Politics of Crime

Brigadier General James Mattis Ignored

“..... By now, the Taliban's stronghold in Kandahar had fallen or, more correctly, had been abandoned by the soldiers of the regime. The Taliban retreat from Kandahar was emblematic of the war.

None of Afghanistan's cities had been won by force alone. Taliban fighters, after intense bombing, had simply made strategic withdrawals. A number of American officers were now convinced that this was about to happen at Tora Bora, too.

One of them was Brig. Gen. James N. Mattis, the commander of some 4,000 marines who had arrived in the Afghan theater by now.

Mattis, along with another officer with whom I spoke, was convinced that with these numbers he could have surrounded and sealed off bin Laden's lair, as well as deployed troops to the most sensitive portions of the largely unpatrolled border with Pakistan. He argued strongly that he should be permitted to proceed to the Tora Bora caves.

The general was turned down.”

[Reiteration of Reference 5.4]

[THIS IS A CRITICAL DOCUMENT]

EXCERPT:

“So, to elaborate further on this (so far) fruitful hypothesis, it is my contention that al-Qaida and bin Laden are elaborate "legends" set up to promote a plausibly sophisticated and ferocious enemy to stand against American interests.

I am not, however, implying that bin Laden himself is a total fabrication. Rather, it is my contention that confederates, believing themselves to act on behalf of bin Laden, are being set up in a "false flag operation" to perform operations as their controllers see fit.

And who are these controllers? If they're anything resembling the folks who brought you Hizbullah and Hamas, you wouldn't be sweating the suitcase nukes (made in America), the Ames strain anthrax (made in America), the MI5-like "sleeper agents" and coded "go" messages. Instead, you would be dodging primitive nail bombs and road mines -- and not needing Abdel Bari Atwan to feed you the lowdown on the blame.....

A relatively few well-connected correspondents provide the "scoops" that get the coverage in the relatively few mainstream news sources -- the four TV networks, TIME, Newsweek, CNN -- where the parameters of debate are set and the "official reality" is consecrated for the bottom feeders in the news chain.

In other countries, this is what is known as propaganda -- or, put less politely, psychological warfare.”

"Sheikh was their (the ISI's) man and he was brought in to deal with Pearl. The ISI knew everything." The Karachi police, who deeply distrust the ISI, leaked details of their interrogation of Sheikh in which he talked about his ISI connections. As a result, ISI operatives broke into the newsroom of The News, Pakistan's largest English language newspaper, in February in an apparent attempt to prevent publication of a leak in which Sheikh was reported to have said that the ISI helped him to finance, plan and execute last December's attack on the Indian parliament.

6.4 Omar Saeed Sheikh, 9/11 and Pakistan's ISI

By Abid Ullah Jan

Published: July 14, 2006

Vanity Fair reported in its September 2002 edition that, after being released from prison at the end of 1999, Saeed Sheikh was given a house by the ISI. Newsweek (April 13, 2002) reports that he lived openly and opulently in Pakistan, even attending "swanky parties attended by senior Pakistani government officials." The U.S. authorities confirmed that he was an asset of the ISI.

An asset of the ISI means an asset of the U.S. and British authorities as well -- which is why it is not amazing that he was allowed to travel freely to Britain and visit his family there. Saeed Sheikh traveled to Britain at least twice before that time, despite having kidnapped Britons and Americans in 1993 and 1994.

General Mahmood Promoted to Head the ISI After Musharraf's 1999 Coup

When Musharraf seized power on October 12, 1999, the army had two identified [fundamentalists] in the rank of lieutenant general -- Mohammad Aziz Khan, who was then the chief of the general staff and Muzaffar Usmani, the then corps commander, Karachi.

Subsequently, Musharraf appointed Mohammad Aziz Khan as commander of one of the two corps in Lahore and Usmani as deputy chief of the army staff. It was the triumvirate of Usmani as corps commander, Karachi, Mohammad Aziz Khan as the CGS and Mahmood Ahmed, as the then corps commander of Rawalpindi, which staged the coup against Nawaz Sharif, the then prime minister, in Musharraf's absence from the country and paved the way for his installation as the military dictator with the designation of chief executive. They refused to accept Nawaz Sharif's order dismissing Musharraf as chief of the army staff and appointing Lieutenant General Ziauddin, the then director general of the Inter-Services Intelligence, in his place. They had both Nawaz Sharif and Ziauddin arrested.

After taking over, Musharraf appointed Lieutenant General Mahmood Ahmed as the DG of the ISI.

MARGARET WARNER: He's the intelligence chief.

ROBERT OAKLEY: He's the intelligence chief that Mansoor was talking about. He was in the country [the United States] at the time of these events. He spent a lot of time talking to senior U.S. officials.

MARGARET WARNER: He was here at the time of the bombings last week?

ROBERT OAKLEY: Yes. And they trust him. He's been their chief supporter -- interlocutor. And so if there's anybody who can bring home to them the magnitude of what's happened and the response, the very power of the response is General Mahmood with the backing of General Musharraf. General Musharraf and General Mahmood and the other members of the ruling Junta have decided to put their fate on the line, the fate of Pakistan on the line....

Richard Armitage

Richard Armitage and the ISI by Dennis L Cuddy, Ph. D,

Why would an American government official become so involved with Pakistan? For one thing, most CIA covert operations in that part of the world have been run through the ISI. Also, Pakistan is geopolitically important in obtaining oil from the Caspian region where Kazakhstan is located. Armitage (whose business clients have included Halliburton's Brown & Root division, Boeing, Goldman Sachs and Chase Manhattan) and Dick Cheney in the 1990s had business or consulting interests in the Caspian region (Cheney has been CEO of Halliburton and on the Kazakhstan Oil Advisory Board), and in 1997 Armitage was contacted by the oil and gas giant UNOCAL to work for its Central Asia pipeline interests. Armitage also co-authored the July 2000 report of The Commission on America's National Interests, which described the need for obtaining oil from the Caspian region. The recalcitrant Taliban rulers of Afghanistan, however, were standing in the way of moving the oil and gas from that region to Pakistan, the U.S., and elsewhere.

"Musharraf: From CIA with Love?" by B. Raman

"Some circles in the US see a linkage between the recent high-profile visit of Mr. Richard Armitage, US Deputy Secretary of State, to New Delhi, the unpublicised visit of Mr. George Tenet, Director of the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), to Islamabad where he had an unusually long meeting with Gen. Pervez Musharraf, the self-styled Chief Executive of Pakistan, and the surprise decision of the Government of India to invite the General to New Delhi for talks without any longer insisting on the stoppage of Pakistani support to cross-border terrorism as a pre-condition for a resumption of the bilateral dialogue at the political level.

Mr. Armitage, who had spent some years of his career in the CIA/DIA and holds the highest Pakistani civil decoration that could be awarded to a foreigner for his role during the Afghan war of the 1980s, has a large circle of friends in the Pakistani military and the Inter-Services Intelligence (ISI) Directorate."

"Armitage, who was denied a 1989 appointment as Assistant Secretary of State because of links to Iran-Contra and other scandals, served as Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs in the Reagan years.

U.S. Government stipulations in the Oliver North trial specifically named Armitage as one of the DoD officials responsible for illegal transfers of weapons to Iran and the Contras."

Meetings were held with President Pervez Musharraf and with Pakistan's military and intelligence brass including the head of Pakistan's Inter Services Intelligence (ISI) General Mahmoud Ahmad. Amply documented, the ISI is known to support a number of Islamic terrorist organizations.....

Questions About Porter Goss and His 'Terrorist Breakfast' Go Unanswered

Village Voice:
August 11, 2004

Here's the news that made many people in the Eastern Time Zone heave up their breakfasts at 8:31 this morning: President Bush introduced Porter Goss as the new CIA director.

Bush called Goss a "reformer." The two of them ought to be toast.

How fitting that this is the same House Intelligence chairman Porter Goss who was having breakfast in D.C. on 9-11 with Pakistan's security chief, Lieutenant General Mahmoud Ahmad.....

Digest this: The two Floridians wound up running the joint congressional inquiry into 9-11 in their roles as chairmen of the House and Senate Intelligence committees. Not a word of the breakfast appears in Goss-Graham 858-page report.....

And chew on another factoid: This is the same Porter Goss who stood up on the floor of the U.S. House on October 9, 2002, during the crucial debate about whether to authorize Bush to go to war against Iraq, and said, according to the Congressional Record, that the 9-11 attack "was delivered by depraved men."

Two quick questions: Was the Pakistani general too depraved to have another cinnamon roll that morning? Or was he just full?

6.8 ISI Director General Mahmood Ahmed

ISI Director Lt. Gen. Mahmood Ahmed is replaced in the face of US pressure after links are discovered between him, Saeed Sheikh, and the funding of the 9/11 attacks. Mahmood instructed Saeed to transfer $100,000 into hijacker Mohamed Atta's bank account prior to 9/11....

Michael Meacher, a British member of Parliament, and a cabinet minister in Tony Blair's government until 2003, writes in the Guardian, "Significantly, [Saeed] Sheikh is ... the man who, on the instructions of General Mahmood Ahmed, the then head of Pakistan's Inter-Services Intelligence (ISI), wired $100,000 before the 9/11 attacks to Mohamed Atta, the lead hijacker. It is extraordinary that neither Ahmed nor Sheikh have been charged and brought to trial on this count. Why not?"

Daniel Ellsberg, the "Pentagon Papers" whistleblower during the Nixon presidency, states in the same article, "It seems to me quite plausible that Pakistan was quite involved in [9/11] ... To say Pakistan is, to me, to say CIA because ... it's hard to say that the ISI knew something that the CIA had no knowledge of." [Guardian, 7/22/2004]

9/11 and the Head of Pakistan Intelligence

Goss, Graham and Mahmood per Axis of Logic

If the 9-11 Commission is really looking for a smoking gun, it should look no further than at Lieutenant-General Mahmoud Ahmad, the director of the Pakistani Inter-Services Intelligence (ISI) at the time.

In early October 2001, Indian intelligence learned that Mahmoud had ordered flamboyant Saeed Sheikh - the convicted mastermind of the kidnapping and killing of Wall Street Journal reporter Daniel Pearl - to wire US$100,000 from Dubai to one of hijacker Mohamed Atta's two bank accounts in Florida.

A juicy direct connection was also established between Mahmoud and Republican Congressman Porter Gross and Democratic Senator Bob Graham. They were all in Washington together discussing Osama bin Laden over breakfast when the attacks of September 11, 2001, happened.....

In December 2002, Graham said he was "surprised at the evidence that there were foreign governments involved in facilitating the activities of at least some of the [September 11] terrorists in the United States ... It will become public at some point when it's turned over to the archives, but that's 20 or 30 years from now."

Beyond the September 11 Breakfast Meeting on Capitol Hill

by Michel Chossudovsky

The chairmen of the Joint Inquiry on 9/11 Sen. Bob Graham and Rep Porter Goss are in "conflict of interest". Or are we dealing with something far more serious?

The chairmen of the Joint Inquiry have dubious links to Pakistan's Inter-Services Intelligence (ISI) which is known to have actively supported Al Qaeda and the Taliban.

Moreover, according to intelligence sources, including the FBI, Pakistan's ISI played a role in financing the 9/11 terrorist attacks.

The two Joint Inquiry chairmen Sen. Bob Graham and Rep Porter Goss were fully cognizant of the "Pakistani ISI connection" and the role played by its former head, General Mahmoud Ahmad.

Why then did they choose to exclude an examination of the role of the ISI from the Joint Inquiry's 858 page Report?

While hinting to "Saudi support and involvement" in 9/11, the Report fails to mention that the Pakistani government, its military and intelligence apparatus (ISI), have actively supported and financed a number of terrorist organizations, with the support of Washington.

Was it "an intelligence failure" to seek the cooperation of the Pakistani government in the "war on terrorism" in an agreement brokered by the head of the ISI, a spy agency, which is known to support the Islamic brigades?

..... While the Joint inquiry has collected mountains of intelligence material, through careful omission, the numerous press and intelligence reports in the public domain (mainstream media, alternative media, etc), which confirm that key members of the Bush Administration were involved in acts of political camouflage, have been carefully removed from the Joint inquiry's hearings.

6.9 Pakistan and Radicalism

Both Washington and London have in the past urged President Musharraf to curtail the Islamic brainwashing taking place in the madrassas, but Pakistan's response has been at best half-hearted, mainly because the country's military and intelligence community fully support the Islamic agenda that the madrassas represent.

There are an approximate 28,000 madrassas in Pakistan with only 8000 of them registered. According to the Human Rights Commission of Pakistan (HRCP) 2002 report, by March 2002, there were around 600,000 students in 6000 registered madrassas with more than 250,000 students in Punjab alone. The proliferation of madrassas began in the 1980s and continued in the 1990s..... They are now seen and portrayed as fundamentalist institutions and breeding grounds for militants to wage a jihad all over the world. From being established centers of learning in the middle-ages, they have traveled a long way. How did this change come about and what can Pakistan do about it?

6.10 Daniel Pearl Investigating Dawood Ibrahim And Other Sensitive Topics in Pakistan

The Prelude to Mr. Pearl's Abduction and Murder

http://www.cooperativeresearch.org/entity.jsp?entity=dawood_ibrahim

Robert Baer and Daniel Pearl: Stacking the Patsies of 9/11

by Chaim Kupferberg

Who, exactly, is Robert Baer? In the months after 9/11, Baer first emerged on the public radar scope as a "former" CIA official involved in counter-terrorism. After publishing his widely acclaimed book, See No Evil, Baer established himself as the mainstream media's "go-to" guy when making the case for pre-9/11 complacency and opportunistic blindness. But his contributions to our understanding of 9/11 didn't end there. In addition to focusing attention on Saudi Arabia and the dominating influence of the neo-conservatives on foreign policy, Baer has personally insinuated himself into the Daniel Pearl story. On September 30, 2002, Richard Sale of UPI reported:

"Wall Street Journal reporter Daniel Pearl was investigating the man who allegedly planned the Sept. 11 airplane hijackings and attacks on New York and Washington when he was kidnapped and murdered in Pakistan, according to two Central Intelligence Agency officials.....

'I was working with Pearl,' said [Bob] Baer, who had written a book about his time as a CIA official and has acted as a consultant and source for numerous media outlets. 'We had a joint project. [Khalid Shaikh] Mohammed was the story he was working on, not Richard Reid [a.k.a. the shoe bomber].' "

Was Baer being truthful, or rather was he disseminating a blatant slice of disinformation? You be the judge. In Baer's latest widely acclaimed book, Sleeping With The Devil - published after the September 30, 2002 UPI article -- Baer blatantly contradicts himself, as evidenced on p.199:

"I have no way of knowing whether Pearl went to Karachi and asked about Khalid Sheikh Mohammed. The Wall Street Journal says no, that he was working on the shoe-bomber case."

So who, exactly, is Robert Baer - and, more to the point, why should this question matter? Baer - along with the likes of Vincent Cannistraro and Milt Bearden - is among the select few who have managed to "dirty" their hands with past CIA involvement with the Afghani mujahedin. Terror, drugs, arms-smuggling, and the Byzantine workings of Mideast geopolitics - Baer has personally seen it all. In Baer's chronicle of the past CIA/Bin Laden/Muslim Brotherhood nexus, there is really nothing particularly sinister in the fact that the CIA had originally fostered and funded a network that would later go on to unveil itself as America's foremost enemy. Baer characterizes it all as blowback.

But perhaps Baer manages to provide us a crucial - though probably unintended - insight as to how we may characterize all that purported blowback. In Baer's oft-repeated account of Khalid Shaikh Mohammed's escape from Qatar, he reveals that Khalid had managed to slip away with another member of his al-Qaida cell - a man by the name of Shawqui Islambuli, whose brother happens to be the man who had assassinated Egyptian President Anwar Sadat on behalf of the Muslim Brotherhood.

It is indeed an artful pairing - for these two men serve, on a symbolic level, as the operative bookends of the Official 9/11 Legend. At the tail end, of course, stands Khalid as the 9/11 mastermind. At the front end stands the Egyptian fundamentalist clique whose 1981 move against Sadat would coincide with its recruitment by Baer's CIA colleagues into the Afghan effort. One member of that Egyptian clique, Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman, would go on to become a CIA asset, and, after his acquittal in relation to the Sadat killing, would then be cleared to enter the United States in 1990 by way of a CIA-approved visa. Setting up shop in a Brooklyn mosque, the men in Abdel-Rahman's circle - Sayyid Nosair, Ramzi Yousef, etc. - would go on to be implicated in the assassination of Rabbi Meir Kahane, the plot to destroy New York City landmarks, and, most importantly, the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center.

If the early shoots of what would eventually evolve into "al-Qaida" look suspiciously like an Egyptian-CIA hybrid, that is probably due to the fact that - from the vantage point of 1993 - a suspicious number of Egyptian CIA assets (and/or FBI informants) were popping up all over the map. For one, a former Egyptian military officer (and FBI informant) named Emad Salem had managed to "infiltrate" former CIA asset Abdel-Rahman's New York circle, giving his FBI handlers the "heads-up" on the plot to take down the Twin Towers in '93. Meanwhile, another former Egyptian military officer (and subsequent FBI informant) by the name of Ali Mohamed would train Abdel-Rahman's men in the arts of bomb-making, formation of operative cells, and all the sophisticated military tactics Ali had gleaned from his three-year stint as a U.S. sergeant with the Special Forces at Fort Bragg. Ali had first entered the United States on a CIA-sponsored visa in 1981, in order to serve his first four-month stint with the Green Berets at Fort Bragg - incidentally, the same year in which Ali had reportedly joined the ranks of the Muslim Brotherhood implicated in the Sadat assassination.

After being honorably discharged from service at Fort Bragg in 1989, Ali's resume would include the training of Abdel-Rahman's men, an ongoing stint as an FBI informant (carrying on even after the 1993 WTC bombing), the authorship of al-Qaida's training manuals, along with the training of bin Laden's personal security detail and the refinement of al-Qaida's military tactics. Publicly outed for the first time in 1995 as the trainer of the 1993 New York landmarks suspects, Ali would remain free to carry on his busy globe-trotting itinerary for three more years before being lured out of his cozy Sacramento digs in the aftermath of the 1998 Embassy bombings in Tanzania and Kenya. Duly subpoenaed and then "secretly" indicted, Ali would go on to plead guilty, implicate his fellow conspirators, and then forever fade from public view (and scrutiny).

With just the foregoing facts in mind, it doesn't take a forensic expert to connect the dots and draw certain conclusions as to the likely paternity of what would later become known as "al-Qaida." From the vantage point of 1993, where were those suspicious dots connecting this close-knit terrorist network to Saddam Hussein? Or the Pakistani ISI? Or the Saudis? Or the Israelis? After 1995, however, there would be new dots to connect up, with new links subsequently forming in Afghanistan, Pakistan, and Saudi Arabia, along with new al-Qaida cells springing up in London, Hamburg, and across the globe - and, in lockstep with the times, new investigative cliques forming across the US, UK, and the EU. Yet from that crucial, embryonic time period of 1981-1993, we can venture a reasonable guess as to which entity was most involved in coddling, handling, clearing, and funding this insular grouping of Egyptian-born radicals, from out of which would grow the full blossom of al-Qaida. And so we must ask what the likes of Bob Baer, Vincent Cannistraro, and Milt Bearden were truly up to in those years.

BOOK REVIEW: Who Killed Daniel Pearl?

(Qui a tue Daniel Pearl?)

by Bernard-Henri Levy

"The lawyer paints a striking picture of Islamism as pure business: after all "we draft the papers. We establish the contracts. And I can tell you that most of them don't give a damn about Allah. They enter Islamism because, especially in Pakistan, it's nothing other than a source of power and wealth." The Saudi lawyer confirms that "very few people in Pakistan become Islamists by conviction or fanaticism. They are just looking for a family, a mafia, capable of protecting them from hard times.....

Neo-conservatives may eventually be tortured by self-doubt, but Indian and Israeli intelligence will certainly love the fact that the information they shared led BHL to an explosive conclusion: "The possible Pakistani responsibility in the September 11 attack remains the great unsaid in George Bush and Donald Rumsfeld's America ... to admit that Ahmad is Omar and he wired the money ... wouldn't it be to question the whole foreign policy which, already at the time, made Iraq as the enemy and Pakistan as an ally?"

How Daniel Pearl Functioned as a Legend-Destroying Truth Teller

EXCERPT: Despite Tales:

The War in Kosovo Was Savage, but Wasn't Genocide

By Daniel Pearl and Robert Block

"In Kosovo last spring, Yugoslav forces did heinous things. They expelled hundreds of thousands of ethnic Albanians, burning houses and committing summary executions. It may well be enough to justify the North Atlantic Treaty Organization bombing campaign and the war crimes indictment of Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic.

But other allegations -- indiscriminate mass murder, rape camps, crematoriums, mutilation of the dead -- haven't been borne out in the six months since NATO troops entered Kosovo. Ethnic-Albanian militants, humanitarian organizations, NATO and the news media fed off each other to give genocide rumors credibility. Now, a different picture is emerging."

9/11 and The Money Trail of Global Terrorism

An Enlightening Compendium of Articles

"... The American 'praise' for General Mahmood was tempered by the news in Dawn (9 October 2001) that the FBI had actually found out that he had contacts with Al-Qaeda activist Sheikh Umar Saeed who had remitted from Pakistan 100,000 dollars to Muhammad Atta who was one of the attackers of New York's World Trade Center. The news item alleged that the money was sent to Muhammad Atta on his instructions.

On 3 October Azim Mian of The News filed from Washington that the evidence presented by the American ambassador to General Musharraf 'also unveils some details about individuals and institutional sympathisers and patrons of Osama bin Laden and the Taliban inside the government set-up of Islamabad as well as non-governmental players'.

DVD: 911 Mysteries *****

Written and Directed by SMALLSTORM

This excellent DVD contains an interview with Scott Forbes which expands on his recollections of the unprecedented "upgrade activities" going on behind the scenes during the last six weeks of the existence of the World Trade Center.

EXCERPTS from the soundtrack:

Scott Forbes, an IT Specialist in a firm that had leased space in the South tower since its erection, reported an unprecedented "power down" in his building for almost the whole weekend prior to 9/11.

"We were notified three weeks in advance of a 'power down' by the Port Authority. That was relatively short notice to plan to shut down all of our banking systems. It was a big deal. It was unprecedented. We had a data center of the 97th floor. So our originating servers were all there. During that week the 'power down' meant that there was no security -- the doors were all open basically. And the cameras were all off. But there were guys in overalls carrying huge tool boxes and reels of cable walking around the building that weekend."

For weeks Scott Forbes had heard ... noises on the 98th floor above.

"It must have been at least four to six weeks before 9/11. It was like rebuilding work going on upstairs. The tenants -- the people from Aon who had been moved somewhere else. The offices were just vacant -- and there was a lot of heavy machinery building work going on. It was almost like pneumatic drills and lots of hammering. So much so that the floor was shaking -- that's how noticeable it was. It was almost as if something heavy was being moved and then it was being taken off wheels and it was like -- boom!

Our floor underneath literally shook -- you could feel the weight above you. That was how large it was. On one occasion I opened a door to see what was going on, being nosey... when I opened the door, the whole office space was empty. There was nothing there at all. It was bizarre because it was just empty. Completely empty. Barren. Nothing. Zero. Not even cables hanging from the ceilings... But there'd been these heavy noises and vibrations up above. It was really strange."

And a noticeable dust in the week before.

“It was probably the week leading to 9/11. Every morning I’d come in around 7 am and the dust was incredible. It was filthy. It was like the cleaners weren’t cleaning. Right where the windows were there was a sill which enclosed radiators. I was sick to death of the dust which was appearing on the window sills. It was dirty gray and very, very noticeable -- that week leading up to 9/11. Where was that dust coming from?”

Gray dust Scott himself had to clean. Was it powdered cement?

[\[The DVD 911 Mysteries contains remarkable interviews with the world’s leading Demolition Experts, which are highly useful to understanding what happened on 9/11. For instance, we are shown exactly how cords of thermite are strapped against a steel beam to achieve the “Angle of Cut” necessary to get a massively heavy building to “walk” off its foundation. Then we are shown pictures from the rubble. It will not cost you a penny to come to this understanding. You can download the film for free, and/or purchase it to share with others.\]](#) and the Basement Smoke that Followed

The entire 9/11 catastrophe was videotaped from the New Jersey docks by Rick Siegel. It is amazing to witness the event live as it unfolded, even at this distance, as Siegel's camera and the accidental soundtrack of the emergency broadcast of a New York radio news show document the horror before it could be filtered through the lies of the Official Legend. The radio reports from the Pentagon are chilling, and describe a tale very different from the one we would later be told.

In Siegel's video, you hear the repeated explosions described by the first responders, and watch as smoke rises from the basements of the towers following many of them. The video captures the flash of brilliant light which emanated from a mostly obscured helicopter immediately before the Coup de Grace of total disintegration. If this light was merely a coincidentally timed reflection, it's interesting to note that the sun was beyond it -- to the east -- in the early morning of 9/11.

The video also provides an unsurpassed overview of the size and flow of the massive clouds of hot gas which dispersed the contents of the pulverized towers over many miles of lower Manhattan.

NOTE: This video provides evidence of the explosive, pre-failure ground-level events described in both towers (characterized by eyewitnesses as "earthquake"-like, and as "the ground shook") in that the video camera, trained perfectly steady on the North Tower, registers a pronounced shock wave just prior to the onset of its explosive failure.

VIDEO: The South Tower Disintegration in Higher Definition.

NOTE: This video is sufficiently Hi-Def to reveal the flashes of the Cutter Charges that so many eyewitnesses referred to as "sparkling" and "popping all around the building." These flashing charges, identical to those in many videos of Professional Controlled Demolitions, are also visible during the destruction of the North Tower, particularly well-captured in the DVD: 911 Eyewitness.

Note that they often occur in areas blocked from the sun, and therefore cannot be reflections off broken glass. And note that they do not yield dust or projectiles as they die away. They are merely brilliantly bright and short lived bursts of light.

This Video is also a perfect example of the official use of the verb "collapse" to describe the Fate of the Towers on 9/11 -- the obvious verb of choice -- which became a part of the Official 9/11 Lexicon from the very beginning. And while "collapse" is certainly a reasonable word to come up with to describe these images and the dynamics they capture, the word "explode" can easily be understood to be equally deserving of employment.

Many of these images DEFINE the word explode. But the word "explode," and particularly the word "demolition," were considered vary bad form if uttered aloud in the Main Stream Media -- the latter word documented to cause its foolish user to receive anthrax in the mail -- quickly -- from the profoundly language-sensitive "terrorists" it very obviously offended.]

7.5 Saddam Hussein's Enmity for bin Laden

Report: Saddam and Al Qaeda Enemies, Not Collaborators

Postwar findings indicate that Saddam Hussein was distrustful of al-Qa'ida and viewed Islamic extremists as a threat to his regime, refusing all requests from al-Qa'ida to provide material or operational support. Debriefings of key leaders of the former Iraqi regime indicate that Saddam distrusted Islamic radicals in general, and al-Qa'ida in particular... Debriefings also indicate that Saddam issued a general order that Iraq should not deal with al-Qa'ida. No postwar information suggests that the Iraqi regime attempted to facilitate a relationship with bin Ladin.

Doubts Cast on Efforts to Link Saddam, al-Qaida

by Warren P. Strobel, Jonathan S. Landay and John Walcott

The Bush administration's claim that Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein had ties to al-Qaida - one of the administration's central arguments for a preemptive war - appears to have been based on even less solid intelligence than the administration's claims that Iraq had hidden stocks of chemical and biological weapons.

Nearly a year after U.S. and British troops invaded Iraq, no evidence has turned up to verify allegations of Saddam's links with al-Qaida, and several key parts of the administration's case have either proved false or seem increasingly doubtful.

Senior U.S. officials now say there never was any evidence that Saddam's secular police state and Osama bin Laden's Islamic terrorism network were in league.

CIA Learned in 2002 That Bin Laden Had No Iraq Ties

By Walter Pincus
Washington Post Staff Writer

Dick Cheney and the "Cooked Intelligence" that Justified the War on Iraq

Cheney Cited Iraq Intelligence That Was Known To Be False

One of the given rationales for attacking Iraq was that Saddam was linked to the 9-11 hijackers through a claim that Mohammad Atta met with an Iraqi intelligence official in Prague in April 2001 before the attacks. The supposed Prague meeting was advanced by former CIA Director Jim Woolsey, using evidence obtained from the Czech government. But according to the FBI, Atta was in Virginia Beach at the time. The Czech government later backed off its claims, but Vice President Cheney stuck to it.

New evidence shows Dick Cheney knowingly continued to assert false intelligence about supposed Al Qaeda-Iraq links even after the CIA and DIA issued warnings, in February 2002, that the information obtained from the interrogation of captured Al Qaeda figure, Ibn al Shaykh Al-Libi (no relation to Scooter Libby aka Libby), was false.

Impeach Dick Cheney for Pre-War 'Hoax'

On the NPR "NOW" program of Dec. 22, David Brancaccio interviewed Lawrence Wilkerson, former chief of staff at the Department of State.

A decorated veteran of Korea and Vietnam, Wilkerson served under Secretary Colin Powell in the run-up to the Iraqi war.

In the interview, Wilkerson said, "I participated in a hoax on the American people, the international community and the United Nations Security Council." Wilkerson said that Powell was not complicit in the hoax, but was instead its victim.

Dick Cheney, however, used his office to pressure George Tenet and the CIA.

According to Wilkerson the vice president, "went over to the headquarters of the CIA about 10 times in late 2002 and early 2003."

As a consequence, the national intelligence estimates that Powell read to the United Nations involved Iraq having stockpiles of chemicals and biological weapons, and an active nuclear program. And now, as we all know, all of this was false. Powell has since rescinded his U.N. statements.

How Cheney's People Created False Intelligence to Justify Invading IRAQ

PNAC Redux: The "Office of Special Plans"

In the days after September 11 terrorist attacks, Paul Wolfowitz and Douglas Feith started cooking intelligence to meet the needs of the radically new foreign and military policy that included regime change in Iraq as its top priority.

To bolster the Iraq war party, they needed intelligence that would persuade the U.S. public and policymakers that Saddam Hussein's regime should be one of the first targets of the war on terrorism. Convinced that the CIA, Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA), and the State Department would not provide them with type of alarmist threat assessments necessary to justify a preventive war, they created their own tightly controlled intelligence operation at the top levels of the Pentagon bureaucracy

Iraq Findings Leaked by Cheney's Aide Were Disputed

By David E. Sanger and David Barstow

Mr. Fitzgerald, in his filing, said that Mr. Libby had been authorized to tell Judith Miller, then a reporter for The New York Times, on July 8, 2003, that a key finding of the 2002 intelligence estimate on Iraq was that Baghdad had been vigorously seeking to acquire uranium from Africa.

But a week earlier, in an interview in his State Department office, Mr. Powell told three other reporters for The Times that intelligence agencies had essentially rejected that contention, and were "no longer carrying it as a credible item" by early 2003, when he was preparing to make the case against Iraq at the United Nations.

Mr. Powell's queasiness with some of the intelligence has been well known, but the new revelations suggest that long after he had concluded the intelligence was faulty, Mr. Bush, Mr. Cheney and Mr. Libby were still promoting it.

State Department Memo: "16 Words" Were False

The "Yellowcake" from Niger was Never Real

By Jason Leopold

Sixteen days before President Bush's January 28, 2003, State of the Union address in which he said that the US learned from British intelligence that Iraq had attempted to acquire uranium from Africa - an explosive claim that helped pave the way to war - the State Department told the CIA that the intelligence the uranium claims were based upon were forgeries, according to a newly declassified State Department memo.

As the Senate panel investigating the administration's use of intelligence begins work, their mandate must be to probe into the heart of the cabal.

..... The panel must examine how this network mainstreamed false intelligence, politicized the intelligence community product and coordinated and sustained a major propaganda effort that melded its bogus claims with those cherry-picked bits of intelligence that best supported them.....

We know from the Senate's phase one report that, in May 2002, the CIA had completed a paper on the absence of Iraqi connections to Al Qaeda. These CIA conclusions then became a target for Rumsfeld's OSP [Office of Special Projects], their criticisms unleashed full-bore at a meeting in front of then-CIA director George J. Tenet on August 20.....

We also know from the Downing Street memos that, in late July 2002, British spy chieftain Sir Richard Dearlove, just returned from Washington, told colleagues that the Bush people were "fixing" their intelligence to the policy outcome they desired. Whether this British impression was based on observation of the full spectrum of CIA work or the specific terrorism issue must be established. Equally important is how much false intelligence was inserted by means of this process. That is, how much of the administration-driven phony information ended up in official reports bearing the CIA's imprimatur?

Lies and Leaks: Dick Cheney's Problems

by Jack Calvin

Dick Cheney, more affectionately known here as "Dickhead" or just plain, "Asshole", is a guy who's probably got a really bad case of red-ass right about now. Right after 9/11, Dick Cheney felt he had enough dealing with "sissy liberal" things like getting the country back on the right track, and decided that taking Saddam Hussein out of power and putting him into a polyester suit with a bad shave was the nation's top priority.

He wound and spun pre-war intelligence, armed with knowledge that a vast majority of Americans, like their President, would have a difficult time passing a high-school equivalency exam. But amongst all that is evil, there is always a balancing power; the ying to the yang. Somebody came out and said that the Bush Administration was wrong. They had proof. Dick was angry. How dare somebody practice their Constitutional rights and defy the Administration? This person had to be punished, and you have the Valerie Plame story as a result.

As you know, special prosecutor Pat Fitzgerald is investigating the leak. Things are blazing and there's rumors of somebody resigning. The Washington Post has a great article on this whole issue.

"In the course of the investigation, Fitzgerald has been exposed to the intense, behind-the-scenes fight between Cheney's office and the CIA over prewar intelligence and the vice president's central role in compiling and then defending the intelligence used to justify the war. Miller, in a first-person account Sunday in the Times, recalled that Libby complained in a June 23, 2003, meeting in his office that the CIA was engaged in "selective leaking" and a "hedging strategy" that would make the agency look equally prescient whether or not weapons of mass destruction were found in Iraq."

What is very interesting is that this goes beyond simply the vigilante tactics of the Vice President. This is something that further helps address the issue that the Iraqi war was based on false intelligence, but not just false intelligence: false fabricated intelligence.

The Stovepipe

by Seymour M. Hersh

The C.I.A. assessment reflected both deep divisions within the agency and the position of its director, George Tenet, which was far from secure. (The agency had been sharply criticized, after all, for failing to provide any effective warning of the September 11th attacks.) In the view of many C.I.A. analysts and operatives, the director was too eager to endear himself to the Administration hawks and improve his standing with the President and the Vice-President. Senior C.I.A. analysts dealing with Iraq were constantly being urged by the Vice-President's office to provide worst-case assessments on Iraqi weapons issues. "They got pounded on, day after day," one senior Bush Administration official told me, and received no consistent backup from Tenet and his senior staff. "Pretty soon you say 'Fuck it.' " And they began to provide the intelligence that was wanted.

7.6 CIA Agents Come Forward in Defense of Democracy

DVD: Uncovered: The War on Iraq
by Robert Greenwald

This indelible film provides on-camera testimony as to how the distortion worked, as well as specific, actual examples of how the meaning of intelligence assessments were altered by simply removing certain phrases in their entirety, and presenting what was left as if it were the sum of the assessment. Damning. In a democracy that was still being well-tended by its citizens -- these outrageous crimes against America and the world would generate an instant call for indictment.

CIA Official Reveals Bush, Cheney, Rice Were Personally Told Iraq Had No WMD in Fall 2002

Tonight on 60 Minutes, Tyler Drumheller, the former chief of the CIA's Europe division, revealed that in the fall of 2002, President Bush, Vice President Cheney, then-National Security Adviser Condoleezza Rice and others were told by CIA Director George Tenet that Iraq's foreign minister — who agreed to act as a spy for the United States — had reported that Iraq had no active weapons of mass destruction program.

Cheney's Repeated CIA Visits Pressured Analysts

Multiple visits to the CIA by the United States Vice-President, Dick Cheney, created an environment in which some analysts felt they were being pressured to make their assessments on Iraq fit with Bush Administration policy objectives, intelligence officials said.

They said Mr Cheney and his chief of staff, "Scooter" Libby, questioned analysts studying Iraq's weapons programs and alleged links to al-Qaeda.

Mr Cheney took the lead in the Administration last August in advocating military action against Iraq by claiming it had weapons of mass destruction.

The visits "sent signals, intended or otherwise, that a certain output was desired from here", one agency official said.

The [Amateur Neo-Con] Spies Who Pushed for War

by Julian Borger
The Guardian

Mr. Borger reports on the shadow right-wing intelligence network set up in Washington to second-guess the CIA and deliver a justification for toppling Saddam Hussein by force.

"As the CIA director, George Tenet, arrived at the Senate yesterday to give secret testimony on the Niger uranium affair, it was becoming increasingly clear in Washington that the scandal was only a small, well-documented symptom of a complete breakdown in US intelligence that helped steer America into war.....

According to former Bush officials, all defence and intelligence sources, senior administration figures created a shadow agency of Pentagon analysts staffed mainly by ideological amateurs to compete with the CIA and its military counterpart, the Defence Intelligence Agency.

The agency, called the Office of Special Plans (OSP), was set up by the defence secretary, Donald Rumsfeld, to second-guess CIA information and operated under the patronage of hardline conservatives in the top rungs of the administration, the Pentagon and at the White House, including Vice-President Dick Cheney.

The ideologically driven network functioned like a shadow government, much of it off the official payroll and beyond congressional oversight. But it proved powerful enough to prevail in a struggle with the State Department and the CIA by establishing a justification for war..... "

The CIA, Iraq, and the Cooking of Intelligence *****

An Intelligence Debacle... and Worse

By Ray McGovern

Former CIA analyst

In our various oral and written presentations on Iraq my veteran intelligence officer colleagues and I took no delight in sharply criticizing what we perceived to be the corruption of intelligence analysis at CIA. Nothing would have pleased us more than to have been proven wrong. It turns out we did not know the half of it.

Several of us have just spent a painful weekend digesting the report of the Senate Intelligence Committee on prewar intelligence assessments on Iraq. The corruption is far deeper than we suspected. The only silver lining is that the corrupter-in-chief, George Tenet, is now gone.

When the former CIA Director departed Sunday, he left behind an agency on life support -- an institution staffed by sycophant managers and thoroughly demoralized analysts.

The analysts are embarrassed at their own naiveté in believing that the passage carved into the marble at the entrance to CIA Headquarters-"You will know the truth, and the truth will set you free"-held real meaning for their work.

The Senate Committee report is meticulous. Its findings are a sharp blow to those of us who took pride in working in an agency where we could speak truth to power-with career protection from retribution from the powerful, and with leaders who would face down those policymakers who tried to exert undue influence over our analysis.

Enter "Joe Centrifuge"

Although it was clear to us that much of the intelligence on Iraq had been cooked to the recipe of policy, not until the Senate report did we know that the skewing included outright lies.

We had heard of "Joe," the nuclear weapons analyst in CIA's Center for Weapons Intelligence and Arms Control, and it was abundantly clear that his agenda was to "prove" that the infamous aluminum tubes sought by Iraq were to be used for developing a nuclear weapon. We did not know that he and his CIA associates falsified the data-including rotor testing ironically called "spin tests."

The Senate committee determined that "Joe" deliberately skewed data to fit preconceptions regarding an Iraqi nuclear threat. "Who could have believed that about our intelligence community, that the system could be so dishonest?" wondered the normally soft-spoken David Albright, a widely respected veteran expert on Iraq's work toward developing a nuclear weapon.

I share his wonderment. I too am appalled-and angry.

You give 27 years of your professional life to an institution whose main mission -- to get at the truth -- is essential for orderly policy making, and then you find it has been prostituted.

You realize that your former colleagues have lacked the moral courage needed to stave off the effort to enlist them as accomplices in deceiving our elected representatives into giving their blessing to an ill-conceived, unnecessary war.

Even Republican stalwart Sen. Pat Roberts, chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, has conceded that, had Congress known before the vote for war what his committee has now discovered, "I doubt if the votes would have been there."

Ten Appalling Lies We Were Told About Iraq

By Christopher Scheer, AlterNet. Posted June 27, 2003.

It was a systematic campaign to frighten the hell out of us about the threat of Hussein, and almost none of it was true.

"The Iraqi dictator must not be permitted to threaten America and the world with horrible poisons and diseases and gases and atomic weapons."

-- George Bush, Oct. 7, 2002, in a speech in Cincinnati.

There is a small somber box that appears in the New York Times every day. Titled simply "Killed in Iraq," it lists the names and military affiliations of those who most recently died on tour of duty. Wednesday's edition listed just one name: Orenthal J. Smith, age 21, of Allendale, South Carolina.

The young, late O.J. Smith was almost certainly named after the legendary running back, Orenthal J. Simpson, before that dashing American hero was charged for a double-murder. Now his namesake has died in far-off Mesopotamia in a noble mission to, as our president put it on March 19, "disarm Iraq, to free its people and to defend the world from grave danger."

Today, more than three months after Bush's stirring declaration of war and nearly two months since he declared victory, no chemical, biological or nuclear weapons have been found, nor any documentation of their existence, nor any sign they were deployed in the field.

The mainstream press, after an astonishing two years of cowardice, is belatedly drawing attention to the unconscionable level of administrative deception. They seem surprised to find that when it comes to Iraq, the Bush administration isn't prone to the occasional lie of expediency but, in fact, almost never told the truth.

What follows are just the most outrageous and significant of the dozens of outright lies uttered by Bush and his top officials over the past year in what amounts to a systematic campaign to scare the bejeezus out of everybody:

LIE #1: "The evidence indicates that Iraq is reconstituting its nuclear weapons program ... Iraq has attempted to purchase high-strength aluminum tubes and other equipment needed for gas centrifuges, which are used to enrich uranium for nuclear weapons." -- President Bush, Oct. 7, 2002, in Cincinnati.

FACT: This story, leaked to and breathlessly reported by Judith Miller in the New York Times, has turned out to be complete baloney. Department of Energy officials, who monitor nuclear plants, say the tubes could not be used for enriching uranium. One intelligence analyst, who was part of the tubes investigation, angrily told The New Republic: "You had senior American officials like Condoleezza Rice saying the only use of this aluminum really is uranium centrifuges. She said that on television. And that's just a lie."

LIE #2: "The British government has learned that Saddam Hussein recently sought significant quantities of uranium from Africa." -- President Bush, Jan. 28, 2003, in the State of the Union address.

FACT: This whopper was based on a document that the White House already knew to be a forgery thanks to the CIA. Sold to Italian intelligence by some hustler, the document carried the signature of an official who had been out of office for 10 years and referenced a constitution that was no longer in effect. The ex-ambassador who the CIA sent to check out the story is pissed: "They knew the Niger story was a flat-out lie," he told the New Republic, anonymously. "They [the White House] were unpersuasive about aluminum tubes and added this to make their case more strongly."

LIE #3: "We believe [Saddam] has, in fact, reconstituted nuclear weapons." -- Vice President Cheney on March 16, 2003 on "Meet the Press."

FACT: There was and is absolutely zero basis for this statement. CIA reports up through 2002 showed no evidence of an Iraqi nuclear weapons program.

LIE #4: "[The CIA possesses] solid reporting of senior-level contacts between Iraq and al-Qaeda going back a decade." -- CIA Director George Tenet in a written statement released Oct. 7, 2002 and echoed in that evening's speech by President Bush.

FACT: Intelligence agencies knew of tentative contacts between Saddam and al-Qaeda in the early '90s, but found no proof of a continuing relationship. In other words, by tweaking language, Tenet and Bush spun the intelligence 180 degrees to say exactly the opposite of what it suggested.

LIE #5: "We've learned that Iraq has trained al-Qaeda members in bomb-making and poisons and deadly gases ... Alliance with terrorists could allow the Iraqi regime to attack America without leaving any fingerprints." -- President Bush, Oct. 7.

FACT: No evidence of this has ever been leaked or produced. Colin Powell told the U.N. this alleged training took place in a camp in northern Iraq. To his great embarrassment, the area he indicated was later revealed to be outside Iraq's control and patrolled by Allied war planes.

LIE #6: "We have also discovered through intelligence that Iraq has a growing fleet of manned and unmanned aerial vehicles that could be used to disperse chemical or biological weapons across broad areas. We are concerned that Iraq is exploring ways of using these UAVs [unmanned aerial vehicles] for missions targeting the United States." -- President Bush, Oct. 7.

FACT: Said drones can't fly more than 300 miles, and Iraq is 6,000 miles from the U.S. coastline. Furthermore, Iraq's drone-building program wasn't much more advanced than your average model plane enthusiast. And isn't a "manned aerial vehicle" just a scary way to say "plane"?

LIE #7: "We have seen intelligence over many months that they have chemical and biological weapons, and that they have dispersed them and that they're weaponized and that, in one case at least, the command and control arrangements have been established." -- President Bush, Feb. 8, 2003, in a national radio address.

FACT: Despite a massive nationwide search by U.S. and British forces, there are no signs, traces or examples of chemical weapons being deployed in the field, or anywhere else during the war.

LIE #8: "Our conservative estimate is that Iraq today has a stockpile of between 100 and 500 tons of chemical weapons agent. That is enough to fill 16,000 battlefield rockets." -- Secretary of State Colin Powell, Feb. 5 2003, in remarks to the UN Security Council.

FACT: Putting aside the glaring fact that not one drop of this massive stockpile has been found, as previously reported on AlterNet the United States' own intelligence reports show that these stocks -- if they existed -- were well past their use-by date and therefore useless as weapon fodder.

LIE #9: "We know where [Iraq's WMD] are. They're in the area around Tikrit and Baghdad and east, west, south, and north somewhat." -- Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, March 30, 2003, in statements to the press.

FACT: Needless to say, no such weapons were found, not to the east, west, south or north, somewhat or otherwise.

LIE #10: "Yes, we found a biological laboratory in Iraq which the UN prohibited." -- President Bush in remarks in Poland, published internationally June 1, 2003.

FACT: This was reference to the discovery of two modified truck trailers that the CIA claimed were potential mobile biological weapons lab. But British and American experts -- including the State Department's intelligence wing in a report released this week -- have since declared this to be untrue. According to the British, and much to Prime Minister Tony Blair's embarrassment, the trailers are actually exactly what Iraq said they were; facilities to fill weather balloons, sold to them by the British themselves.

So, months after the war [this piece was written in June of 2003], we are once again where we started -- with plenty of rhetoric and absolutely no proof of this "grave danger" for which O.J. Smith died. The Bush administration is now scrambling to place the blame for its lies on faulty intelligence, when in fact the intelligence was fine; it was their abuse of it that was "faulty."

Rather than apologize for leading us to a preemptive war based on impossibly faulty or shamelessly distorted "intelligence" or offering his resignation, our sly madman in the White House is starting to sound more like that other O.J. Like the man who cheerfully played golf while promising to pursue "the real killers," Bush is now vowing to search for "the true extent of Saddam Hussein's weapons programs, no matter how long it takes."

On the terrible day of the 9/11 attacks, five hours after a hijacked plane slammed into the Pentagon, retired Gen. Wesley Clark received a strange call from someone (he didn't name names) representing the White House position: "I was on CNN, and I got a call at my home saying, 'You got to say this is connected. This is state-sponsored terrorism. This has to be connected to Saddam Hussein,'" Clark told Meet the Press anchor Tim Russert. "I said, 'But -- I'm willing to say it, but what's your evidence?' And I never got any evidence."

And neither did we.

Secrecy Pervasive Around Cheney's Energy Task Force per Halliburton Watch

On his 10th day as vice president, Dick Cheney established a secret "Energy Task Force," formally known as the National Energy Policy Development Group (NEPDG), for the purpose of making recommendations to President Bush on energy policy. In formulating a new energy strategy for America, the task force met secretly with lobbyists and representatives of the petroleum, coal, nuclear, natural gas, and electricity industries. Many of these individuals work for energy companies which gave large campaign contributions to Bush/Cheney 2000. Environmental groups were mostly excluded from the task force.

Members of Congress demanded Cheney release the names of individuals and corporations who gave information and advice to the task force. But the vice president refused.....

Public interest groups speculate the stonewalling by Cheney might be proof that the task force records show unprecedented corporate cronyism in the Bush administration, possibly showing an excessive or disproportionate influence over energy policy by Halliburton and other energy companies. The records may also reveal the true reasons for why the Bush administration demanded war with Iraq.....

In January 2003, The Wall Street Journal reported that representatives from Halliburton, Exxon Mobil Corp., Chevron-Texaco Corp. and Conoco-Phillips, among others, had met with Vice President Cheney's staff to plan the post-war revival of Iraq's oil industry. However, both Cheney and the companies deny the meeting took place.

Documents Feature Iraq Oil Fields

Two Years and Three Months After Being Sued for Access to These Documents Regarding This Most Crucial of Public Policies, and One Year and Four Months After US District Court Judge Paul J. Friedman Ordered the Government to Release Them, and Four Months After the Invasion of Iraq, the Bush Administration Finally Complies with the Law and Releases Them.

Washington,DC -- Judicial Watch, the public interest group that investigates and prosecutes government corruption and abuse, said today that documents turned over by the Commerce Department, under court order as a result of Judicial Watch's Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) lawsuit concerning the activities of the Cheney Energy Task Force, contain a map of Iraqi oilfields, pipelines, refineries and terminals, as well as 2 charts detailing Iraqi oil and gas projects, and 'Foreign Suitors for Iraqi Oilfield Contracts.' The documents, which are dated March 2001, are available on the Internet at: www.JudicialWatch.org.

..... Judicial Watch has been seeking these documents under FOIA since April 19, 2001. Judicial Watch was forced to file a lawsuit in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia (Judicial Watch Inc. v. Department of Energy, et al., Civil Action No. 01-0981) when the government failed to comply with the provisions of the FOIA law. U.S. District Court Judge Paul J. Friedman ordered the government to produce the documents on March 5, 2002.

Secrets of Cheney's Energy Task Force Come to Light

..... Documents turned over in the summer of 2003 by the Commerce Department as a result of the Sierra Club's and Judicial Watch's Freedom of Information Act lawsuit, concerning the activities of the Cheney Energy Task Force, contain a map of Iraqi oilfields, pipelines, refineries and terminals, as well as two charts detailing Iraqi oil and gas projects, and "Foreign Suitors for Iraqi Oilfield Contracts."

..... With the advice of his close friend and largest campaign contributor, Enron CEO, Ken Lay, Bush picked Vice President Dick Cheney, former Halliburton CEO, to head this group. In 2001 the Task Force formulated the National Energy Policy (NEP), or Cheney Report, bypassing possibilities for energy independence and reduced oil consumption with a declaration of ambitions to establish new sources of oil.

The Bush Administration's struggle to keep secret the workings of Cheney's Energy Task Force has been ongoing since early in the President's tenure. The General Accounting Office, the investigative arm of Congress, requested information in spring of 2001 about which industry executives and lobbyists the Task Force was meeting with in developing the Bush Administration's energy plan. When Cheney refused disclosure, Congress was pressed to sue for the right to examine Task Force records, but lost. Later, amid political pressure building over improprieties regarding Enron's colossal collapse, Cheney's office released limited information revealing six Task Force meetings with Enron executives.

Can the Real Reason for War be This Crass?

By Mano Singham

Now that the official case for attacking Iraq made by the US and British governments has started to unravel, the question of the real reason for unleashing this death and destruction has become a hot topic of conversation again.

..... The thought that the war was actually about making money for individuals and corporations in the short term did not seem to me to be credible. That was too petty and crass. That was why I was stunned to read the press release put out by the public interest group Judicial Watch on July 17, 2003.

..... The Vice President had vigorously opposed this opening up of its activities and so a lawsuit was filed. On March 5, 2002 the US District Judge ordered the government to produce the documents, which was finally done by the Commerce Department just recently.

..... The Judicial Watch press release states that these released documents "contain a map of Iraqi oilfields, pipelines, refineries and terminals, as well as 2 charts detailing Iraqi oil and gas projects, and "Foreign Suitors for Iraqi Oilfield Contracts."

7.8 PNAC: THE PROJECT FOR A NEW AMERICAN CENTURY

The Need for a "New Pearl Harbor"

Two years ago a project set up by the men who now surround George W Bush said what America needed was "a new Pearl Harbor." Its published aims have, alarmingly, come true.

By John Pilger
New Statesman
December 16, 2002

The threat posed by US terrorism to the security of nations and individuals was outlined in prophetic detail in a document written more than two years ago and disclosed only recently. What was needed for America to dominate much of humanity and the world's resources, it said, was "some catastrophic and catalysing event – like a new Pearl Harbor". The attacks of 11 September 2001 provided the "new Pearl Harbor", described as "the opportunity of ages...."

..... One of George W Bush's "thinkers" is Richard Perle. I interviewed Perle when he was advising Reagan; and when he spoke about "total war," I mistakenly dismissed him as mad. He recently used the term again in describing America's "war on terror." "No stages," he said.

"This is total war. We are fighting a variety of enemies. There are lots of them out there. All this talk about first we are going to do Afghanistan, then we will do Iraq... this is entirely the wrong way to go about it. If we just let our vision of the world go forth, and we embrace it entirely and we don't try to piece together clever diplomacy, but just wage a total war... our children will sing great songs about us years from now."

Dark Passage: PNAC's Blueprint for Empire

by Chris Floyd
March 27, 2005

Not since Mein Kampf has a geopolitical punch been so blatantly telegraphed, years ahead of the blow.

Adolf Hitler clearly spelled out his plans to destroy the Jews and launch wars of conquest to secure German domination of world affairs in his 1925 book, long before he ever assumed power. Despite the zig-zags of rhetoric he later employed, the various PR spins and temporary justifications offered for this or that particular policy, any attentive reader of his vile regurgitation could have divined his intentions as he drove his country — and the world — to murderous upheaval.

Similarly — in method, if not entirely in substance — the Bush Regime's foreign policy is also being carried out according to a strict blueprint first written ten years ago, then renewed a few months before the Regime was installed in power by the judicial coup of December 2000.

What does the plan call for? An attack on Iraq. Vast increases in military spending. Planting new American bases all over the world, from the jungles of South America to the steppes of Central Asia. Embracing the concept of "pre-emptive war" and unilateral action as cornerstones of national strategy.

These policies may seem like reactions to the "changed world" confronting America after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. But in fact, each one of them — and many other policies now being advanced by the Bush Administration — was planned long before the first plane ever struck the doomed Twin Towers.

They are the handiwork of an obscure but influential conservative group called Project for the New American Century (PNAC), whose members — including Dick Cheney and Donald Rumsfeld — now sit in the highest reaches of power. The papers they produced during the 1990s are like a roadmap of the course that America is following — a course which PNAC hopes will lead to a "benign" but utterly dominant "American Empire."

The Unipolar Moment

Not surprisingly, the roots of PNAC go back to the first Bush Administration. In 1992, then-Defense Secretary Dick Cheney asked two of his top aides, Paul Wolfowitz (now assistant secretary of Defense) and Lewis Libby (now Cheney's chief of staff), to draw up a "Defense Guidance Plan" to shape American strategy in the post-Cold War world. They produced an aggressive, ambitious document calling for the unilateral use of American military might to "discourage advanced industrial nations from challenging our leadership or even aspiring to a larger regional or global role." Military intervention would be "a constant fixture" of what Wolfowitz and Libby called a "new order" which the United States — not the United Nations — would "establish and protect."

The goal was to seize the opportunity offered by the collapse of the Soviet Union — which left the United States without a serious international rival — and extend this "unipolar moment" of American dominance for decades to come; indeed, into a "New American Century."

The report was leaked in the midst of the 1992 presidential campaign, sparking controversy over its "imperial ambitions," and was publicly disowned by President George H.W. Bush. After the Bush team was defeated by Bill Clinton, a lame-duck Cheney finally issued a watered-down version of the paper as official policy. The Clinton Administration then scrapped it upon taking office.

But the unipolar vision of American dominance was not forgotten. During the 1990s, it was refined and expanded in a number of conservative think tanks — the American Enterprise Institute (AEI), the Hudson Institute, the Center for Security Policy and others — whose memberships often overlapped. And now that they were out of office, the advocates of dominance could speak more freely.

One former member of Cheney's Defense Department team, Zalmay Khalilzad (now Bush's special emissary to Afghanistan), wrote openly that the U.S. must "be willing to use force" to express its "global leadership" and preclude the rise of potential rivals. Others, such as former Reagan official and AEI stalwart Richard Perle (now head of the Pentagon's Defense Policy Board) and Douglas Feith (now assistant secretary of Defense), worked with Israel's Likud Party, drawing up plans calling for American-led "regime change" efforts in Iraq, Syria, Iran and Saudi Arabia.

Finally, in 1997, Project for the New American Century was formed as a focal point for disseminating the dominance ideal. It was a "big tent" of Great Power adherents: Beltway players like Cheney, Rumsfeld, Wolfowitz, former Vice President Dan Quayle, and former Reagan education secretary turned public scold, William Bennett; Christian "social conservatives" like Gary Bauer; and the so-called "neoconservatives" (often former Democrats whose staunch anti-communism had led them to the Reagan Right), including Elliot Abrams, who'd been convicted of lying to Congress in the Iran-Contra scandal but was pardoned by George Bush Sr. (and now serves on the White House director of Middle East policy).

Other notable figures joining PNAC included the Afghan-born Khalilzad, publisher and presidential candidate Steve Forbes, and Jeb Bush, younger brother of the president-to-be.

"A New Pearl Harbor"

PNAC fired its first shot across the bow in 1998, with letters to President Clinton and Congressional leaders calling for "regime change" in Iraq, by force if necessary, and the establishment of a "strong U.S. military presence in the region."

Then in September 2000, just months before the disputed election that brought George W. Bush to power, the group published a highly detailed, 90-page "blueprint" for transforming America's military — and the nation's role on the world stage.

The document, "Rebuilding America's Defenses," acknowledged its adherence to the "basic tenets" of the controversial 1992 Wolfowitz-Libby report, and advocated a series of "transformations" in national defense and foreign affairs. These included:

- Ø Projecting American dominance with a "worldwide network of forward operating bases" — some permanent, others "temporary access arrangements" as needed for various military interventions — in the Middle East, Asia and Latin America. These additions to America's already-extensive overseas deployments would act as "the cavalry on the new American frontier" — a frontier that PNAC declared now extended throughout the world.
- Ø Withdrawing from arms control treaties to allow for the development of a global missile shield, the deployment of space-based weapons and the production of a new generation of "battlefield nuclear weapons," especially "bunker-busters" for penetrating underground fortifications.
- Ø Raising the U.S. military budget to at least 3.8 percent of gross domestic product, with annual increases of tens of billions of dollars each year.
- Ø Developing sophisticated new technologies to "control the global commons of cyberspace" by closely monitoring communications and transactions on the Internet.
- Ø Pursuing the development of "new methods of attack — electronic, "non-lethal, biological ... in new dimensions, in space, cyberspace and perhaps the world of microbes." Just this month, Defense Secretary Rumsfeld was complaining to Congress about long-standing international chemical weapons treaties which have "tangled us up so badly" and prevented the use of non-lethal chemical arms in subduing enemy armies — and enemy populations.
- Ø Developing the ability to "fight and decisively win multiple, simultaneous major theater wars." This means moving beyond the "two-war standard" of preparedness which has guided U.S. strategy since World War II in order to account for "new realities and potential new conflicts."

It lists countries such as Iraq, Iran, Syria, North Korea and Libya as targets for those potential new conflicts, and urges Pentagon warplanners to consider not merely containing them or defeating them in battle, but "changing their regimes."

Oddly enough, although "regime change" in Iraq was still clearly a priority for PNAC, it had little to do with Saddam Hussein and his brutal policies or his aggressive tendencies. Instead, removing Saddam was tied to the larger goal of establishing a permanent U.S. military presence in the Persian Gulf in order to "secure energy supplies" and preclude any other power from dominating the vital oil regions of the Middle East and Central Asia. The PNAC report puts it quite plainly:

"The United States has for decades sought to play a more permanent role in Gulf regional security. While the unresolved conflict with Iraq provides the immediate justification, the need for a substantial American force presence in the Gulf transcends the issue of the regime of Saddam Hussein."

This is why the Bush Regime has offered a constantly shifting menu of rationales for the impending attack on Iraq: because the decision to remove Saddam was taken long ago, as part of a larger strategic plan, and has little to do with any imminent threat from the broken-backed Iraqi regime, which is constantly bombed, partially occupied (with U.S. forces already working in the autonomous Kurdish territories) and now swarming with UN inspectors. If the strategic need for the attack "transcends the issue of the regime of Saddam Hussein," then almost any rationale will do.

Perhaps due to the presence of Washington heavyweights like Cheney and Rumsfeld, the PNAC report recognized that thorny political difficulties could stand in the way of implementing the group's radical designs.

Indeed, in one of the most striking and prescient passages in the entire 90-page document, PNAC acknowledged that the "revolutionary" changes it envisaged could take decades to bring about -- unless, that is, the United States was struck by "some catastrophic and catalyzing event -- like a new Pearl Harbor."

The Path of Action

That "new Pearl Harbor" did come, of course, in the thunderclap of September 11, 2001. And the PNAC alumni now in government were quick to capitalize on this "catalyzing event." All of the PNAC recommendations listed above were put into place, with almost no debate from a shellshocked Congress and a populace reeling from the unprecedented assault on American security.

In the very first days following the attack, Rumsfeld urged the Bush cabinet to make "Iraq a principal target of the first round in the war against terrorism," despite the lack of any proof connecting Baghdad to the terrorist atrocity, according to Bob Woodward's insider account, Bush at War.

But Rumsfeld was overruled by Colin Powell, who counseled that "public opinion has to be prepared before a move against Iraq is possible." So the "war on terrorism" was launched initially against Afghanistan, where the Taliban regime was harboring Saudi terrorist Osama bin Laden and his band of international extremists.

The attack on Afghanistan was accompanied by the construction of new American bases and "temporary access arrangements" throughout Central Asia, giving America a military "footprint" in the strategically vital region for the first time. At the same time, new U.S. forces were dispatched to East Asia, to the Philippines, Indonesia and elsewhere, and to South America, to help Colombia combat "narco-terrorists" and to protect that nation's vital oil pipelines.

Meanwhile, at home, military budgets skyrocketed to deal with the "new realities and potential new conflicts." The Bush Administration withdrew from the landmark ABM arms control treaty and began construction of missile defense facilities. There were new funds and more research for the militarization of outer space (dubbed "Full Spectrum Dominance"), and the development of "non-lethal" biochemical weapons. Pentagon technicians, led by another convicted Iran-Contra figure, John Poindexter, began the development of Internet "data-mining" and monitoring technology (which, despite some recent Congressional restrictions, continues today). And the U.S. announced a new "nuclear posture," including the willingness to use tactical nuclear weapons – a move supported by the Republican-led House of Representatives, which approved Pentagon plans to develop the "bunker-buster" nukes specifically recommended by PNAC.

"The Savage Wars of Peace"

The existence of PNAC and its influence on the Bush Administration is not some "conspiracy theory." It follows a pattern frequently seen in American history: a group of like-minded people band together in think tanks, foundations, universities and other institutions, where they lay out their vision for America's future. And when they at last have access to the levers of power, they try to make that vision a reality.

What is different now is that the September 11 attacks have given this particular group an unprecedented amount of political capital — not to mention cold, hard federal cash — to put their long-held dreams into practice, virtually without opposition. (In contrast, consider the bitterly partisan political struggles between Congress and Lincoln during the Civil War.) What is also different is the essential content of that vision: the establishment — by force — of an American Empire.

This Empire is to be different from the old Roman or British models, of course. It will not entail settlement or direct control of foreign lands, but will instead offer paternal "protection" and "guidance" — backed up with strategically placed military bases and "temporary access arrangements" for the inevitable "constabulatory duties" required to enforce PNAC's longed-for "Pax Americana." However, the intent is not outright conquest, but the chance to bring "the single sustainable model of national success" to all the world, to set people, and their markets, free — as long as no "regional or global challenges to America's leadership" arise, of course.

But there will be costs to taking up what Thomas Donnelly, the principal author of the PNAC blueprint, calls "the free man's burden." Donnelly, a former journalist and legislative aide, wrote in the journal Foreign Affairs last year that America should look to its "imperial past" as a guide to its future. Reviewing The Savage Wars of Peace, a pro-Empire book by journalist Max Boot, Donnelly cites approvingly the "pacification" of the Philippines by American forces in 1898-1900, in which at least 100,000 Filipinos were killed in a bid for independence.

He also points to the U.S. Army's success in subduing the Native American tribes in a series of small wars, and, closer to our time, the efficient "constabulatory operation" in Panama, which was invaded by the first President Bush in 1989. Similar "savage wars of peace" — pacifications, counterinsurgencies, police actions, invasions — will be required to maintain the new American Empire, says Donnelly.

And here too, George W. Bush has clearly echoed the thinking of the PNAC members who now surround him in the White House. Speaking at a Republican fundraiser last August, the President seemed keenly aware of the heavy price in blood and treasure the nation will have to pay to maintain its imperium in the New American Century: "There's no telling how many wars it will take to secure freedom in the homeland."

The Beautiful Song of War

These texts spring from the Dominators' quasi-religious cult of "American exceptionalism," the belief in the unique and utter goodness of the American soul — embodied chiefly by the nation's moneyed elite, of course — and the irredeemable, metaphysical evil of all those who would oppose or criticize the elite's righteous (and conveniently self-serving) policies.

Anyone still "puzzled" over the Bush Regime's behavior need only look to these documents for enlightenment. They have long been available to the media — which accepted Bush's transparent campaign lies about a "more humble foreign policy" at face value — but have only now started attracting wider notice, in the New Yorker this spring, and this week in the Glasgow Sunday Herald.

The documents explain America's relentless march across Afghanistan, Central Asia and soon into the Middle East. They explain the Bush Regime's otherwise unfathomable rejection of international law, its fanatical devotion to so-called "missile defense," its gargantuan increases in military spending — even its antediluvian energy policy, which mandates the continued primacy of oil and gas in the world economy. (They can't conquer the sun or monopolize the wind, so there's no profit, no leverage for personal gain and geopolitical power in pursuing viable alternatives to oil.) The September 11 attacks gave the Regime a pretext for greatly accelerating this published program of global dominance, but they would have pursued it in any case.

So there will be war: either soon, after immediately the November mid-term elections, or — in the event that Iraq's new offer for inspections is accepted — then later, after some "provocation" or "obstruction," no doubt in good time before the 2004 presidential vote. The purse-lipped rhetoric about "evil" and "moral clarity" is just so much desert sand being thrown in our eyes. Backstage, the Bush Regime is playing Mafia-style hardball, warning reluctant allies to get on board now, or else miss out on their cut of the loot when America — not a "democratic Iraq" — divvies up Saddam's oilfields: a shakedown detailed last week by the Economist, among many others.

The Dominators dream of empire. Not only will it extend their temporal power, they believe it will also give them immortality. Indeed, one of their chief gurus, Reaganite firebreather Michael Ledeen, says that if the Dominators have the courage to reject "clever diplomacy" and "just wage total war" to subjugate the Middle East [...]

This madness, this bin Laden-like megalomania is now driving the hijacked American republic — and the world — to murderous upheaval.

It's all there in the text, set down in black and white.

Read it and weep.

PNAC: "This war on terrorism is bogus."

by Michael Meacham, Member of Parliament, United Kingdom

"The 9/11 attacks gave the US an ideal pretext to use force to secure its global domination."

Massive attention has now been given -- and rightly so -- to the reasons why Britain went to war against Iraq. But far too little attention has focused on why the US went to war, and that throws light on British motives too. The conventional explanation is that after the Twin Towers were hit, retaliation against al-Qaida bases in Afghanistan was a natural first step in launching a global war against terrorism. Then, because Saddam Hussein was alleged by the US and UK governments to retain weapons of mass destruction, the war could be extended to Iraq as well. However this theory does not fit all the facts. The truth may be a great deal murkier.

We now know that a blueprint for the creation of a global Pax Americana was drawn up for Dick Cheney (now vice-president), Donald Rumsfeld (defence secretary), Paul Wolfowitz (Rumsfeld's deputy), Jeb Bush (George Bush's younger brother) and Lewis Libby (Cheney's chief of staff). The document, entitled Rebuilding America's Defences, was written in September 2000 by the neoconservative think tank, Project for the New American Century (PNAC).

The plan shows Bush's cabinet intended to take military control of the Gulf region whether or not Saddam Hussein was in power. It says "while the unresolved conflict with Iraq provides the immediate justification, the need for a substantial American force presence in the Gulf transcends the issue of the regime of Saddam Hussein."

The PNAC blueprint supports an earlier document attributed to Wolfowitz and Libby which said the US must "discourage advanced industrial nations from challenging our leadership or even aspiring to a larger regional or global role." It refers to key allies such as the UK as "the most effective and efficient means of exercising American global leadership." It describes peacekeeping missions as "demanding American political leadership rather than that of the UN."

It says "even should Saddam pass from the scene," US bases in Saudi Arabia and Kuwait will remain permanently... as "Iran may well prove as large a threat to US interests as Iraq has." It spotlights China for "regime change," saying "it is time to increase the presence of American forces in SE Asia."

The document also calls for the creation of "US space forces" to dominate space, and the total control of cyberspace to prevent "enemies" using the internet against the US. It also hints that the US may consider developing biological weapons "that can target specific genotypes [and] may transform biological warfare from the realm of terror to a politically useful tool."

A Brief History of PNAC: A Refresher

by T J Templeton, founder: Project for the Old American Century

Once upon a time in an office rented to them by the American Heritage Foundation, a group of powerful men directly connected to the halls of the capital and the defense and energy industry formed a fringe rightwing organization based loosely on the teachings of Leo Strauss. They called themselves the Project for the New American Century.

The Project is an initiative of the New Citizenship Project (both chaired by William Kristol) and as such is largely funded through it. Direct funding for PNAC comes from, but isn't limited to, the Lynde and Harry Bradley Foundation ($700,000), the Sarah Mellon Scaife Foundation ($50,000), and the John M. Olin Foundation ($70,000).

Unsurprisingly these three exceedingly conservative foundations have strong ties to weapons manufacturing and several members of the Project are former CEOs and board members of defense contractors and energy companies. (Halliburton, Trireme, Bechtel, etc.)

These guys drew up a plan for using our role as last remaining super power to expand their respective global markets through force. Specifically, their published documents call for the violent overthrow of regimes around the world that weren't friendly to their business interests. The plan, as it was drawn out, called for the toppling of Saddam Hussein and seizing control of the Iraqi oil fields.

Also, the regime of Afghanistan had to be deposed in order to construct a pipeline to secure access to the natural gas reserves of Central Asia. Once the energy resources were secured, the next step in the plan was to create an archipelago of military bases through the Middle East and Central Asia as a staging point for further operations including the toppling of Iran and Syria.

On page 52 of a document published by them called Rebuilding America's Defenses, they stated that there was such resistance to transforming America's military machine for the job of acting as the world policeman that there would have to be "a catalyzing catastrophic event, similar to a new Pearl Harbor."

Of course, they also had to be returned to the halls of power in the U.S. government first...

Enter George W. Bush. Upon his selection to the Presidency, George promptly appointed the hierarchy of this organization to the top levels of the White House, the Pentagon, and the State Department. Once these men were placed into their respective positions, two very interesting things happened.

First, the cabinet level position created by former President Bill Clinton of "terrorism Czar" was disbanded and its members were reassigned to different duties. This position had previously been meeting at least weekly, specifically on the threat and whereabouts of Osama Bin Laden and the Al Qaeda network. The incoming National Security Advisor refused to meet with the former "terrorism Czar," Richard Clarke, causing him to send several urgent messages to National Security Advisor Rice demanding "an immediate meeting regarding the threat of Al Qaeda and Osama Bin Laden." These requests for meetings went unanswered. Dick Cheney himself has been quoted as saying "Richard Clarke was kept "out of the loop." Shortly after 9-11, Rice penned an editorial in the Washington Post where she calimed the outgoing Clinton administration made no effort to express the threat posed by Al Qaeda. This claim has since been disproved by the public release of several memos penned by Clarke calling for an immediate meeting on that very subject.

Second, the Bush administration invited the Taliban to the United States to discuss a Unocal natural gas pipeline deal that had been stalled. The Taliban wasn't invited to Washington, but rather to Sugarland Texas, home of Tom Delay's district and Unocal headquarters. No deal was reached and the Taliban went home.

The New Pearl Harbor

With the security apparatus that had been monitoring Al Qaeda effectively disbanded, the network was able to orchestrate and carry out the worst terrorist attack in American history. Testifying under oath before the 9-11 commission (which the White House tried to prevent) the National Security advisor, Condi Rice (who the White House also tried to prevent from testifying and then later tried to prevent from having to testify under oath) testified under oath that the Bush administration had no idea that domestic flights could be hijacked and flown into domestic tagets in a coordinated terrorist attack.

Not only did the the famous August 6th PDB seem to refute this in general terms, but also it has come to light that the FAA and the FTA had sent 52 memos to the White House specifically mentioning the impending threat of domestic flights being hijacked and flown into domestic tagets in a coordinated terrorist attack.

Shortly after 9-11, the Taliban regime is toppled, and Hamid Karzai is placed as the President. Karzai is a former Unocal Advisor and CIA asset. Zalmay Khalizad, another Unocal advisor [and PNAC member], is placed as the United States envoy to Afghanistan. Shortly after, the natural gas pipeline is finished and Osama Bin Laden is allowed to escape.

For the next two years, President Bush fails to mention the name Osama Bin Laden in public and instead embarks upon a national media campaign to connect the regime of Saddam Hussein with the threat of terrorism and the terrorist attacks of 9-11. Its effective enough to persuade a compliant Congress to allow the invasion and occupation of Iraq.

Mission Accomplished

The regime of Saddam Hussein is deposed and a puppet regime is installed. Paul Bremer, working as head of the Coalition Provision Authority (CPA) issues a series of orders regarding the rewriting of the Iraqi Constitution in violation of the Geneva Conventions. Orders 39 and 81 give a good deal of insight into the capitalist utopia that was installed for the benefit of the corporations that fund and support the leadership of the occupying countries.

Some examples: Iraqi farmers are no longer allowed to save their own seeds from one harvest to the next. Doing so is now a jailable offense. Some of these strains of seeds have been cultivated by the Iraqis for thousands of years. Now they must be purchased from Monsanto with every planting season.

Another example is the monopolization of entire sectors of industry by the occupying countries. Telecommunications, insurance, banking, all have written into the Iraqi constitution the 100% foreign ownership by foreign entities and must allow for the 100% expatriation of profits. Call it the Walmartization of Mesopotamia. [...]

Furthermore, labor unions were outlawed and reconstruction jobs that would normally help to rebuild the economy and employ Iraqis are handed without bidding to well connected American and British corporations. Thus after a year of relative calm, the insurgency erupts and the United States and it's allies are caught in a quagmire that serves as a catalyst for terrorist recruitment world-wide, a rise in support of violent extremeism and puts us at risk of more terrorist attacks. Thus justifying the toppling of more regimes and setting the scene for perpetual war.

PNAC: "Special Interests" in the Persian Gulf

by Sarah Meyer

"When Saddam started selling Iraqi oil in euros, he jeopardized the U.S. dollar's hegemony as the world's supreme foreign exchange transaction currency."

The United States officially staked its claim to global "pre-eminence" in the PNAC document, Rebuilding America's Defenses, which was published in 2000, i.e., before 9/11.

This Cheney-inspired Wolfowitz / Libby document states its reason for such an imperialist thrust: "special interests." Phrases such as 'US interests', 'global interests', 'long-standing American interests' are also used throughout. What are these "special interests?" The Persian Gulf is often directly referred to within the same sentence. The Gulf Region, a "region of vital importance, is so important to the United States that an 'enduring U.S. security interest' is also imperative. The security interest is, in this document, connected directly to 'commercial interests.'

..... The "special interests" in the Persian Gulf are never, in this document, defined as oil or gas. However, little intelligence is needed to make this connection. Oil and gas are the 'special' and 'commercial interests' in the Persian Gulf, to be controlled and owned by American corporate tsars, at whatever cost. Mainstream Media, also controlled and owned by interconnected tsars, myopically focused on the non-existent weapons of mass destruction in Iraq as a distraction from these 'special interests.'

Bush's Brother Marvin: A Player in 9/11 Security

Marvin P Bush, the President's brother, leaves the board of directors of Sterling, Virginia, based Stratesec after 7 years. Stratesec had provided electronic security for the World Trade Center, Dulles International Airport and United Airlines. The company had a "completion contract" to handle some of the security at the World Trade Center "up to the day the buildings fell down."

Marvin Bush's last year on the board at Stratesec coincides with his first year on the board of HCC Insurance, formerly Houston Casualty Co., one of the insurance carriers for the WTC. He leaves the HCC board in November 2002.

PNAC: From a Christian Perspective

In recent months we have engaged in many conversations with Christians and non Christians alike, on matters concerning the American Government, and its activities in the world today.

On a universal level, those of the faith AND those who do not share our faith agree on one thing, and that is that none of what we have been saying here at 11th Hour for the last 14 months is actual fact, and that it is all "OUR opinion and OUR misinterpretation of George W's policies and intentions," purely speculation and our conjecture: no supportable facts" The following article will summarily place that statement in the wastebasket... where it belongs.

The document outlined in this article was inspired by the foreign policy outline drawn up by Dick Cheney and his colleagues in 1992, when he was secretary of defense for the Senior Bush's administration. It is a documented fact that these men had sent letters to Bill Clinton and raved about these mandates that they felt were essential to America's future.

The Project for a New American Century, (so called), is an initiative of "The New Citizenship Project," which is made up of a startling group of names, which will be mentioned here.

It is absolutely sobering and even chilling when you read the process of world domination laid out in this document, when you consider the fact that the Men who wrote and endorse this document, are the very men who are in control of the White House, the Pentagon, and the Defense Department!

Let's take a look at their motives and their intentions, how they have played out recently, and what we can expect from our government going forward....."

PNAC: A Second Christian Perspective

One of the PNAC group documents clearly shows that Bush and his most senior cabinet members had already planned an attack on Iraq before he took power in January 2001.

In their plan entitled "Rebuilding American's Defenses: Strategies, Forces and Resources for a New Century," reveals that the current members of Bush's cabinet had already planned, before the 2000 presidential election, to take military control of the Gulf region whether Saddam Hussein is in power or not.

"Even should Saddam pass from the scene," the plan says U.S. military bases in Saudi Arabia and Kuwait will remain, despite domestic opposition in the Gulf states to the permanent stationing of U.S. troops.

Iran, it says, "may well prove as large a threat to U.S. interests as Iraq has."

A Roster of the Players

The Project for a New American Century, aka PNAC, is a think tank founded in 1997 by arch-conservative commentator William Kristol, whose illustrious career peak was a stint as Dan Quayle's chief of staff.

Despite this, Kristol somehow rose to become one of the Republican Party's leading intellectuals and editor of The Weekly Standard, the chief propaganda weapon of the neoconservative movement.

7.9 The Neo-Con Agenda is Launched

How Neoconservatives Conquered Washington -- And Launched a War

by Michael Lind

Both the economic-determinist theory and the clash-of-cultures theory are reassuring: They assume that the recent revolution in U.S. foreign policy is the result of obscure but understandable forces in an orderly world. The truth is more alarming. As a result of several bizarre and unforeseeable contingencies – such as the selection rather than election of George W. Bush, and Sept. 11 – the foreign policy of the world's only global power is being made by a small clique that is unrepresentative of either the U.S. population or the mainstream foreign policy establishment.

The core group now in charge consists of neoconservative defense intellectuals. (They are called "neoconservatives" because many of them started off as anti-Stalinist leftists or liberals before moving to the far right.) Inside the government, the chief defense intellectuals include Paul Wolfowitz, the deputy secretary of defense. He is the defense mastermind of the Bush administration; Donald Rumsfeld is an elderly figurehead who holds the position of defense secretary only because Wolfowitz himself is too controversial. Others include Douglas Feith, No. 3 at the Pentagon; Lewis "Scooter" Libby, a Wolfowitz protégé who is Cheney's chief of staff; John R. Bolton, a right-winger assigned to the State Department to keep Colin Powell in check; and Elliott Abrams, recently appointed to head Middle East policy at the National Security Council. On the outside are James Woolsey, the former CIA director, who has tried repeatedly to link both 9/11 and the anthrax letters in the U.S. to Saddam Hussein, and Richard Perle, who has just resigned his unpaid chairmanship of a defense department advisory body after a lobbying scandal. Most of these "experts" never served in the military. But their headquarters is now the civilian defense secretary's office, where these Republican political appointees are despised and distrusted by the largely Republican career soldiers.

The NeoCon Agenda:

Can it be Undermined? Or is Democracy Dead?

All the world has witnessed the lies and the supreme arrogance of both the US and UK governments these past few years. We have all witnessed, in cerebral numbers provided in print if not in person or graphic detail, the tragic deaths of tens of thousands of individual human beings killed by way of our governments' illegal war of aggression in Iraq. We have all seen the plunge into the immoral, inhumane and, thus, criminal abyss of officially sanctioned torture, state-sponsored kidnappings and disappearances (officially known as "extraordinary renditions") and indefinite detentions of individuals imprisoned for years without charge or due process of law.

"We now know beyond any doubt—as the majority of the world's politically aware knew before the start of the war, despite the onslaught of rhetoric spewed by politicians to quell dissent and the continual drumbeat of the corporate media-delivered propaganda craftily packaged as if to deliver us from the evil that is, apparently, commonsense—that this war could only have been sold to the American and British people were we to be bombarded by our own governments' criminal lies. And, sold it was, rolled out and marketed as would a psychologically researched, high-end advertising campaign of an immoral corporation which seeks to maximize shareholder value through the plying of harmful products, practices or byproducts. Yet, when democratic representation exists in name only, corrupt politicians, like their corrupt corporate executive counterparts, will continue to rule, as we the people rue, the day.

The Office of Special Plans:

Despite condemning itself, Pentagon report sees intelligence problem resolved; Makes no recommendations

by Larisa Alexandrovna
February 9, 2007

The following is the declassified two page summary of the Office of Special Plans report, as acquired Friday morning by RAW STORY.

The Pentagon's Inspector General said he found it unnecessary to make any recommendations, saying changed relationships between the Defense Department and the Intelligence Community "significantly reduce the opportunity for the inappropriate conduct of intelligence activities outside of intelligence channels" in the future.

In a statement Thursday, Armed Services Committee chairman Sen. Carl Levin (D-MI) called the report a "devastating condemnation of the activities of the Office of the Undersecretary of Defense for Policy." In a separate statement, Sen. Jay Rockefeller (D-WV), chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, says whether intelligence activities "were authorized or not, it appears that they were not in compliance with the law."

Raw Story's earlier report, published Wednesday, follows. It includes a quote from Feith and other details about the long-stalled pre-war intelligence inquiry.

Pentagon Inspector General to release investigation into secretive pre-war Iraq intelligence group

Update: A source close to Senate Intelligence Committee says the Committee will now be receiving the classified version of the Pentagon's report on the Office of Special Plans Thursday evening, adding that the summary to be made public will be released Friday.

A long awaited Pentagon Inspector General's report into the Office of Special Plans and its activities surrounding pre-war intelligence in the lead up to the Iraq war has been completed, RAW STORY has learned.

According to sources close to the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, the classified version of the Pentagon IG's report will be released to committee members Friday. Two to three declassified pages may also be concurrently released to the public.

A Senate aide on the committee, while not commenting on particular questions regarding the IG's report, confirmed that a major focal point involves former Deputy Undersecretary for Defense Policy Douglas Feith – a keystone of the Administration's intelligence on Iraq and director of the notoriously secretive Pentagon Office of Special Plans from September 2002 to June 2003.

Feith announced his resignation in January 2005, a week after the New Yorker's Seymour Hersh accused him of working with Israeli officials to select potential targets for a preemptive Iran strike.

It remains unclear how objective the Inspector General's report will be, given that the Pentagon was tasked with investigating itself. It's also uncertain just how much light two to three declassified pages will shed on questions surrounding what many consider a rogue Pentagon intelligence unit created to feed the White House information favoring a case for war.

For his part, Feith says he has not been privy to the IG's findings.

I "haven't seen a copy of the IG report," Feith wrote in an email to RAW STORY in the early hours on Wednesday. "I requested a copy but the IG's office chose not to provide one."

Asked in a three point email about his thoughts on the Office of Special Plans, Feith – who now teaches at the Georgetown University Walsh School of Foreign Service – responded, "I'll save my thoughts on question three for another time."

Repeated attempts to reach the IG's office in time for publication proved fruitless. In the past, the IG's office responded to questions by saying the IG was conducting a "review," not an "investigation."

Either way, the Pentagon has told the Senate Intelligence Committee to expect the report Friday.

Phase II of the Intelligence Committee's own investigation will likely be completed sometime this spring or summer.

Investigating pre-war Iraq intelligence

The Senate Intelligence Committee's investigation into Iraq intelligence failures was to be done in two phases. Phase I, which focused exclusively on the failures of the Central Intelligence Agency, was released in July 2004. However, Phase II, which looked into the Office of Special Plans, its members, and Bush Administration officials, remains largely incomplete.

The Phase II investigation was delayed in large part because the Pentagon specifically refused to address Feith's role and the Office's activities, stonewalling the Senate's efforts.

Even with a then-Republican Chairman, Sen. Pat Roberts (R-KS), Defense Department attorneys were unwilling to cooperate. Instead of issuing subpoenas, however, Roberts asked the Pentagon Inspector General to conduct his own investigation.

The Pentagon's IG agreed to review the prewar intelligence activities relating to the Office of Special Plans, as well as Feith's particular role, in November 2005. One of two senators who requested the inquiry, Democratic Sen. Carl Levin (D-MI), said the probe sought to ascertain whether Feith "provided a separate channel of intelligence, unbeknownst to the CIA, to the White House."

The Office of Special Plans

The report on the secretive Office of Special Plans and its coterie of controversial players is perhaps the most awaited section of the Phase II report.

Led by Feith, the group's members also included Larry Franklin, who pleaded guilty to leaking classified documents regarding Iran to a Washington-based Israeli lobby in 2005; prominent neoconservative and Iran-Contra intermediary Michael Ledeen; and Middle East expert Harold Rhode, who purportedly sought to purge the Pentagon of anyone opposing the group's hawkish Iraq agenda.

Another prominent member was Ahmed Chalabi, who headed up the Iraqi National Congress – an Iraq opposition group created by the Rendon Group, a defense contractor for the U.S. military, after the first Gulf War.

Although he was wanted for embezzlement in Jordan and a suspected Iranian spy, the Administration presented Chalabi as a credible anti-Saddam leader. Chalabi was later found to be a primary source of bogus intelligence provided to the Pentagon and U.S. reporters, including Judith Miller, then writing for The New York Times.

The Office of Special Plans was created by then-Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld and Deputy Secretary Paul Wolfowitz. On an organizational level, [Doug] Feith ran the operation, which then purportedly "cooked" and filtered intelligence that favored an Iraq invasion. More specifically, the OSP was tasked with finding intelligence that fit the administration's anti-Iraq policy and was treated as a favored and separate intelligence channel by the Office of ... Vice President [Cheney].

While the US intelligence community struggled to check a hawkish Executive Branch set on going to war, the OSP funneled questionable information directly to the White House, bypassing standard channels and operational procedures and deploying its own "off book teams" into the region without notifying special forces already on the ground.

A history of espionage allegations

Compounding concerns over a self-investigating Defense Department are a history of confessed and alleged espionage by members of the OSP.

A previous investigation by RAW STORY revealed an apparent "revolving door policy" at the Pentagon which allowed officials whose clearances had been revoked to return to powerful positions in US government.

Feith's access to classified information and any possible wrongdoing can likely be laid at the feet of more senior officials in the Bush Administration – namely former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld – who would have been forced to overrule Pentagon background checks to reissue Feith's clearances after he was booted from the National Security Council for espionage allegations in the mid-1980s.

According to the Washington Post, Feith faced questioning in 2004 on allegations that he or other officials may have passed classified information to an Iraqi politician or a pro-Israeli lobby group.

Asked if he was still under investigation by the FBI or if he was cleared, Feith responded, "Still? There never was such an investigation."

Iran specialist Larry Franklin – who worked directly under Feith – pleaded guilty in 2005 to conspiracy to pass classified information to the American Israeli Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC), a pro-Israeli lobby group, and illegal possession of national defense information. Feith has not been charged or accused of wrongdoing in the case.

In 1978, former Rumsfeld Deputy Paul Wolfowitz was investigated for allegedly passing a classified document on proposed US weapons sales to Israel through the same pro-Israeli lobby. The inquiry was later dropped. Wolfowitz now serves as president of the World Bank. [Until he was forced to resign after it was discovered he had put his girlfriend on the payroll, at which point he was succeeded by Robert Zoellick -- yet another affiliate of PNAC.]

Wolfowitz, who at the time was working for the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, was brought into that position by conservative political adviser Richard Perle [of PNAC], who was also questioned in connection with the Franklin case.

A Bush appointee, Perle most recently served as chairman of the Pentagon Defense Policy Board but resigned his chairmanship after the Franklin case broke. According to an FBI wiretap, Perle discussed classified information with the Israeli embassy when he was a foreign policy aide for Senator Henry M. Jackson in 1970; in 1978, the New York Times reported that he inappropriately accepted classified data from a CIA official, again as Jackson's aide.

The New Pentagon Papers

A High-Ranking Military Officer Reveals how Defense Department Extremists Suppressed Information and Twisted the Truth to Drive the Country to War

by Karen Kwiatkowski
March 10, 2004

In July of last year, after just over 20 years of service, I retired as a lieutenant colonel in the U.S. Air Force.

I had served as a communications officer in the field and in acquisition programs, as a speechwriter for the National Security Agency director, and on the Headquarters Air Force and the office of the secretary of defense staffs covering African affairs. I had completed Air Command and Staff College and Navy War College seminar programs, two master's degrees, and everything but my Ph.D. dissertation in world politics at Catholic University. I regarded my military vocation as interesting, rewarding and apolitical. My career started in 1978 with the smooth seduction of a full four-year ROTC scholarship.

It ended with 10 months of duty in a strange new country, observing up close and personal a process of decision making for war not sanctioned by the Constitution we had all sworn to uphold. Ben Franklin's comment that the Constitutional Convention of 1787 in Philadelphia had delivered "a republic, madam, if you can keep it" would come to have special meaning.

In the spring of 2002, I was a cynical but willing staff officer, almost two years into my three-year tour at the office of the secretary of defense, undersecretary for policy, sub-Saharan Africa. In April, a call for volunteers went out for the Near East South Asia directorate (NESA). None materialized. By May, the call transmogrified into a posthaste demand for any staff officer, and I was "volunteered" to enter what would be a well-appointed den of iniquity.

The education I would receive there was like an M. Night Shyamalan movie -- intense, fascinating and frightening. While the people were very much alive, I saw a dead philosophy -- Cold War anti-communism and neo-imperialism -- walking the corridors of the Pentagon. It wore the clothing of counterterrorism and spoke the language of a holy war between good and evil. The evil was recognized by the leadership to be resident mainly in the Middle East and articulated by Islamic clerics and radicals.

But there were other enemies within, anyone who dared voice any skepticism about their grand plans, including Secretary of State Colin Powell and Gen. Anthony Zinni.

From May 2002 until February 2003, I observed firsthand the formation of the Pentagon's Office of Special Plans and watched the latter stages of the neoconservative capture of the policy-intelligence nexus in the run-up to the invasion of Iraq. This seizure of the reins of U.S. Middle East policy was directly visible to many of us working in the Near East South Asia policy office, and yet there seemed to be little any of us could do about it.

I saw a narrow and deeply flawed policy favored by some executive appointees in the Pentagon used to manipulate and pressurize the traditional relationship between policymakers in the Pentagon and U.S. intelligence agencies.

I witnessed neoconservative agenda bearers within OSP usurp measured and carefully considered assessments, and through suppression and distortion of intelligence analysis promulgate what were in fact falsehoods to both Congress and the executive office of the president.

While this commandeering of a narrow segment of both intelligence production and American foreign policy matched closely with the well-published desires of the neoconservative wing of the Republican Party, many of us in the Pentagon, conservatives and liberals alike, felt that this agenda, whatever its flaws or merits, had never been openly presented to the American people.

Instead, the public story line was a fear-peddling and confusing set of messages, designed to take Congress and the country into a war of executive choice, a war based on false pretenses, and a war one year later Americans do not really understand. That is why I have gone public with my account.

To begin with, I was introduced to Bill Luti, assistant secretary of defense for NESA. A tall, thin, nervously intelligent man, he welcomed me into the fold. I knew little about him. Because he was a recently retired naval captain and now high-level Bush appointee, the common assumption was that he had connections, if not capability.

I would later find out that when Dick Cheney was secretary of defense over a decade earlier, Luti was his aide. He had also been a military aide to Speaker of the House Newt Gingrich during the Clinton years and had completed his Ph.D. at the Fletcher School at Tufts University. While his Navy career had not granted him flag rank, he had it now and was not shy about comparing his place in the pecking order with various three- and four-star generals and admirals in and out of the Pentagon. Name dropping included references to getting this or that document over to Scooter, or responding to one of Scooter's requests right away. Scooter, I would find out later, was I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, the vice president's chief of staff.

Co-workers who had watched the transition from Clintonista to Bushite shared conversations and stories indicating that something deliberate and manipulative was happening to NESAs. Key professional personnel, longtime civilian professionals holding the important billets in NESAs, were replaced early on during the transition. Longtime officer director Joe McMillan was reassigned to the National Defense University. The director's job in the time of transition was to help bring the newly appointed deputy assistant secretary up to speed, ensure office continuity, act as a resource relating to regional histories and policies, and help identify the best ways to maintain course or to implement change.

Removing such a critical continuity factor was not only unusual but also seemed like willful handicapping. It was the first signal of radical change.

At the time, I didn't realize that the expertise on Middle East policy was not only being removed, but was also being exchanged for that from various agenda-bearing think tanks, including the Middle East Media Research Institute, the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, and the Jewish Institute for National Security Affairs. Interestingly, the office director billet stayed vacant the whole time I was there. That vacancy and the long-term absence of real regional understanding to inform defense policymakers in the Pentagon explains a great deal about the neoconservative approach on the Middle East and the disastrous mistakes made in Washington and in Iraq in the past two years.

I soon saw the modus operandi of "instant policy" unhampered by debate or experience with the early Bush administration replacement of the civilian head of the Israel, Lebanon and Syria desk office with a young political appointee from the Washington Institute, David Schenker. Word was that the former experienced civilian desk officer tended to be evenhanded toward the policies of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon of Israel, but there were complaints and he was gone. I met David and chatted with him frequently. He was a smart, serious, hardworking guy, and the proud author of a book on the chances for Palestinian democracy. Country desk officers were rarely political appointees. In my years at the Pentagon, this was the only "political" I knew doing that type of high-stress and low-recognition duty. So eager was the office to have Schenker at the Israel desk, he served for many months as a defense contractor of sorts and only received his "Schedule C" political appointee status months after I arrived.

I learned that there was indeed a preferred ideology for NESAs. My first day in the office, a GS-15 career civil servant rather unhappily advised me that if I wanted to be successful here, I'd better remember not to say anything positive about the Palestinians. This belied official U.S. policy of serving as an honest broker for resolution of Israeli and Palestinian security concerns. At that time, there was a great deal of talk about Bush's possible support for a Palestinian state.

That the Pentagon could have implemented and, worse, was implementing its own foreign policy had not yet occurred to me.

Throughout the summer, the NESAs spaces in one long office on the fourth floor, between the 7th and 8th corridors of D Ring, became more and more crowded. With war talk and planning about Iraq, all kinds of new people were brought in. A politically savvy civilian-clothes-wearing lieutenant colonel named Bill Bruner served as the Iraq desk officer, and he had apparently joined NESAs about the time Bill Luti did. I discovered that Bruner, like Luti, had served as a military aide to Speaker Gingrich. Gingrich himself was now conveniently an active member of Bush's Defense Policy Board, which had space immediately below ours on the third floor.

I asked why Bruner wore civilian attire, and was told by others, "He's Chalabi's handler." Chalabi, of course, was Ahmad Chalabi, the president of the Iraqi National Congress, who was the favored exile of the neoconservatives and the source of much of their "intelligence." Bruner himself said he had to attend a lot of meetings downtown in hotels and that explained his suits. Soon, in July, he was joined by another Air Force pilot, a colonel with no discernible political connections, Kevin Jones. I thought of it as a military-civilian partnership, although both were commissioned officers.

Among the other people arriving over the summer of 2002 was Michael Makovsky, a recent MIT graduate who had written his dissertation on Winston Churchill and was going to work on "Iraqi oil issues." He was David Makovsky's younger brother. David was at the time a senior fellow at the Washington Institute and had formerly been an editor of the Jerusalem Post, a pro-Likud newspaper. Mike was quiet and seemed a bit uncomfortable sharing space with us. He soon disappeared into some other part of the operation and I rarely saw him after that.

In late summer, new space was found upstairs on the fifth floor, and the "expanded Iraq desk," now dubbed the "Office of Special Plans," began moving there. And OSP kept expanding.

Another person I observed to appear suddenly was Michael Rubin, another Washington Institute fellow working on Iraq policy. He and Chris Straub, a retired Army officer who had been a Republican staffer for the Senate Intelligence Committee, were eventually assigned to OSP.

John Trigilio, a Defense Intelligence Agency analyst, was assigned to handle Iraq intelligence for Luti. Trigilio had been on a one-year career-enhancement tour with the office of the secretary of defense that was to end in August 2002. DIA had offered him routine intelligence positions upon his return from his OSD sabbatical, but none was as interesting as working in August 2002 for Luti. John asked Luti for help in gaining an extension for another year, effectively removing him from the DIA bureaucracy and its professional constraints.

Trigilio and I had hallway debates, as friends. The one I remember most clearly was shortly after President Bush gave his famous "mushroom cloud" speech in Cincinnati in October 2002, asserting that Saddam had weapons of mass destruction as well as ties to "international terrorists," and was working feverishly to develop nuclear weapons with "nuclear holy warriors."

I asked John who was feeding the president all the bull about Saddam and the threat he posed us in terms of WMD delivery and his links to terrorists, as none of this was in secret intelligence I had seen in the past years. John insisted that it wasn't an exaggeration, but when pressed to say which actual intelligence reports made these claims, he would only say, "Karen, we have sources that you don't have access to."

It was widely felt by those of us in the office not in the neoconservatives' inner circle that these "sources" related to the chummy relationship that Ahmad Chalabi had with both the Office of Special Plans and the office of the vice president.

The newly named director of the OSP, Abram Shulsky, was one of the most senior people sharing our space that summer. Abe, a kindly and gentle man, who would say hello to me in the hallways, seemed to be someone I, as a political science grad student, would have loved to sit with over coffee and discuss the world's problems. I had a clear sense that Abe ranked high in the organization, although ostensibly he was under Luti. Luti was known at times to treat his staff, even senior staff, with disrespect, contempt and derision. He also didn't take kindly to staff officers who had an opinion or viewpoint that was off the neoconservative reservation. But with Shulsky, who didn't speak much at the staff meetings, he was always respectful and deferential. It seemed like Shulsky's real boss was somebody like Douglas Feith or higher.

Doug Feith, undersecretary of defense for policy, was a case study in how not to run a large organization. In late 2001, he held the first all-hands policy meeting at which he discussed for over 15 minutes how many bullets and sub-bullets should be in papers for Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. A year later, in August of 2002, he held another all-hands meeting in the auditorium where he embarrassed everyone with an emotional performance about what it was like to serve Rumsfeld. He blithely informed us that for months he didn't realize Rumsfeld had a daily stand-up meeting with his four undersecretaries. He shared with us the fact that, after he started to attend these meetings, he knew better what Rumsfeld wanted of him.

Most military staffers and professional civilians hearing this were incredulous, as was I, to hear of such organizational ignorance lasting so long and shared so openly. Feith's inattention to most policy detail, except that relating to Israel and Iraq, earned him a reputation most foul throughout Policy, with rampant stories of routine signatures that took months to achieve and lost documents. His poor reputation as a manager was not helped by his arrogance. One thing I kept hearing from those defending Feith was that he was "just brilliant." It was curiously like the brainwashed refrain in "The Manchurian Candidate" about the programmed sleeper agent Raymond Shaw, as the "kindest, warmest, bravest, most wonderful human being I've ever known."

I spent time that summer exploring the neoconservative worldview and trying to grasp what was happening inside the Pentagon. I wondered what could explain this rush to war and disregard for real intelligence. Neoconservatives are fairly easy to study, mainly because they are few in number, and they show up at all the same parties. Examining them as individuals, it became clear that almost all have worked together, in and out of government, on national security issues for several decades. The Project for the New American Century and its now famous 1998 manifesto to President Clinton on Iraq is a recent example. But this statement was preceded by one written for Benjamin Netanyahu's Likud Party campaign in Israel in 1996 by neoconservatives Richard Perle, David Wurmser and Douglas Feith titled "A Clean Break: Strategy for Securing the Realm."

David Wurmser is the least known of that trio and an interesting example of the tangled neoconservative web. In 2001, the research fellow at the American Enterprise Institute was assigned to the Pentagon, then moved to the Department of State to work as deputy for the hard-line conservative undersecretary John Bolton, then to the National Security Council, and now is lodged in the office of the vice president. His wife, the prolific Meyrav Wurmser, executive director of the Middle East Media Research Institute, is also a neoconservative team player.

Before the Iraq invasion, many of these same players labored together for literally decades to push a defense strategy that favored military intervention and confrontation with enemies, secret and unconstitutional if need be. Some former officials, such as Richard Perle (an assistant secretary of defense under Reagan) and James Woolsey (CIA director under Clinton), were granted a new lease on life, a renewed gravitas, with positions on President Bush's Defense Policy Board. Others, like Elliott Abrams and Paul Wolfowitz, had apparently overcome previous negative associations from an Iran-Contra conviction for lying to the Congress and for utterly miscalculating the strength of the Soviet Union in a politically driven report to the CIA.

Neoconservatives march as one phalanx in parallel opposition to those they hate. In the early winter of 2002, a co-worker U.S. Navy captain and I were discussing the service being rendered by Colin Powell at the time, and we were told by the neoconservative political appointee David Schenker that "the best service Powell could offer would be to quit right now."

I was present at a staff meeting when Bill Luti called Marine Gen. and former Chief of Central Command Anthony Zinni a "traitor," because Zinni had publicly expressed reservations about the rush to war.

After August 2002, the Office of Special Plans established its own rhythm and cadence separate from the non-politically minded professionals covering the rest of the region. While often accused of creating intelligence, I saw only two apparent products of this office: war planning guidance for Rumsfeld, presumably impacting Central Command, and talking points on Iraq, WMD and terrorism.

These internal talking points seemed to be a mélange crafted from obvious past observation and intelligence bits and pieces of dubious origin. They were propagandistic in style, and all desk officers were ordered to use them verbatim in the preparation of any material prepared for higher-ups and people outside the Pentagon.

The talking points included statements about Saddam Hussein's proclivity for using chemical weapons against his own citizens and neighbors, his existing relations with terrorists based on a member of al-Qaida reportedly receiving medical care in Baghdad, his widely publicized aid to the Palestinians, and general indications of an aggressive viability in Saddam Hussein's nuclear weapons program and his ongoing efforts to use them against his neighbors or give them to al-Qaida style groups. The talking points said he was threatening his neighbors and was a serious threat to the U.S., too.

I suspected, from reading Charles Krauthammer, a neoconservative columnist for the Washington Post, and the Weekly Standard, and hearing a Cheney speech or two, that these talking points left the building on occasion.

Both OSP functions duplicated other parts of the Pentagon.

The facts we should have used to base our papers on were already being produced by the intelligence agencies, and the war planning was already done by the combatant command staff with some help from the Joint Staff.

Instead of developing defense policy alternatives and advice, OSP was used to manufacture propaganda for internal and external use, and pseudo war planning.

As a result of my duties as the North Africa desk officer, I became acquainted with the Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA) support staff for NESAs. Every policy regional director was served by a senior executive intelligence professional from DIA, along with a professional intelligence staff. This staff channeled DIA products, accepted tasks for DIA, and in the past had been seen as a valued member of the regional teams. However, as the war approached, this type of relationship with the Defense Intelligence Agency crumbled.

Even the most casual observer could note the tension and even animosity between "Wild Bill" Luti (as we came to refer to our boss) and Bruce Hardcastle, our defense intelligence officer (DIO). Certainly, there were stylistic and personality differences. Hardcastle, like most senior intelligence officers I knew, was serious, reserved, deliberate, and went to great lengths to achieve precision and accuracy in his speech and writing. Luti was the kind of guy who, in staff meetings and in conversations, would jump from grand theory to administrative minutiae with nary a blink or a fleeting shadow of self-awareness.

I discovered that Luti and possibly others within OSP were dissatisfied with Hardcastle's briefings, in particular with the aspects relating to WMD and terrorism. I was not clear exactly what those concerns were, but I came to understand that the DIA briefing did not match what OSP was claiming about Iraq's WMD capabilities and terrorist activities. I learned that shortly before I arrived there had been an incident in NESAs where Hardcastle's presence and briefing at a bilateral meeting had been nixed abruptly by Luti. The story circulating among the desk officers was "a last-minute cancellation" of the DIO presentation. Hardcastle's intelligence briefing was replaced with one prepared by another Policy office that worked nonproliferation issues. While this alternative briefing relied on intelligence produced by DIO and elsewhere, it was not a product of the DIA or CIA community, but instead was an OSD Policy "branded" product -- and so were its conclusions.

The message sent by Policy appointees and well understood by staff officers and the defense intelligence community was that senior appointed civilians were willing to exclude or marginalize intelligence products that did not fit the agenda.

Staff officers would always request OSP's most current Iraq, WMD and terrorism talking points. On occasion, these weren't available in an approved form and awaited Shulsky's approval. The talking points were a series of bulleted statements, written persuasively and in a convincing way, and superficially they seemed reasonable and rational. Saddam Hussein had gassed his neighbors, abused his people, and was continuing in that mode, becoming an imminently dangerous threat to his neighbors and to us -- except that none of his neighbors or Israel felt this was the case. Saddam Hussein had harbored al-Qaida operatives and offered and probably provided them with training facilities -- without mentioning that the suspected facilities were in the U.S./Kurdish-controlled part of Iraq. Saddam Hussein was pursuing and had WMD of the type that could be used by him, in conjunction with al-Qaida and other terrorists, to attack and damage American interests, Americans and America -- except the intelligence didn't really say that. Saddam Hussein had not been seriously weakened by war and sanctions and weekly bombings over the past 12 years, and in fact was plotting to hurt America and support anti-American activities, in part through his carrying on with terrorists -- although here the intelligence said the opposite. His support for the Palestinians and Arafat proved his terrorist connections, and basically, the time to act was now. This was the gist of the talking points, and it remained on message throughout the time I watched the points evolve.

But evolve they did, and the subtle changes I saw from September to late January revealed what the Office of Special Plans was contributing to national security. Two key types of modifications were directed or approved by Shulsky and his team of politicians. First was the deletion of entire references or bullets.

The one I remember most specifically is when they dropped the bullet that said one of Saddam's intelligence operatives had met with Mohammad Atta in Prague, supposedly salient proof that Saddam was in part responsible for the 9/11 attack. That claim had lasted through a number of revisions, but after the media reported the claim as unsubstantiated by U.S. intelligence, denied by the Czech government, and that Atta's location had been confirmed by the FBI to be elsewhere, that particular bullet was dropped entirely from our "advice on things to say" to senior Pentagon officials when they met with guests or outsiders.

The other change made to the talking points was along the line of fine-tuning and generalizing. Much of what was there was already so general as to be less than accurate.

Some bullets were softened, particularly statements of Saddam's readiness and capability in the chemical, biological or nuclear arena. Others were altered over time to match more exactly something Bush and Cheney said in recent speeches.

One item I never saw in our talking points was a reference to Saddam's purported attempt to buy yellowcake uranium in Niger. The OSP list of crime and evil had included Saddam's attempts to seek fissionable materials or uranium in Africa. This point was written mostly in the present tense and conveniently left off the dates of the last known attempt, sometime in the late 1980s. I was surprised to hear the president's mention of the yellowcake in Niger in his 2002 State of the Union address because that indeed was new and in theory might have represented new intelligence, something that seemed remarkably absent in any of the products provided us by the OSP (although not for lack of trying). After hearing of it, I checked with my old office of Sub-Saharan African Affairs -- and it was news to them, too.

It also turned out to be false.

It is interesting today that the "defense" for those who lied or prevaricated about Iraq is to point the finger at the intelligence. But the National Intelligence Estimate, published in September 2002, as remarked upon recently by former CIA Middle East chief Ray McGovern, was an afterthought. It was provoked only after Sens. Bob Graham and Dick Durban noted in August 2002, as Congress was being asked to support a resolution for preemptive war, that no NIE elaborating real threats to the United States had been provided. In fact, it had not been written, but a suitable NIE was dutifully prepared and submitted the very next month. Naturally, this document largely supported most of the outrageous statements already made publicly by Bush, Cheney, Rice and Rumsfeld about the threat Iraq posed to the United States. All the caveats, reservations and dissents made by intelligence were relegated to footnotes and kept from the public. Funny how that worked.

Starting in the fall of 2002 I found a way to vent my frustrations with the neoconservative hijacking of our defense policy. The safe outlet was provided by retired Col. David Hackworth, who agreed to publish my short stories anonymously on his Web site Soldiers for the Truth, under the moniker of "Deep Throat: Insider Notes From the Pentagon."

The "deep throat" part was his idea, but I was happy to have a sense that there were folks out there, mostly military, who would be interested in the secretary of defense-sponsored insanity I was witnessing on almost a daily basis. When I was particularly upset, like when I heard Zinni called a "traitor," I wrote about it in articles like this one.

In November, my Insider articles discussed the artificial worlds created by the Pentagon and the stupid naiveté of neocon assumptions about what would happen when we invaded Iraq.

I discussed the price of public service, distinguishing between public servants who told the truth and then saw their careers flame out and those "public servants" who did not tell the truth and saw their careers ignite.

My December articles became more depressing, discussing the history of the 100 Years' War and "combat lobotomies." There was a painful one titled "Minority Reports" about the necessity but unlikelihood of a Philip Dick sci-fi style "minority report" on Feith-Wolfowitz-Rumsfeld-Cheney's insanely grandiose vision of some future Middle East, with peace, love and democracy brought on through preemptive war and military occupation.

I shared some of my concerns with a civilian who had been remotely acquainted with the Luti-Feith-Perle political clan in his previous work for one of the senior Pentagon witnesses during the Iran-Contra hearings. He told me these guys were engaged in something worse than Iran-Contra. I was curious but he wouldn't tell me anything more. I figured he knew what he was talking about. I thought of him when I read much later about the 2002 and 2003 meetings between Michael Ledeen, Reuel Marc Gerecht and Iranian arms dealer Manucher Ghorbanifar -- all Iran-Contra figures.

In December 2002, I requested an acceleration of my retirement to the following July. By now, the military was anxiously waiting under the bed for the other shoe to drop amid concerns over troop availability, readiness for an ill-defined mission, and lack of day-after clarity. The neocons were anxiously struggling to get that damn shoe off.

That other shoe fell with a thump, as did the regard many of us had held for Colin Powell, on Feb. 5 as the secretary of state capitulated to the neoconservative line in his speech at the United Nations -- a speech not only filled with falsehoods pushed by the neoconservatives but also containing many statements already debunked by intelligence.

War is generally crafted and pursued for political reasons, but the reasons given to the Congress and to the American people for this one were inaccurate and so misleading as to be false. Moreover, they were false by design.

Certainly, the neoconservatives never bothered to sell the rest of the country on the real reasons for occupation of Iraq -- more bases from which to flex U.S. muscle with Syria and Iran, and better positioning for the inevitable fall of the regional ruling sheikdoms. Maintaining OPEC on a dollar track and not a euro and fulfilling a half-baked imperial vision also played a role. These more accurate reasons for invading and occupying could have been argued on their merits -- an angry and aggressive U.S. population might indeed have supported the war and occupation for those reasons.

But Americans didn't get the chance for an honest debate.

President Bush has now appointed a commission to look at American intelligence capabilities and will report after the election. It will "examine intelligence on weapons of mass destruction and related 21st century threats ... [and] compare what the Iraq Survey Group learns with the information we had prior..."

The commission, aside from being modeled on failed rubber stamp commissions of the past and consisting entirely of those selected by the executive branch, specifically excludes an examination of the role of the Office of Special Plans and other executive advisory bodies.

If the president or vice president were seriously interested in "getting the truth," they might consider asking for evidence on how intelligence was politicized, misused and manipulated, and whether information from the intelligence community was distorted in order to sway Congress and public opinion in a narrowly conceived neoconservative push for war.

Bush says he wants the truth, but it is clear he is no more interested in it today than he was two years ago.

Proving that the truth is indeed the first casualty in war, neoconservative member of the Defense Policy Board Richard Perle called this February for "heads to roll." Perle, agenda setter par excellence, named George Tenet and Defense Intelligence Agency head Vice Adm. Lowell Jacoby as guilty of failing to properly inform the president on Iraq and WMD. No doubt, the intelligence community, susceptible to politicization and outdated paradigms, needs reform. The swiftness of the neoconservative casting of blame on the intelligence community and away from themselves should have been fully expected.

Perhaps Perle and others sense the grave and growing danger of political storms unleashed by the exposure of neoconservative lies. Meanwhile, Ahmad Chalabi, extravagantly funded by the neocons in the Pentagon to the tune of millions to provide the disinformation, has boasted with remarkable frankness, "We are heroes in error," and, "What was said before is not important."

Now we are told by our president and neoconservative mouthpieces that our sons and daughters, husbands and wives are in Iraq fighting for freedom, for liberty, for justice and American values. This cost is not borne by the children of Wolfowitz, Perle, Rumsfeld and Cheney. Bush's daughters do not pay this price.

We are told that intelligence has failed America, and that President Bush is determined to get to the bottom of it. Yet not a single neoconservative appointee has lost his job, and no high official of principle in the administration has formally resigned because of this ill-planned and ill-conceived war and poorly implemented occupation of Iraq.

Will Americans hold U.S. policymakers accountable? Will we return to our roots as a republic, constrained and deliberate, respectful of others? My experience in the Pentagon leading up to the invasion and occupation of Iraq tells me, as Ben Franklin warned, we may have already failed.

But if Americans at home are willing to fight -- tenaciously and courageously -- to preserve our republic, we might be able to keep it.

BOOK: New American Empire

by Lloyd Gardner and Marilyn Young

In The New American Empire, a group of leading authorities on American foreign policy identify the precursors of this new direction in the U.S. overseas ventures of the 20th century. Offering an accessible, critical overview of foreign relations, they assess both the distinct continuities between past and present U.S. policy, as well as what makes the current administration's policies dramatically different.

The essays also reveal how those policies serve the ends of favored groups, for whom imperialism pays both ideologically and materially.

The Enemy Within: The Neo-Con Hijacking of America

By Manuel Valenzuela

[The foreign strategy of the US must be]: "... unapologetic, idealistic, assertive and well funded. America must not only be the world's policeman or its sheriff, it must be its beacon and guide. Our first objective is to prevent the re-emergence of a new rival. This is a dominant consideration underlying the new regional defense strategy and requires that we endeavor to prevent any hostile power from dominating a region whose resources would, under consolidated control, be sufficient to generate global power. These regions include Western Europe, East Asia, the territory of the former Soviet Union, and Southwest Asia."

The Genetically Modified Bomb

by Thom Hartmann

Imagine a bomb that only kills Caucasians with red hair. Or short people. Or Arabs. Or Chinese.

Now imagine that this new bomb could be set off anywhere in the world, and that within a matter of days, weeks, or months it would kill every person on the planet who fits the bomb's profile, although the rest of us would be left standing. And the bomb could go off silently, without anybody realizing it had been released - or even where it was released - until its victims started dying in mass numbers.

Who would imagine such a thing?

Paul Wolfowitz, for one. William Kristol for another.

And, history shows, when the men who define U.S. military policy from the shadows set their sights on something, it's worthy of our attention.

I have brown hair and eyes, both determined by specific genes, and there are probably other markers deep within my DNA that would show a geneticist that most of my ancestors are Norwegian, Welsh, and English. While there's no one gene for race, there are numerous genes for the various components of what we call race - hair color and texture, skin and eye color, eye and nose shape, predispositions or immunities to disease like Sickle Cell Anemia or Tay-Sachs, and the like.

When creating a genetic bomb to target specific groups, such genetic profiles are actually far subtler and more accurate than the coarse pseudo-category we call race. Among men named Cohen all over the world, for example, researchers have found a specific genetic profile tying them all back to a common ancestor. Another group with a common genetic profile are people with ADHD ("The Edison Gene"), who uniquely share common inherited variations in their dopamine-regulating genes regardless of their ostensible race, geography, or ethnicity.

Thus, anybody who's part of a group with a shared genetic profile may be at risk in the future, suggest the authors of The Project for a New American Century's (PNAC) report titled "Rebuilding America's Defenses: Strategy, Forces and Resources For a New Century."

The report notes that, "Much has been written in recent years about the need to transform the conventional armed forces of the United States to take advantage of the 'revolution in military affairs....'" They point out that our military requires a dramatic transformation, lest we lose our ability to fight future, unconventional wars. Some may be fought in cyberspace, others underwater or in outer space. And some even within our own bodies.

Consider what would happen if there was a virus or bacteria that only infected a particular type of person, killing, disabling, or sterilizing only those of a particular genetic profile. Consider the political leverage a nation would have if they could credibly threaten the extinction of all people worldwide with almond-shaped eyes, or the sterilization of everybody with a gene that tracks them back to a common ancestor or region.

Three years ago, Wolfowitz, Kristol, and their colleagues suggested this is something the Pentagon should be thinking about. Not just germ warfare, but gene warfare.

And it's not limited just to warfare: Imagine how genetic terraforming could replace diplomacy, could even render the United Nations irrelevant if entire ethnic groups were wiped out or could be controlled by the threat of extinction. Or how it could change the face of politics if an organism got loose that killed off all the people of a particular minority who tend to vote for a particular political party.

Genetically targeted weapons could change world politics forever, according to PNAC.

"And," their report notes, "advanced forms of biological warfare that can 'target' specific genotypes may transform biological warfare from the realm of terror to a politically useful tool."

Given that Kristol, Wolfowitz, and their conservative PNAC associates like Dick Cheney, Donald Rumsfeld, Richard Perle, Eliot Abrams, Jeb Bush, and John Bolton have already brought us two of their early 1998 recommendations - the seizure of Iraq and a huge increase in defense spending - it's tempting to wonder if this is another of their other politically useful ideas being explored by the Pentagon.

Or maybe we'd rather not know. At least not those of us with politically problematic relatives.

The New American Century

by Arundhati Roy

In the great cities of Europe and America, where a few years ago these things would only have been whispered, now people are openly talking about the good side of imperialism and the need for a strong empire to police an unruly world. The new missionaries want order at the cost of justice. Discipline at the cost of dignity. And ascendancy at any price. Occasionally some of us are invited to "debate" the issue on "neutral" platforms provided by the corporate media. Debating imperialism is a bit like debating the pros and cons of rape. What can we say? That we really miss it?

In any case, New Imperialism is already upon us. It's a remodeled, streamlined version of what we once knew. For the first time in history, a single empire with an arsenal of weapons that could obliterate the world in an afternoon has complete, unipolar, economic and military hegemony. It uses different weapons to break open different markets. There isn't a country on God's earth that is not caught in the cross-hairs of the American cruise missile and the IMF checkbook.

Argentina's the model if you want to be the poster boy of neoliberal capitalism, Iraq if you're the black sheep. Poor countries that are geopolitically of strategic value to Empire, or have a "market" of any size, or infrastructure that can be privatized, or, God forbid, natural resources of value -- oil, gold, diamonds, cobalt, coal -- must do as they're told or become military targets. Those with the greatest reserves of natural wealth are most at risk. Unless they surrender their resources willingly to the corporate machine, civil unrest will be fomented or war will be waged.

BOOK: Crossing the Rubicon:

The Decline of the American Empire at the End of the Age of Oil

by Michael C. Ruppert

EXCERPT: "Simplifying the Case Against Dick Cheney"

As Summarized by Michael Kane

On May 8, 2001 -- four months prior to 9/11 -- the president placed Dick Cheney in charge of "[All federal programs dealing with weapons of mass destruction consequence management within the Departments of Defense, Health and Human Services, Justice, and Energy, the Environmental Protection Agency, and other federal agencies..." This included all "training and planning" which needed to be "seamlessly integrated, harmonious and comprehensive" in order to "maximize effectiveness." This mandate created the Office of National Preparedness in FEMA, overseen by Dick Cheney.

Dick Cheney was placed directly in charge of managing the seamless integration of all training exercises throughout the entire federal government and all military agencies. On 9/11 Cheney oversaw multiple war games and terror drills, including several exercises of NORAD, the Air Force agency whose mandate is to "watch the sky."

The evening before September 11th, 2001, the National Security Agency intercepted a communication between Khalid Shaikh Muhammad and the alleged ringleader of the 9/11 attacks, Mohammed Atta. The communication stated, "The match is about to begin."

Were they "matching" their activities to the war games? Was the attack a rigged "match" between the defenders on one side, and the attackers with their accomplices on the other?

The White House was so infuriated when this communication leaked from the Senate Intelligence Committee that they threatened Senators with polygraphs and office searches for disclosing classified information. This leak struck a nerve within the White House.

We know multiple Air Force war games were running on the morning of 9/11, as documented extensively in the mainstream press. What Crossing the Rubicon has documented conclusively is that there was a live-fly drill taking place on 9/11 titled Vigilant Warrior. Richard Clarke disclosed the name of this drill on page 4 of his book, but it was Major Don Arias of NORAD who confirmed the definition of the title "Warrior" to Mike Ruppert via email.

Warrior = JCS/HQ NORAD sponsored FTX, or field training exercise (live-fly).

That means that the Vigilant Warrior drill conducted by the Joint Chiefs of Staff involved at least one real commercial aircraft in the skies, intended to simulate exactly the kind of airliner hijack emergency presented on 9/11. Coincidence?

This was further supported by an April 18 2004 USA Today article titled, "NORAD had drills of jets as weapons." The report cited NORAD officials who confirmed live-fly drills were conducted using hijacked airliners originating from the continental United States used as weapons crashing into targets including the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. The specific drill USA Today referred to was "planned in July [2001] and conducted later" - likely on 9/11 itself.

Remember, on 9/11 the Bush administration claimed it had "no idea" aircraft would be used as weapons. Then why were they drilling such scenarios before and during 9/11? The White House dodged this by saying it wasn't aware of these drills but that is a transparent lie. The drills took place in the White House!

Secret Service runs simulated attack field exercises - exactly what Vigilant Warrior was. This Joint Chiefs of Staff drill was likely being run through Secret Service lines of communication by a central command under Cheney's control.

Additional war games on 9/11 included Northern Vigilance, an exercise that pulled Air Force fighters from the east coast of the United States up into Canada and Alaska simulating an attack out of Russia. All of those fighters were rendered useless as the 9/11 plot unfolded - too far away to respond.

One of the components of this drill included "false blips" (radar injects simulating aircraft in flight) placed on FAA radar screens. At one point FAA head Jane Garvey said they suspected up to 11 hijackings on 9/11. Was she saying they couldn't determine which were real, which were simulated, and which were live-fly military exercises?

Regardless, all of this rendered Air Force response on 9/11 useless.

In Air War Over America it is documented that General Arnold of NORAD didn't pull out of the war game titled Vigilant Guardian until reports of flight 93 being hijacked were coming in. That was at 9:16, a total of 54 minutes after it was known that flight 11 was a hijacking. What took so long? Were there still "false blips" on FAA radar screens at this time?

There were likely false blips on screen even after 9:16. The Kean Commission's report introduced "phantom flight-11" as being reported by the FAA at 9:25 on 9/11. The FAA reported flight 11 was heading to Washington D.C. at that time when in fact it had already struck the World Trade Center. The Kean Commission's report stated they were "unable to locate the source of the mistaken FAA information."

"Phantom flight-11" was a false blip, but since the war games are classified, specific information on "false blips" and other details can't be reported.

Now imagine being an air traffic controller with both real planes and "false blips" simulating hijackings on your screens when suddenly there are real, multiple, hijackings. Where do you send the few Air Force fighters that you have? You can't guess wrong, you don't have enough assets for that. The FAA doesn't even make that decision, the military does. The Kean Commission managed to scapegoat the FAA in their report, but the Air Force itself confirmed the FAA did its job properly on 9/11 in Air War Over America.

There were more 9/11 war games including Northern Guardian, Northern Denial (recently confirmed by an Assistant Editor at Harper's magazine) and an unnamed National Reconnaissance Office (NRO) drill for a plane crashing into NRO headquarters at precisely the time of an actual crash in New York.

Another coincidence?

War games, terror drills and exercises are run by the military quite frequently. In this case, they mirrored the real attacks of 9/11 with such shocking congruence as to be beyond the realm of coincidence.

This is made clear when we consider the warnings that had flooded U.S. Intelligence prior to 9/11, indicating that terrorists were planning to hijack aircraft and crash them into American targets on the ground during the week of September 9th, 2001. With that type of information, who in their right mind would then schedule war games that would leave New York and Washington D.C. completely undefended?

We've already shown that the man in charge of managing all such programs was Dick Cheney. Among the central decision-makers for the scheduling of so many simultaneous exercises would be Dick Cheney and Ralph Eberhart, head of NORAD.

It certainly was a perfect "match."

The Maestro

The most important revelation made about the 9/11 war games comes again from Major Don Arias of NORAD. With multiple war games running, there had to be someone coordinating them.

"Yes, there is an exercise maestro," said Don Arias in a phone interview.

So who was the maestro?

Mike Ruppert called every relevant military and government office looking for an answer to this question and received no response. At the final 9/11 Commission hearing on June 17, 2004, I asked General Ralph Eberhart - the man in charge of NORAD on 9/11 - who was in charge of coordinating the war games that day. His only response was, "No comment." None of the commissioners, including Chairman Kean, could answer this question.

FTW's research has concluded the maestro was either Dick Cheney, Ralph "Ed" Eberhart, or both. Whoever the maestro was, he was certainly under Cheney's management as per the May 2001 presidential mandate.

Additionally, Tripod II was a bio-terror exercise being set-up on the west side of lower Manhattan, reportedly scheduled to begin the next day. This exercise was being coordinated with FEMA and the Department of Justice -- two of the agencies placed directly under Cheney's control in May of 2001 by presidential mandate.

Another coincidence?

There is no question that Cheney would be responsible for managing this exercise. The Tripod II drill became the command & control emergency response center on 9/11. The command center in WTC 7 was reportedly evacuated by 9:30 on 9/11, but Tripod II provided a new command center organized just as the original was. How convenient.

The Air Force war games ensured the air attack would be successful, and Tripod II assured Cheney would have control of the response to the crisis of his making. Matching the war games with hijackings - or hijacking the war games - was the opportunity for Cheney to help ensure the 9/11 attacks would be successful, justifying what he calls, "The war that will not end in our lifetimes." The "war on terror" is actually a war for the world's last remaining hydrocarbon reserves. This energy war is a response to a coming energy crisis that Cheney was well aware of at least as early as 1999.

Conclusion

Crossing the Rubicon demonstrates much more than is presented here. The book goes into the failures of the 9/11 Commission, 9/11 insider trading, the curtailing of civil liberties, the coming economic crisis, biological warfare, the real history of Osama bin Laden, and many other issues critical to an understanding of today's historical reality.

Crossing the Rubicon also looks into the evolution of PROMIS software, a well-documented artificial intelligence and data mining program whose current descendants played an integral role in the crimes of 9/11.

As Dick Cheney was running a separate chain of command via the Secret Service, he also had the capability to intervene in the functions of the FAA through an evolution of PROMIS software developed and sold by Ptech, Inc. -- a company funded by Saudi terrorist financier Yassin Al Qadi. Al Qadi claims he met Dick Cheney in Jeddah before he was Vice President, a claim Cheney hasn't publicly refuted. FTW will soon be releasing an in-depth report on Ptech and its role in the crimes of 9/11.

What we have placed in front of you here is the legal case against Dick Cheney and other persons of interest within the U.S. government. Such evidence should constitute the foundation for articles of impeachment and criminal prosecution against George W. Bush, Dick Cheney, and their accomplices.

Yet Another Perfectly Synchronized "Bizarre Coincidence:" _

On the Morning of 9/11, the CIA Was Running a Simulation of a Plane Crashing into the National Reconnaissance Office -- America's "Eyes on the Sky" -- Which Caused That Agency to be Evacuated as the Real Crisis Unfolded

One week after The Memory Hole first reported this story (14 August 2002), it was picked up by the Associated Press in the following article:

Agency planned drill for plane crash last Sept. 11
Associated Press
August 22, 2002

WASHINGTON -- In what the government describes as a bizarre coincidence, one U.S. intelligence agency was planning an exercise last Sept. 11 in which an errant aircraft crashed into one of its buildings. But the cause wasn't terrorism -- it was to be a simulated accident.

Officials at the Chantilly, Va.-based National Reconnaissance Office had scheduled an exercise that morning in which a small corporate jet crashed into one of the four towers at the agency's headquarters building after experiencing a mechanical failure.

The agency is about four miles from the runways of Washington Dulles International Airport.

Agency chiefs came up with the scenario to test employees' ability to respond to a disaster, said spokesman Art Haubold. To simulate the damage from the plane, some stairwells and exits were to be closed off, forcing employees to find other ways to evacuate the building.

"It was just an incredible coincidence that this happened to involve an aircraft crashing into our facility," Haubold said. "As soon as the real world events began, we canceled the exercise."

Terrorism was to play no role in the exercise, which had been planned for several months, he said.

Adding to the coincidence, American Airlines Flight 77 -- the Boeing 767 that was hijacked and crashed into the Pentagon -- took off from Dulles at 8:10 a.m. on Sept. 11, 50 minutes before the exercise was to begin. It struck the Pentagon around 9:40 a.m., killing 64 aboard the plane and 125 on the ground.

The National Reconnaissance Office operates many of the nation's spy satellites. It draws its personnel from the military and the CIA.

After the Sept. 11 attacks, most of the 3,000 people who work at agency headquarters were sent home, save for some essential personnel, Haubold said.

An announcement for an upcoming homeland security conference in Chicago first noted the exercise.

In a promotion for speaker John Fulton, a CIA officer assigned as chief of NRO's strategic gaming division, the announcement says, "On the morning of September 11th 2001, Mr. Fulton and his team ... were running a pre-planned simulation to explore the emergency response issues that would be created if a plane were to strike a building. Little did they know that the scenario would come true in a dramatic way that day."

The conference is being run by the National Law Enforcement and Security Institute.

<http://www.thememoryhole.org/911/cia-simulation.htm>

Why were 3000 NRO employees sent home on 9/11?

today's question...

<http://www.questionsquestions.net/topics/question.html>

5 June 2003:

There have been a number of disinfo limited hangouts floating around, all of them designed to offer apparently revealing inside details of 9/11 but actually serving the purpose of whitewashing evidence of US govt. complicity. One which has been hanging around for a while centers on the terrorist training exercise that the NRO (National Reconnaissance Office) had scheduled the same morning of the attacks. The super-secret NRO happens to be the agency which operates US spy satellites.

A mainstream article about it is here:

http://www.boston.com/news/packages/sept11/anniversary/wire_stories/0903_plane_exercise.htm

The limited hangout build around this is that the 9/11 "terrorists" somehow learned about the secret exercise in advance, and "piggybacked" their own attack on the same date in order to confuse US defences. This is used as a supposed explanation for lack of action on prior warnings, failure of air defences to operate, etc, on the assumption that military and intel personnel thought that everything going on was part of the the "exercise." I don't know of any serious 9/11 researcher who finds this a credible overall theory, given the fact that there is an abundance of evidence pointing beyond such a scenario, to official complicity and specific prior knowledge. This has been discussed very thoroughly among researchers.

That aside, there is an interesting detail in the above article:

"The National Reconnaissance Office operates many of the nation's spy satellites. It draws its personnel from the military and the CIA. After the Sept. 11 attacks, most of the 3,000 people who work at agency headquarters were sent home, save for some essential personnel, Haubold said."

Sent home... why??

Recently, I heard one alternative speculation about this which deserves some inquiry. Namely, that certain high-ranking NRO staff may have needed this time to eliminate or alter satellite surveillance of the Washington, DC area during the attacks. Note that it has been alleged for years that the US has 24 hour high resolution satellite monitoring of the capitol and surrounding regions, where critical government institutions are located. If so, there would then be a record of Flight 77's flight path and impact. Would there be something there to hide? With the recent 9/11 Commission hearings on 9/11 air defences having stirred up debate, this is perhaps something to consider.

Wargames Were Cover For the Operational Execution of 9/11

by Alex Jones & Paul Joseph Watson

Updated September 20 2004

For almost three years since 9/11 independent researchers have stockpiled individual smoking guns which prove that the official version of events was not only a lie but operationally impossible.

However, no single smoking gun has yet been forwarded to explain why air defenses categorically reversed Standard Operating Procedure and failed to respond to hijacked jetliners.

Until now. More and more individuals are looking at the facts and highlighting exercise drills that took place on the morning of 9/11.

It is clear that at least five if not six training exercises were in operation in the days leading up to and on the morning of 9/11. This meant that NORAD radar screens showed as many as 22 hijacked airliners at the same time. NORAD had been briefed that this was part of the exercise drill and therefore normal reactive procedure was forestalled and delayed.

The large numbers of 'blips' on NORAD screens that displayed both real and 'drill' hijacked planes explain why confused press reports emerged hours after the attack stating that up to eight planes had been hijacked.

<http://www.rense.com/general13/up.htm>

The drill scenario also explains a comment made by air traffic control personnel which was featured in a July 2004 BBC television report. The controller is told that a hijacked airliner is heading for New York and responds by saying, "is this real world or an exercise?"

..... What were the drills called and what was their nature?

1) OPERATION NORTHERN VIGILANCE: This was planned months in advance of 9/11 and ensured that on the morning of 9/11, jet fighters were removed from patrolling the US east coast and sent to Alaska and Canada, therefore reducing the amount of fighter planes available to protect the east coast.

2) BIOWARFARE EXERCISE TRIPOD II: Alex Jones first reported on this back in May when Rudolph Giuliani let the details of it slip in his testimony to the 9/11 Commission. FEMA arrived in New York on September 10th to set up a command post located at Pier 29 under the auspices of a 'biowarfare exercise' scheduled for September 12. This explains why Tom Kenney of FEMA's National Urban Search and Rescue Team, told Dan Rather of CBS News that FEMA had arrived in New York on the night of September 10th. This was originally dismissed as a slip of the tongue. Giuliani was to use this post as a command post on 9/11 after he evacuated WTC Building 7. As we reported back in January, Giuliani knew when to leave WTC 7 because he got advanced warning that the Trade Towers were about to collapse. "We were operating out of there when we were told that the World Trade Center was gonna collapse," Rudolph Giuliani told Peter Jennings of ABC News. How did Giuliani know the towers were about to collapse when no steel building in history had previously collapsed from fire damage?

3) OPERATION VIGILANT GUARDIAN: This exercise simulated hijacked planes in the north eastern sector and started to coincide with 9/11. Lt. Col. Dawne Deskins, NORAD unit's airborne control and warning officer, was overseeing the exercise. At 8:40 am she took a call from Boston Center which said it had a hijacked airliner. Her first words, as quoted by Newhouse News Service were, "It must be part of the exercise." This is another example of how the numerous drills on the morning of 9/11 deliberately distracted NORAD so that the real hijacked planes couldn't be intercepted in time.

4) OPERATION NORTHERN GUARDIAN: The details of this exercise are still scant but it is considered to be part of Vigilant Guardian, relating to simulating hijacked planes in the north eastern sector.

5) OPERATION VIGILANT WARRIOR: This was referenced in Richard Clarke's book 'Against All Enemies.' It is thought to have been the 'attack' component of the Vigilant Guardian exercise.

Another example of how air defenses were purposefully kept preoccupied so they couldn't protect New York was reported by this website in December of 2003. The Air National Guard's 177th Fighter Wing, based at Atlantic City International Airport in Pomona, were just eight minutes away from New York and could have intercepted both Flight 11 and Flight 175.

Under NORAD procedures that date to the Cold War, two F-16 fighters from the 177th were parked around the clock on the Atlantic City runway. Pilots waited in a nearby building, ready to scramble.

But on the morning of 9/11, the F-16's were performing bombing runs over an empty stretch of the Pine Barrens near Atlantic City after being decommissioned from their usual role of protecting the skies of the east coast.

It was only after both trade towers were hit that the two F-16s landed and were refitted with air-to-air missiles, then sent aloft.

Now that we have established how NORAD were confused, delayed and distracted by the numerous wargames, the next question to ask is who if anyone was aware of which planes were 'real world' and which planes were 'exercise'? The answer to this question will provide us with the name of the individual who ran the operational execution of the 9/11 attack.

Dick Cheney.

Cheney was initially taken by the secret service to an underground bunker in the White House called the Presidential Emergency Operations Center.

From there, according to CNN, Cheney directed the US government's response to the unfolding attack.

Secretary of Transportation Norman Mineta was in the Presidential Emergency Operating Center with Cheney as Flight 77 approached Washington, D.C. On May 23, 2003 in front of the 9/11 Commission, Secretary Mineta testified:

"During the time that the airplane was coming in to the Pentagon, there was a young man who would come in and say to the Vice President, "The plane is 50 miles out." "The plane is 30 miles out." And when it got down to "the plane is 10 miles out," the young man also said to the Vice President, "Do the orders still stand?" And the Vice President turned and whipped his neck around and said, "Of course the orders still stand. Have you heard anything to the contrary?"

As the plane in question hit the Pentagon, what else can we conclude but that the 'order' was not to shoot down the aircraft and to let it find its target.

Mineta stated that he did not know what the 'order' was because he wasn't there when it was made.

After the Pentagon was hit, Cheney was transferred to another bunker in what the Philadelphia Daily News describes as 'the underground Pentagon'.

Site R, a highly secure complex of buildings inside Raven Rock Mountain near Blue Ridge Summit, Pa., close to the Maryland-Pennsylvania state line and about seven miles north of Camp David, is a 53-year-old facility conceived at the start of the Cold War as an alternate command center in the event of nuclear war or an attack on Washington.

The bunker is built into a mountain hillside and is virtually camouflaged to the naked eye. The location betrays itself by the vast gaggle of satellites, microwave towers and antennae that festoon the perimeter. Inside the facility there are computer filled caverns and communication and tracking technology that would put a James Bond movie to shame.

The entire facility is guarded by heavily armed military police.

Within hours of 9/11 unfolding, five choppers had landed on the facility's helipad and top officials such as Paul Wolfowitz were ushered in to join Cheney in the command bunker.

Site R -- also known as Raven Rock or the Alternate Joint Communications Center is from where vice-President Dick Cheney ran the aftermath of the 9/11 attack. Cheney's command superceded the orders of the Pentagon, the FAA or the White House. He is the number one suspect in the murder of nearly 3,000 innocent people.

In May of 2001, by presidential order, Cheney was handed direct control of all wargame and drill operations. This meant he was solely in charge of the overlapping NORAD drills and wargames on the morning of 9/11, that prevented Standard Operating Procedure from being implemented, and any of the hijacked planes being intercepted.

The smoking guns of 9/11 are no longer disparate jigsaw pieces that serve to just raise more questions than they answer. We now have a coherent and plausible explanation of how the events unfolded, why there was no air defense response, and a prime suspect as to who executed these actions. The facts fit this version of events.

The 9/11 truth movement has just taken a giant leap towards dismantling the lies of September 11 and finally offering justice for those who lost their lives on that terrible day.

FEMA in NYC Prior to 9-11 for Project TRIPOD Terror Drill, Scheduled for 9-12

By Gregor Holland

As of this writing, June 2, 2004, the transcript of former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani's testimony to the 9-11 Commission during the May 18-19, 2004 hearings in New York is the only transcript of that hearing omitted from the Commission website (<http://www.9-11commission.gov>).

Did Rudy say something wrong?

In case you missed it live, you can listen to his testimony in full at the WNYC radio website at: <http://www.wnyc.org/news/articles/28147>. As Giuliani recounts his experience of the day of 9/11, and the evolving location of the Emergency Command Center that morning, you might want to pay special attention to what he says at the end of his prepared statement:

"... the reason Pier 92 was selected as a command center was because on the next day, on September 12, Pier 92 was going to have a drill, it had hundreds of people here, from FEMA, from the Federal Government, from the State, from the State Emergency Management Office, and they were getting ready for a drill for biochemical attack. So that was gonna be the place they were going to have the drill. The equipment was already there, so we were able to establish a command center there, within three days, that was two and a half to three times bigger than the command center that we had lost at 7 World Trade Center. And it was from there that the rest of the search and rescue effort was completed."

9/11 War Games Questioned and War Game Nicknames Defined

9/11 Wargames & Terror Drills:

"Mr. Secretary, after the last Hearing, I thought that my office was promised a written response to my question regarding the four wargames on September 11th. I have not yet received that response, but would like for you to respond to the questions that I've put to you today. And then I do expect the written response to my previous question."

The Lost "Terror Drill"? Pt.11 (A)

By Nico Haupt

<http://inn.globalfreepress.com/modules/news/article.php?storyid=1073>

Exercise Naming Conventions:

The terms used for NORAD exercises have specific meanings. Per NORAD Instruction 33-7:

“Nicknames: A combination of two separate unclassified words which is assigned an unclassified meaning and is employed for unclassified administration, morale or public information. The first word must begin with the combination of letters of the alphabet allocated to the using agency.” A nickname is used exclusively to designate a drill, or exercise. Exercise terms are used to prevent confusion between exercise directives with actual operations.”

Ç9; Vigilant or Amalgam means it is a HQ NORAD sponsored exercise. Ç9; Guardian means it is a multi-command CPX, or command post exercise (no live-fly).

Which means that on 9/11 NORAD should have been conducting a NORADwide, multicommand, command post exercise with no live-fly.

Other exercise terms include: Ç9; Warrior = JCS/HQ NORAD sponsored FTX, or field training exercise (live-fly) (Source: Arias Donald C Maj 1AF/PA [Donald.Arias@tyndall.af.mil] Crossing the Rubicon)

Vigilant Guardian: Reflected a cold war mind-set: NORAD Participants practiced for an attack across the North Pole by Russian forces. September 11 was Day II of ‘Vigilant Guardian,’ an exercise that would pose an imaginary crisis, including the hijacking of commercial airliners, to North American Air defense outposts nationwide. (Source: multiple press sources including Aviation News, Newhouse News, Crossing the Rubicon)

Vigilant Warrior: According to Arias Donald C Maj 1AF/PA, Vigilant Warrior was a Joint Chiefs live-fly hijack drill. (Source: Richard Clarke, p. 5 of his book Against All Enemies and in Crossing the Rubicon)

Northern Guardian: Exercise on 911. (Source: Toronto Star, Dec. 9, 2001)

Northern Vigilance: Live-fly and Simulated exercise in Alaska and Canada. NORAD states Northern Vigilance was a redeployment of fighter resources to northern Canada and Alaska for an old DEW [Distant Early Warning] line, over the pole, Russian Bear bomber attack, which was also going on, on 9/11. (Source: Toronto Star, Dec. 9, 2001, NORAD website)

Tripod II: Exercise on 911 involving the Justice Department and New York City and State authorities. It had nothing to do with hijackings but was instead an exercise focused on a biowarfare attack that had been set up on New York’s Pier 29, about two miles from the World Trade Center. (Source: Rudy Giuliani, 911 Commission testimony)

Unnamed: The National Reconnaissance Office, a joint creation of the CIA and the air force that operates US spy satellites, was also running an exercise on September 11th. This one happened to involve a plane crashing into the headquarters of the ultra-secret agency in the Washington, DC suburb of Chantilly, Virginia, just outside Dulles International airport, the origin of Flight 77. (Source: Associated Press Aug. 21, 2002; Mr. John Fulton of the CIA)

[NOTE: The NRO is charged with management and monitoring of America's unmatched network of spy satellites -- its all-observant "Eyes in the Sky." The exercise described above -- on the morning of 9/11 -- involved the evacuation of all NRO personnel from the premises, after which they were sent home for the remainder of the day. This act ensured that only management would have access to that morning's satellite images of the wandering hijacked airliners. The data was immediately classified.]

8.1 No Arab Names on the Manifests of the Hijacked Flights

Autopsy: No Arabs on Flight 77

By Thomas R. Olmsted, M.D.

I am an ex Naval line officer and a psychiatrist in private practice in New Orleans, a Christian and homeschool dad. It troubled me a great deal that we rushed off to war on the flimsiest of evidence. I considered various ways to provide a smoking gun of who and why Sept 11th happened. Astute observers noticed right away that there were no Arabic sounding names on any of the flight manifests of the planes that "crashed" on that day.

A list of names on a piece of paper is not evidence, but an autopsy by a pathologist, is. I undertook by FOIA request, to obtain that autopsy list and you are invited to view it below. Guess what? Still no Arabs on the list. It is my opinion that the monsters who planned this crime made a mistake by not including Arabic names on the original list to make the ruse seem more believable.

When airline disasters occur, airlines will routinely provide a manifest list for anxious families. You may have noticed that even before Sept 11th, that airlines are pretty meticulous about getting an accurate head count before takeoff. It seems very unlikely to me, that five Arabs sneaked onto a flight with weapons.

The Perplexing Puzzle of the Published Passenger Lists

by Gary North

..... To get onto the flight legally, each passenger had to have a ticket with his or her name on it. Each passenger had to present a photo ID to the check-in agent. The check-in agent was supposed to look at the picture and the person, and then make a judgment. Was it the same person? If the mandated procedure was followed, the check-in agent decided that the ticket's name, the photo ID's name, the photo, and the ID-holder's face all matched. If there was any doubt, the check-in agent was supposed to ask for some other form of identification. If there was none, the person was not allowed to board the plane.

We are told by the United States government that five Arabs somehow got through this initial screening procedure. How did they do this? This is puzzle number one regarding Flight 11. Puzzle number two has to do with the incomplete passenger list.

Airlines keep a list of passengers on board. This is for insurance purposes, should there be a crash. It is also for the purpose of notifying relatives after a crash. It is also for the purpose of in-cabin screening. "Has everyone paid who is on the plane?" And, finally, is there a hijacker on board?

On American Airlines Flight 11, there were no Arab names on the passenger list. So, how does the government know who the hijackers were?

Why does CNN's Web page list 92 dead, when there are only 86 names listed? Who was the non-Arab?

I have seen nothing about government accusations against American Airlines for substandard check-in security procedures. In fact, I have seen nothing about the discrepancy between the published names and the published numbers regarding how many people were on board.

Let's go to American Airlines Flight 77. This plane crashed into the Pentagon.

<http://www.cnn.com/SPECIALS/2001/trade.center/victims/AA77.victims.html>

We are told that 64 people were on board. I count 56, including 6 crew members. There is no explanation offered for the absence of 8 names. There is no Arab name on this list.

Something is definitely wrong here.

What about United Airlines? Did the company's employees follow the same check-in procedure? Presumably, they did. I checked Flight 175, which crashed into the south tower.

<http://www.cnn.com/SPECIALS/2001/trade.center/victims/ua175.victims.html>

There were 56 people on board, according to CNN's summation. I printed out the list. I counted the names. Once again, they don't add up. The summation says there were 2 pilots, 7 flight attendants, and 56 passengers. I counted the names. The total is 56 -- the number attributed to the passengers. Nine names are missing. None of the listed names is Arab.

This leaves United Flight 93, which crashed in Pennsylvania. It had 45 people on board, according to the summation.

<http://www.cnn.com/SPECIALS/2001/trade.center/victims/ua93.victims.html>

Again, there is a discrepancy. Only 33 names appear on the list. A dozen names are missing. Among the missing names are the four Arabs who allegedly hijacked the plane.

So, the published names in no instance match the total listed for the number of people on board. CNN really should offer an explanation for this discrepancy.

In no case does an Arab name appear on a list, let alone one of the alleged hijackers.

EXCERPT: Presentation given by Thierry Meyssan on 8 April 2002 at the Zayed Center in Abu Dhabi

The Justice Department has never explained how it established the list of the kamikazes. The airline companies have furnished the exact number of passengers in each plane, and the passenger lists, incomplete, do not mention the persons who boarded at the last minute. In checking these lists, one notices that names of the kamikazes are not on them and that only three passengers are not identified for Flight 11 and only two for Flight 93. It is thus impossible that 19 kamikazes boarded. Further, several of those listed as kamikazes have turned up, alive. The FBI nonetheless maintains that the hijackers have all been definitively identified and that complementary information such as birth dates makes it improbable that they could be confused with persons of the same name. For those who might doubt this, the FBI has a ridiculous proof: whereas the planes burned and the Twin Towers collapsed, the passport of Mohammed Atta was miraculously found intact on the smoking ruins of the World Trade Center.

Falsified Records Aid 9/11 Coverup
Toby Alot | 19.12.2006 12:20

..... On May 16 2004, I published an article entitled "Media published fake passenger lists for American Airlines flight 11." The article was revised on Sept 20, 2006. The article revealed that the mainstream media had fabricated passenger lists for the alleged flight American Airlines 11.

I say "alleged flight," because official flight data from the US Bureau of Transportation Statistics indicates that no such flight existed on the day.

Of course, if no such flight existed, then the passenger lists can't possibly be real. But let's put that aside and hypothetically concede that the flight existed. If so, then many media outlets published lists purporting to be official passenger lists when in fact they were not. The reason we know this, is because there can only be one official passenger list for a flight, and the media collectively gave us many different and conflicting lists, with differences too great to be transcription errors. Someone was just making the lists up.

The Cell Phone Calls that Could Not Have Been Made from the "Hijacked" Airplanes Taken from Joel Garduce's Interview of Michel Chussodovsky, June 24, 2005

EXCERPT:

Chussodovsky: It's the issue of what happened on the planes. And I have a chapter in my book which focuses on what happened on the planes as outlined in the 9/11 Commission Report, because it struck me that there was a very important relationship which had not been well-analyzed. The 9/11 Commission's narrative is based on cell phone conversations. The telecom industry is unequivocal. Those cellphone conversations could not have taken place from cellphones at altitudes above 8,000 feet.

And so I wanted to review the narrative in the 9/11 Commission Report, and demonstrate concretely that it is simply fabricated. It is impossible to make a telephone call from high altitude onboard a plane. And most of their descriptions rest on that. Not all of it, but most of it rests on telephone conversations between alleged passengers on the one hand and family members on the other. And the telecom industry is absolutely unequivocal. They say that you could not (in 2001) make a telephone conversation at 31,000 feet. You might be able to do it at 8,000 feet but the planes were flying at high altitude during a good part of the time when they were in the air.

See his article on this "problem" in the official narrative at:

<http://www.globalresearch.ca/articles/CHO408B.html>

The Strange Case of the 9/11 Cell Phone Calls

Last month, [July, 2004] Qualcomm Corporation issued a press release stating that they had developed a new technology that would finally make it possible to make cellular phone calls from commercial airliners. Using a technology called "Pico Cells," the system will work as a link between the airliner and ground towers. According to the press release, it is currently impossible to connect by cell phone in a plane that is above 4,000 feet.

During the Republican National Convention in New York City last month, Deena Burnett, widow of Flight 93 victim Tom Burnett, spoke of the four telephone calls she received from her husband aboard the doomed airliner on September 11th, all of which were received from his cell phone, one of which lasted 13 minutes.

With the FAA statement that Flight 93 never went below 29,000 feet until its' sudden fatal plunge, these two stories seem to be mutually exclusive. Either it is possible to make cell phone calls from a commercial jetliner in flight at cruising altitude - or it isn't.

First I looked into whether the calls could have been made using the "air phone" service aboard the planes. Burnett's wife reported the calls came from her husband's cell phone. Two calls by other passengers were made from locked lavatories, which would have been impossible to make by airphone. Jeremy Glick spoke with his wife for 20 minutes from his cell phone, according to the 911 Commission. These calls occurred while the plane was cruising at over 30,000 feet according to news reports and the 911 Commission.

Although there were calls made from airphones by Todd Beamer and other passengers, there were also undoubtedly some calls that are claimed to have originated from cell phones. In some cases witnesses said they recognized the family member's number on their caller ID.

...

NSA-trained Electronic Warfare specialist Steve Moser goes further, expressing that he has "severe doubt that ordinary cell phone calls were ever made from the aircraft (Flight 93)." Moser explains: "When you make a cell phone call, the first thing that happens is your cell phone needs to contact a transponder and complete a digital handshake. If an aircraft is going five hundred miles an hour, your cell phone will not be able to contact a tower, tell the tower who you are and who your provider is, tell the tower what mode it wants to communicate with, and establish that it is in a roaming area, before it passes out of range. It takes 30-45 seconds to do that. Though it is sometimes possible to connect during takeoff and landing, under the situation that was claimed the calls were impossible."

Voice Cloning in Real Time

When Seeing and Hearing Isn't Believing

February 1, 1999

"Gentlemen! We have called you together to inform you that we are going to overthrow the United States government."

So begins a statement being delivered by Gen. Carl W. Steiner, former Commander-in-chief, U.S. Special Operations Command. At least the voice sounds amazingly like him.

But it is not Steiner. It is the result of voice "morphing" technology developed at the Los Alamos National Laboratory in New Mexico. By taking just a 10-minute digital recording of Steiner's voice, scientist George Papcun is able, in near real time, to clone speech patterns and develop an accurate facsimile. Steiner was so impressed, he asked for a copy of the tape.

For Hollywood, it is special effects. For covert operators in the U.S. military and intelligence agencies, it is a weapon of the future.

Digital morphing — voice, video, and photo — has come of age, available for use in psychological operations. PSYOPS, as the military calls it, seek to exploit human vulnerabilities in enemy governments, militaries and populations to pursue national and battlefield objectives.

Voice-morphing? Fake video? Holographic projection? They sound more like Mission Impossible and Star Trek gimmicks than weapons. Yet for each, there are corresponding and growing research efforts as the technologies improve and offensive information warfare expands.

Whereas early voice morphing required cutting and pasting speech to put letters or words together to make a composite, Papcun's software developed at Los Alamos can far more accurately replicate the way one actually speaks. Eliminated are the robotic intonations.

Video and photo manipulation has already raised profound questions of authenticity for the journalistic world. With audio joining the mix, it is not only journalists but also privacy advocates and the conspiracy-minded who will no doubt ponder the worrisome mischief that lurks in the not too distant future."

An Unresolved Mystery: The Mass Murder of 9/11
The Unprecedented Failure to Follow Criminal Investigative Protocol
by Elias Davidsson

The first questions facing any crime investigator are: Who committed the crime and how was it committed. These questions would normally precede any efforts to discover the motives of the perpetrators, examining the preparation of the crime, identifying accomplices and developing means to prevent similar crimes in the future. Yet, the US authorities did not proceed in this time-proven manner. It did not initiate a proper criminal investigation at all and resisted even the call for a congressional inquiry into these events. No official investigation was conducted as to the causes of the plane crashes, as undertaken routinely in the United States regarding all types of crashes, including where criminal conduct is suspected. No official investigation was conducted on the causes of the collapses of the World Trade towers, as is the routine in cases of fire damage. The failure to conduct a proper criminal investigation of a mass murder is unprecedented in US history.

Until this day no proper evidence has been presented by the U.S. authorities regarding the identities of the perpetrators and on the means of perpetrating the mass murder. Whatever has been presented in public are allegations based on undisclosed and unverifiable evidence.

For an investigator of a criminal airplane crash, the first source of inquiry would be to study the list of passengers (or flight manifest). On the basis of such a list, further investigation becomes possible, such as tracing the passengers' addresses, contacting their families, tracing their credit card payments, etc. Shortly after 9/11, mass media began publishing lists of the passengers who crashed with the four planes. At least four variations of one such list (the passengers of AA 11) have been identified by Gerard Holmgren [reference link below], each with differing numbers of passengers and partly different names. No official explanation was provided for these variations. None of these published lists include Arab names. Yet the FBI and the airlines have until this day refused to publish the original passenger lists, which presumably were the source for these multiple lists published by the media as well as the source for their own claims on the hijackers' identities. An FBI press officer who declined to identify herself, told the author in a telephone conversation on July 23, 2004 that the FBI is not required to publish the passenger lists and did not explain why the FBI would not do so. In spite of the evidential importance of the original passenger lists, the Commission of Inquiry has neither published these lists nor indicated why these lists have not been published. The primary source for attributing the 9/11 atrocities to persons with Arab-looking names has thus remained secret.

Media Published Fake Passenger Lists for American Airlines Flight 11

Author: Gerard Holmgren

As everyone knows, on Sept 11 2001, 5 Arabs allegedly hijacked American Airlines flight 11 and crashed it into the North Tower of the World Trade Centre at 8.46 A.M. It was part of a crime which killed approximately 3000 people.

Any crime of this magnitude, is - or should be - subject to rigorous examination by investigative and law enforcement authorities, such as the FBI. In any crime involving the illegal use of a plane, it is obvious that one of the first investigative steps taken by such authorities is to find out who was on the plane.

This is not a difficult thing to do. Airlines keep well organized records of everybody on any particular flight. The apparent ID of anyone on that flight - regardless of whether they used a true or false ID - should be immediately available to authorities.

Unless authorities decide that disclosure of such information may jeopardize the investigation, it should also be easily available to the media. It should be as simple as an exchange of faxes or emails between the media and either the airline involved or one of the relevant authorities to which the airline has released the information. Or possibly printed copies handed out at a press conference.

In relation to the alleged AA11, there has never been any indication that such information has been withheld for security reasons. We have been given the clear impression that the information relating to exactly who was on that plane has been made available to us via the media - which presumably sourced it in the manner suggested above. If the information had been withheld, one would expect that to be known.

..... Anybody can put up a website, do an interview or send an email, claiming to be family or friend of a plane victim. But the only credible, official source for such information is the airline passenger list, and the only credible source for obtaining this information is the airline itself, or authorities and media to which the airline makes it available. One can't demand an explanation of what happened to particular people alleged to be on the flight unless one can prove that they were on the flight. Implicit in the official story is the assumption that such information has been established in the public domain by the media.

It is therefore incumbent upon any serious investigator to properly examine such passenger lists and ensure that they match with other alleged facts we have been given, and with the processes by which one would expect the information to have been sourced.....

Someone is fibbing.

Here is a summary of the anomalies between the lists.

Collectively, these sources list the names of 95 alleged innocents.

CNN lists 87 names, which should be a complete list, but indicates that the list is incomplete. The 8 left out are Vamsikrishna, Roux, Iskander, Jalbert, Tu, Weems, Ward and Booms.

USA Today lists 86 names, citing this as a "partial list." Those missing are Caplin, Jalbert, Jude Larson, Natalie Larson, Roux, Tu, Weems, Ward and Iskander.

NBC lists 87 names. Its the same as USAT with the addition of Iskander, but changes Peter Hashem to Peter el-Hachem.

PBS is identical to NBC.

The Boston daily lists 89 innocents and describes it as a partial list. Those missing are Iskander, Vamsikrishna, Tu, Weems, Ward and Booms. It is the only list to name Jalbert.

A year later it lists 87 names, changing Heath Smith to Heather Smith, Hashem to el-Hachem, and losing Caplin, the two Larsons, Jalbert and Roux for Iskander, Vamsikrishna, and Booms.

The Washington Post published a "partial list" containing 89 names. Those missing are Iskander, Vamsikrishna, Jalbert, Tu, Weems and Ward.

The "We Will Never Forget" website lists 88 names. Those missing are Vamsikrishna, Jalbert, Booms, Tu, Weems, Ward and Roux.

The AA11 memorial website lists 90 names and claims 95 aboard. The missing names are Vamsikrishna, Tu, Weems, Ward and Jalbert.

Wikipedia claims a summation of 93 aboard, but lists only 92 names (including hijackers). It is the only site to list Lana Tu. Those missing are Iskander, Caplin, the two Larsons, Jalbert, Weems, Ward and Roux. This makes it the same as the USA Today list with the addition of Tu or put another way -- the same as the NBC and PBS lists except that Tu is in for Iskander.

The American Memorials/Obituary site lists 90 names and is the only list to name Weems and Ward. It leaves out Tu, Jalbert, Vamsikrishna, Roux and Booms.

Several sources claim that AA released 77 (or 75) names on Sept 12, but the Washington Post published 89 names the same day, and the Boston Daily published 89 -- but not the same 89 -- the day after, while Fox News was still claiming that only 81 names were confirmed a week later.

..... Since the media which sells us the official story universally agrees that there were 92 aboard -- 87 innocents and 5 hijackers, then 8 of these names (although we can't yet specify which 8) must be fictitious. If 8 are confirmed as fictitious, then we are perfectly entitled to speculate with some validity that any number of the 95 could be fictitious.

What's even more curious is that four of these names [from AA 11] also appear on the lists for UA 175, alleged to have hit the South Tower of the WTC at 9.03: Jalbert, Roux, Ward and Weems.

In other words,
the official reporting of these four "victims" not only has them switching planes -- but switching Airlines as well:
from American to United.

From which is becomes obvious -- it wasn't the Airlines who were generating these very flexible lists, even though these lists are supposed to originate with them.

What a mess! This crime - the murder of approximately 3000 people, and the excuse for two wars and alarming attacks on civil liberties -- and presumably more to come -- is supposed to have been properly investigated and documented? Why should we be expected to believe who the hijackers were, when the spin doctors can't even do a credible fabrication job of a list of innocent victims?

The 9-11 Passenger List Oddity by Vincent Sammartino

Which brings me to Ellen Mariani: she's the woman who lost her husband Louis on Flight 175 that crashed into the South Tower on 9-11. With the help of a lawyer named Phil Berg, she filed a lawsuit against President Bush and company under the RICO act. Also, she refused to take the hush money that was offered to her under the 9-11 Victims Compensation fund.

In addition, I had just discovered Black Op Radio earlier in the year and found an interesting show in their archives (# 156) on which Ellen and Mr. Berg appeared as guests. This may be the single biggest point concerning 9-11, and hopefully the last nail in the coffin of our government's lies.

During this broadcast, Mrs. Mariani said that she was the only relative of all the passengers that died on Flight 175 that crashed into the South Tower. Her lawyer, Phil Berg, repeated this statement.

I listened to this show over and over again and couldn't believe what she had just said. Everything came together at this point. That's when it dawned on me that not only had our government lied about the physics of 9-11; they may very well have taken it one step farther by faking the number of people that died that day.

[NOTE: Please see Operation Northwoods at Reference 8.4]

I believed what she and Mr. Berg had just said. Nothing about 9-11 made any sense. Why should it start now?

Not knowing then what I know now, Ellen and Phil believed that for some reason the government was holding back the names of the people that had died on Flight 175. She had tried to get in touch with the relatives of other family members, but to no avail. You see, she and her lawyer believed, just like most other people believe, that four jets had been hijacked by Arab terrorists and crashed into buildings and into the ground at Shanksville. I, on the other hand, had already swept those lies aside.

Their statement also gave credence to the Fox News reporter who said that the jet which crashed into the South Tower had no windows. Hey, this jet appeared to have a "pod" under it anyway. The pieces of the puzzle were starting to fit.

Now, we come to most interesting stuff -- the Social Security Death Index, and thanks to Victor Thorn's idea, the September 11th Victim's Compensation Fund. After all, it's one thing to say that the flight lists are not on the up and up, but it's another thing to prove it.

The Social Security Death Index (SSDI) is a privately-owned website that is not affiliated with Social Security. It boasts an accuracy rate of about 83% (e-mail them any questions you may have).

Anyway, to check its reliability, I inputted the names of people I knew that had died in my family, along with friends and neighbors. Being a true skeptic, I had no way of knowing whether they were telling the truth or not. With the exception of a cousin, I found everyone I was looking for. (Be sure you have the person's true first name -- they may not be listed by the state they last lived in, but can be found in the state where their social security number was issued.) By all means try it yourself.

Which brings us to the 9-11 Victims Compensation Fund (also known as the Shut Up and Take the Money Fund), which most of you have heard about.

9-11 Victims Compensation Fund

This is where our government opened up the Treasury and gave family members of those who lost their lives that day lots of money. In return, these families were basically told to shut up about anything else concerning 9-11. (Considering all the lies surrounding this horrific event, you can see why.)

At this point there is one thing we should never forget, and that is how powerful the notion of human greed is. Remember this concept as you read the number of victims whose family members sought compensation.

The names of the victims can be found on the CNN website.

Here are the results:

Flight 11: of the 92 people who are listed as dying on this flight, only 20 are listed in the SSDI. (22%)

Of these 20 people, only three are on the 9-11 Compensation Fund list:

Judy Larocque
Laurie Neira
Candace Lee Williams

Flight 77: of the 64 people who are listed as dying on this flight, only 14 are listed in the SSDI. (22%)

Of these 64 people, only five are on the 9-11 Compensation Fund list:

William Caswell
Eddie Dillard
Ian Gray
John Sammartino
Leonard Taylor

Flight 175: of the 65 people who are listed as dying on this flight, only 18 are listed in the SSDI. (28%)

Of these 65 people, only three are on the 9-11 Compensation Fund list:

Michael C. Tarrou
Gloria Debarrera
Timothy Ward

Flight 93: of the 45 people who are listed as dying on this flight, only 6 are listed in the SSDI. (13%)

Of these 45 people, none are on the 9-11 Compensation Fund list:

No one.

Have you noticed anything strange yet? Of the passengers and crew of Flight 11, 77, 175 & 93, only 22%, 22%, 28%, 13% respectively are in the SSDI.

Remember human greed? Of the 266 people that we were told died on these jets, only 11 relatives applied for compensation. Can you believe that not a single relative from Flight 93 applied for compensation? I can't. Were all the relatives of the victims so rich that they weren't eligible to receive compensation? No, that's not it. (The minimum federal award was $250,000, and the average pay-out was about $1.8 million. The recipients only had to make agreement: they couldn't sue the airlines.)

You should also know that most lawyers told their clients to take the money and run (which is what most lawyers would do -- take the sure money). Ellen Mariani clearly elaborated on this point during her appearance on the radio show mentioned above.

Finally, during the past week, thanks to Lisa Guliani's insatiable quest for the truth, the 9-11 Victims Compensation Final Report has come to light.

9-11 Victims Compensation Final Report

Oddly, but consistent with everything concerning 9-11, the actual complete list of the people who benefited has been omitted from this report. Even without this, it does contain an interesting fact. According to the report, 98% of all the people who suffered a loss on 9-11 took the fund money. The average payment was $1.8 million.

But here's where it gets strange. According to the government, here are the number of people who accepted the compensation fund:

Out of a total of 92 people on Flight 11, only 65 accepted the 9-11 fund (71%)
Out of a total of 65 people on Flight 175, only 46 accepted the 9-11 fund (71%)
Out of a total of 64 people on Flight 77, only 33 accepted the 9-11 fund (52%)
Out of a total of 45 people on Flight 93, only 25 accepted the 9-11 fund (56%)

Does any of this seem a little odd to you? Or is it possible that not only were the jets on 9-11 magical, but their passengers as well?

So there you have it; yet another glaring 9-11 inconsistency -- just maybe the biggest of them all?

Skeptically yours,
Vincent Sammartino

36 or 37 Missing and 70 Percent Empty

The Official Death Lists For All Four 911 Airliners Are Missing 36 Or 37 People Including All "19 Terrorists"

These Four Airliners Were Also Somehow Averaging 70% Empty

There are supposed to be 92 victims on board American Airlines Flight 11, yet when you add up the official death manifest list that was published on CNN.com, there are only 86 victims.

The same goes for the other three flights of September 11th. Add up the passenger and crew lists from all 4 flights of 911 and you have officially 266 people on board. Yet when one adds up the 4 official death manifest lists published on CNN.com, there are only 229 names. Somehow 37 people are missing from the 4 CNN.com official death manifest lists, including all 19 of the hijackers. There is not even one Arabic name there. Why?

One other thing; CNN.com says there are 45 fatalities on United Airlines Flight 93, others say there are 44. This would make 36 missing, and 265 deaths for all 4 airliners.

<http://aviation-safety.net/database/2001/010911-2.htm>

The 4 airliners of September 11th, 2 Boeing 767's and 2 Boeing 757's had a total passenger seating capacity of 762 people. There are only 229 passengers and crew members on the four death lists, so, how could these flights possibly be 70% empty?

8.3 Hijackers Not as Dead as Originally (and Instantly) Reported

By Timothy W. Maier

48 hours (!) after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the names of the hijackers flashed across TV screens for the world to see.

Based on intelligence information gained from interviews, witnesses, flight-manifest logs and passports found at some of the crash debris sites, the FBI claimed it correctly had identified all 18 hijackers.

A short time later the number was amended to 19. A few days later the names were followed with photos of the men blamed for the terrorism that claimed nearly 3,000 lives in New York City, Washington and Pennsylvania.

Incredibly fast intelligence work - some of the information coming from the National Ground Intelligence Center in Charlottesville, Va. - enabled investigators to tie the attack to Osama bin Laden's al-Qaeda network.

,,,,, But confusion remains, particularly for those who claim their names and backgrounds have been attached to a photo of a dead terrorist. The photo might be correct, they say, but the identification is not.

The Saudi Arabian Embassy insists that some innocents have been maligned by a rush to identify the Sept. 11 perpetrators.

The Saudis in question are:

Waleed M. al-Shehri
Wail al-Shehri
Ahmed al-Nami
Saeed al-Ghamdi
Salem al-Hamzi
Abdul Aziz al-Omari

And -- the FBI accidentally may have fused two names to create one identity, because another man, Abdul Rahman al-Omari, who has a different birth date, is the person pictured by the FBI, but he still is a pilot for Saudi Arabian Airlines. After his photograph was released, he walked into the U.S. Embassy in Jedda and demanded to know why he was being reported as a dead hijacker.

http://www.prisonplanet.com/fbi_denies_mix_up_of_911_terrorists.htm

At Least 7 of the 9/11 Hijackers are Still Alive

According to the 911 Commission, the muscle hijackers 'picked by bin Ladin' were:

Satam al Suqami, Wail and Waleed al Shehri (two brothers) Both Alive, Abdul Aziz al Omari Alive, Fayez Banihammad (from the UAE), Ahmed al Ghamdi, Hamza al Ghamdi, Mohand al Shehri Alive, Saeed al Ghamdi Alive, Ahmad al Haznawi, Ahmed al Nami Alive, Majed Moqed, and Salem al Hazmi Alive (the brother of Nawaf al Hazmi).

How can the 9/11 Commission be taken seriously when they refer to suicidal "hijackers" who remain alive?

NOTE:

PLEASE FILE THE FOLLOWING UNDER
"THE OFFICIAL LEGEND MUST BE PROTECTED AT ALL COSTS" DEPARTMENT:

All nineteen of these men are still described as the murderous hijackers and the photographs of several among them now known to be innocent and alive remain posted -- to this day -- on the FBI Website, in spite of their protests.

9-11 "Hijackers" Identified by FBI: Seven Are Alive and Well

The list of the 9/11 hijackers names was released on 9/13 and revised on 9/14/01.

Seven of these men, identified by the FBI, have subsequently been confirmed as being alive. None of the names listed are shown on the passenger manifests of the hijacked flights.

“A society of sheep must in time beget a government of wolves.”

-- Bertrand de Juvenal

“A nation can survive its fools, and even the ambitious. But it cannot survive treason from within. An enemy at the gates is less formidable, for he is known and carries his banner openly. But the traitor moves amongst those within the gate freely, his sly whispers rustling through all the alleys, heard in the very halls of government itself. For the traitor appears not a traitor; he speaks in accents familiar to his victims, and he wears their face and their arguments, he appeals to the baseness that lies deep in the hearts of all men. He rots the soul of a nation, he works secretly and unknown in the night to undermine the pillars of the city, he infects the body politic so that it can no longer resist. A murderer is less to fear.”

8.4 OPERATION NORTHWOODS:

Recently declassified documents show that in the 1960's, the AMERICAN JOINT CHIEFS OF STAFF signed off on a plan to blow up AMERICAN jetliners (using an elaborate plan involving the switching of airplanes), and also to commit terrorist acts on American soil, and then to blame it on the Cubans in order to justify an invasion of Cuba.

U.S. Military Drafted Plans to Terrorize U.S. Cities to Provoke War With Cuba
By David Ruppe

NEW YORK, May 1, 2001 In the early 1960s, America's top military leaders reportedly drafted plans to kill innocent people and commit acts of terrorism in U.S. cities to create public support for a war against Cuba.

Code named Operation Northwoods, the plans reportedly included the possible assassination of Cuban émigrés, sinking boats of Cuban refugees on the high seas, hijacking planes, blowing up a U.S. ship, and even orchestrating violent terrorism in U.S. cities.

The plans were developed as ways to trick the American public and the international community into supporting a war to oust Cuba's then new leader, communist Fidel Castro.

America's top military brass even contemplated causing U.S. military casualties, writing: "We could blow up a U.S. ship in Guantanamo Bay and blame Cuba," and, "casualty lists in U.S. newspapers would cause a helpful wave of national indignation."

Details of the plans are described in Body of Secrets (Doubleday), a new book by investigative reporter James Bamford about the history of America's largest spy agency, the National Security Agency. However, the plans were not connected to the agency, he notes.

The plans had the written approval of all of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and were presented to President Kennedy's defense secretary, Robert McNamara, in March 1962. But they apparently were rejected by the civilian leadership and have gone undisclosed for nearly 40 years.

"These were Joint Chiefs of Staff documents. The reason these were held secret for so long is the Joint Chiefs never wanted to give these up because they were so embarrassing," Bamford told ABCNEWS.com.

"The whole point of a democracy is to have leaders responding to the public will, and here this is the complete reverse, the military trying to trick the American people into a war that they want but that nobody else wants."

OPERATION NORTHWOODS

US PLANNED FAKE TERROR ATTACKS ON CITIZENS TO CREATE SUPPORT FOR CUBAN WAR

EXCERPT from the BOOK: BODY OF SECRETS, by James Bamford, Doubleday, 2001
p.82 and following.

... In [Joint Chief's chair] Lemnitzer's view, the country would be far better off if the generals could take over. [JFK assassination legend has it some general presided over the fudgy JFK autopsy. --Mk]

For those military officers who were sitting on the fence, the Kennedy administration's botched Bay of Pigs invasion was the last straw. "The Bay of Pigs fiasco broke the dike," said one report at the time. "President Kennedy was pilloried by the super patriots as a 'no-win' chief . . . The Far Right became a fount of proposals born of frustration and put forward in the name of anti-Communism. . . Active-duty commanders played host to anti-Communist seminars on their bases and attended or addressed Right-wing meetings elsewhere."

Although no one in Congress could have known it at the time, Lemnitzer and the Joint Chiefs had quietly slipped over the edge.

According to secret and long-hidden documents obtained for Body of Secrets, the Joint Chiefs of Staff drew up and approved plans for what may be the most corrupt plan ever created by the U.S. government. In the name of anti-Communism, they proposed launching a secret and bloody war of terrorism against their own country in order to trick the American public into supporting an ill-conceived war they intended to launch against Cuba.

Operation Northwoods

per George Washington University National Security Archive

April 30, 2001

In his new exposé of the National Security Agency entitled Body of Secrets, author James Bamford highlights a set of proposals on Cuba by the Joint Chiefs of Staff codenamed OPERATION NORTHWOODS. This document, titled "Justification for U.S. Military Intervention in Cuba" was provided by the JCS to Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara on March 13, 1962, as the key component of Northwoods. Written in response to a request from the Chief of the Cuba Project, Col. Edward Lansdale, the Top Secret memorandum describes U.S. plans to covertly engineer various pretexts that would justify a U.S. invasion of Cuba. These proposals - part of a secret anti-Castro program known as Operation Mongoose - included staging the assassinations of Cubans living in the United States, developing a fake "Communist Cuban terror campaign in the Miami area, in other Florida cities and even in Washington," including "sink[ing] a boatload of Cuban refugees (real or simulated)," faking a Cuban airforce attack on a civilian jetliner, and concocting a "Remember the Maine" incident by blowing up a U.S. ship in Cuban waters and then blaming the incident on Cuban sabotage. Bamford himself writes that Operation Northwoods "may be the most corrupt plan ever created by the U.S. government." (*)

EXCERPTS: Key Quotes from the Operation Northwoods Documents

The Operation Northwoods documents were approved in writing by the Joint Chiefs of Staff—the top generals of each branch of the US armed forces—and submitted to the Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara. The only reason they weren't implemented is that the Kennedy administration rejected the plans. Below are key passages quoted directly from the Operation Northwoods documents. Page numbers are listed to assist in finding the quotes on the original documents. As you read, ask yourself if similar tactics to those listed below could have been used in regards to 9/11.

13 March 1962

MEMORANDUM FOR THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE

Subject: Justification for US Military Intervention in Cuba

The Joint Chiefs of Staff have considered the attached Memorandum for the Chief of Operations, Cuba Project, which responds to a request of that office for brief but precise description of pretexts which could provide justification for US military intervention in Cuba.

It is assumed that a single agency will be given the primary responsibility for developing military and para-military aspects of the basic plan. It is recommended that this responsibility for both overt and covert military operations be assigned the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

The suggested courses of action....are based on the premise that US military intervention will result from a period of heightened US-Cuban tensions which place the United States in the position of suffering justifiable grievances. World opinion, and the United Nations forum should be favorably affected by developing the international image of the Cuban government as rash and irresponsible, and as an alarming and unpredictable threat to the peace of the Western Hemisphere.

This plan....should be developed to focus all efforts on a specific ultimate objective which would provide adequate justification for US military intervention. Such a plan would enable a logical build-up of incidents to be combined with other seemingly unrelated events to camouflage the ultimate objective.

Pages 10-11 of 15-page GWU file on Northwoods (page 7-8 of Joint Chiefs report)

A series of well coordinated incidents will be planned to take place in and around Guantanamo to give genuine appearance of being done by hostile Cuban forces.

A. Incidents to establish a credible attack:

- (1) Start rumors (many). Use clandestine radio
- (2) Land friendly Cubans in uniform "over-the-fence" to stage attack on base.
- (3) Capture Cuban (friendly) saboteurs inside the base.
- (4) Start riots near the base main gate (friendly Cubans).
- (5) Blow up ammunition inside the base: start fires.
- (6) Burn aircraft on air base (sabotage).
- (7) Lob mortar shells from outside of base into base.
- (8) Capture assault teams approaching from the sea or vicinity of Guantanamo City.

- (9) Capture militia group which storms base.
- (10) Sabotage ship in harbor; large fires – naphthalene.
- (11) Sink ship near harbor entrance. Conduct funerals for mock-victims.

A “Remember the Maine” incident could be arranged: We could blow up a US ship in Guantanamo Bay and blame Cuba. Casualty lists in US newspapers would cause a helpful wave of national indignation.

We could develop a Communist Cuban terror campaign in the Miami area, in other Florida cities and even in Washington.

Use of MIG type aircraft by US pilots could provide additional provocation. Harassment of civil air, attacks on surface shipping and destruction of US military drone aircraft by MIG type planes would be useful as complementary actions. Reasonable copies of the MIG could be produced from US resources in about three months.

Hijacking attempts against civil air and surface craft should appear to continue as harassing measures condoned by the government of Cuba.

It is possible to create an incident which will demonstrate convincingly that a Cuban aircraft has attacked and shot down a chartered civil airliner enroute from the United States. The destination would be chosen only to cause the flight plan to cross Cuba. The passengers could be a group of college students off on a holiday.

An aircraft at Eglin AFB would be painted and numbered as an exact duplicate for a civil registered aircraft belonging to a CIA proprietary organization in the Miami area.

At the designated time the duplicate would be substituted for the actual civil aircraft and would be loaded with selected passengers, all boarded under carefully prepared aliases. The actual aircraft would be converted to a drone.

The drone aircraft and the actual aircraft will be scheduled to allow a rendezvous south of Florida. From the rendezvous point the passenger-carrying aircraft will descend to minimum altitude and go directly into an auxiliary field at Eglin AFB where arrangements will have been made to evacuate the passengers and return the aircraft to its original status. The drone aircraft meanwhile will continue to fly the filed flight plan.

When over Cuba the drone will be transmitting on the international distress frequency a “MAY DAY” message stating he is under attack by Cuban MIG aircraft.

The transmission will be interrupted by destruction of the aircraft which will be triggered by radio signal.

How Northwoods Bears on 911:

The Fervent Denial of Trusting Americans that Elements of the American Military Establishment Could Not Possibly Resort to Such Atrocity

Remember that government and military leaders think of this like a chess game. Sometimes you have to sacrifice your own pieces in order to win the game. Zbigniew Brzezinski, former U.S. National Security Advisor and co-founder of the Trilateral Commission, titled his 1997 book The Grand Chessboard: American Primacy and Its Geostrategic Imperatives. In this seminal book on American foreign policy, Brzezinski states that because of popular resistance to U.S. military expansionism, his ambitious strategy for "American global primacy" can't be implemented "except in the circumstance of a truly massive and widely perceived direct external threat." (The Grand Chessboard page 211).

Consider also that in September 2000, a think-tank named Project for the New American Century (PNAC) published a blueprint for maintaining global U.S. preeminence and shaping the international security order in line with American interests. Written before the 2000 Presidential election, this revealing report was commissioned by future Vice President Cheney, Defense Secretary Rumsfeld, Deputy Defense Secretary Wolfowitz, and Florida Governor Jeb Bush. The report shows that the Bush administration intended to take military control of Persian Gulf oil whether or not Saddam Hussein was in power.....

Considering the above information, is it beyond comprehension that tactics similar to Operation Northwoods might have been used in relation to the 9/11 attacks in order to create "a truly massive and widely perceived direct external threat?" Could 9/11 have been the pretext upon which to build a War on Terror in order to "maintain global US preeminence?" Might the 9/11 attacks have been allowed to happen, or even facilitated and manipulated by elements of the U.S. government and military?

Operation Northwoods in Context

Lyman Lemnitzer, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs

(who signed and presented the Northwoods Cover Letter, and was shortly thereafter demoted and reassigned to Europe by JFK)

General Edwin Walker,

and the Warnings of President Dwight Eisenhower

The Senate Foreign Affairs Committee opens an inquiry into the military far right. Hearings are held by Sen. Albert Gore (D-Tenn.), father of the future American VP. The senators suspect the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen. Lemnitzer, of taking part in the "Walker plot." [Since the end of the Korean War, Maj. Gen. Walker was convinced that the US government was engaging in a policy of giving up in the face of Communist progress.

After having been relieved of his duties by Secretary of Defense McNamara, and having received a reprimand, he fomented a riot at the University of Mississippi to protest the hiring of a black professor. He was then pursued by Attorney General Robert Kennedy, and arrested for seditious conspiracy, insurrection, and rebellion.

Benefitting from the support of the conservative press, who designated him "The Kennedys' Political Prisoner," he was freed after he paid a $5000 fine. He was later to be found financing an OAS plot to assassinate Charles de Gaulle, then driving "Committee 8F" which is suspected in the JFK assassination.]

Gore knows that Lemnitzer is a specialist in covert ops: in 1943, he personally ran the negotiations for bringing Italy back into the Allied fold against the Reich, then, in 1944, he and Allen Dulles conducted the secret negotiations with the Nazis at Ascona, Switzerland, preparing the surrender (Operation Sunrise) [The Secret Surrender, Allen Dulles, 1967].

He participated in the creation of the NATO stay-behind network, turning Nazi agents into spies against the USSR, and in the exfiltration of human-rights criminals in Latin America. But Gore did not manage to prove his responsibility in current events.

codshit.com/deception-book/effroyab-chap11.html

Lyman L. Lemnitzer, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs

per Source Watch

General Lemnitzer was an Eisenhower appointee and Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff during the Kennedy administration. A leading proponent of pre-emptive action against Cuba during the Cuban Missile Crisis, Lemnitzer believed that the United States had to destroy Cuba and the Soviet Union before it lost its strategic advantage in the missile gap that secretly was tilted heavily in favor of America, though the media was being fed the opposite message.

From released KGB documents and meetings between Robert McNamara and Castro during the 1990s, it is now known that Lemnitzer was wrong and warheads were actually in place during the crisis. A preemptive strike would have resulted in mass US casualties. Kennedy's gut instinct was correct. However, Lemnitzer secretly harbored a deep resentment of Kennedy after the crisis ended, believing the president had missed a golden opportunity to permanently rid the world of the communist-atheists.

When the CIA's Operation Mongoose was canceled due to repeated failures, The Cuba Project was created within the Pentagon to continue these types of activities. Lemnitzer relished the opportunity to show up the "company" who he believed was treading on the military's solemn black ops ground, and ineffectively at that. This led him to approve Operation Northwoods, the plans to attack US targets and blame it on Castro to create a pretext for a complete US invasion of Cuba, and potentially a definitive (at least in Lemnitzer's eyes) WWII scenario with the Russians. Revealingly, his chairmanship was not renewed and he was sent off to command U.S. forces in Europe.

Eisenhower's Historical Parting Speech:

"Beware the Military Industrial Complex"

The Speech in its Entirety Taken from the Public Papers of the Presidents, Dwight D. Eisenhower, 1960, p. 1035- 104

January 17, 1961

EXCERPT:

Our military organization today bears little relation to that known by any of my predecessors in peacetime, or indeed by the fighting men of World War II or Korea.

Until the latest of our world conflicts, the United States had no armaments industry. American makers of plowshares could, with time and as required, make swords as well. But now we can no longer risk emergency improvisation of national defense; we have been compelled to create a permanent armaments industry of vast proportions. Added to this, three and a half million men and women are directly engaged in the defense establishment. We annually spend on military security more than the net income of all United States corporations.

This conjunction of an immense military establishment and a large arms industry is new in the American experience. The total influence -- economic, political, even spiritual -- is felt in every city, every State house, every office of the Federal government. We recognize the imperative need for this development. Yet we must not fail to comprehend its grave implications. Our toil, resources and livelihood are all involved; so is the very structure of our society.

In the councils of government, we must guard against the acquisition of unwarranted influence, whether sought or unsought, by the military-industrial complex. The potential for the disastrous rise of misplaced power exists and will persist.

We must never let the weight of this combination endanger our liberties or democratic processes. We should take nothing for granted. Only an alert and knowledgeable citizenry can compel the proper meshing of the huge industrial and military machinery of defense with our peaceful methods and goals, so that security and liberty may prosper together.

8.5 Khalid Sheikh Mohammed

The Official Legend of 9/11 is a Fabricated Setup

Saturday, March 17 2007

Global Research Editor's note:

The Pentagon has released a 26 page transcript of the "confession" of Khalid Sheikh Mohammed who is now being presented to World public opinion as the mastermind and architect of the September 11, 2001 attacks.

See it at:

http://i.a.cnn.net/cnn/2007/images/03/14/transcript_ISN10024.pdf

This "confession" was read (in his presence) from a prepared text by his "personal [legal?] representative" at "military hearings" held behind closed doors at the US Guantanamo concentration camp.

According to the transcript, Khalid Sheikh Mohammed claims responsibility for the attacks on the WTC twin towers and the Pentagon: "I was responsible for the 9/11 operation, from A to Z."

According to his prepared statement, he also "confessed" to an impressive list of terrorist attacks as well as the planning of a "second wave" of post 9/11 attacks, which were to include the bombings of skyscrapers in New York, Chicago and Washington, attacks on London's Heathrow airport, Canary Warf and the Tower of Big Ben.

He also claimed responsibility for the 1993 attack on the World Trade Center, Richard Reid's attempt to ignite a shoe bomb on an Transatlantic flight in December 2001, and the October 2002 Bali bombings in Indonesia.

In a statement read by his personal representative, he allegedly confessed to planning the assassination of several former presidents, including Jimmy Carter and Bill Clinton, as well as Pope John Paul II.

With regard to The Wall Street Journal's reporter Daniel Pearl, KSM's statement reads: "I decapitated with my blessed right hand the head of the American Jew Daniel Pearl... For those who would like to confirm, there are pictures of me on the Internet holding his head."

KSM was [purportedly] arrested in March 2003 and was then imprisoned for more than three years in secret CIA detention facilities. He claims to have made this confession without any form of pressure being exerted on him. Several press reports suggest that he was tortured.

Khalid Sheikh Mohamed personifies the "outside enemy" of America. His "confession" upholds the illusion that Al Qaeda outwitted the 40 billion dollar US intelligence apparatus, in waging a terrorist attack on America.

The arrest and confessed statements of Khalid Sheikh Mohammed serve to uphold the official 9/11 narrative, namely that the 9/11 attacks were masterminded by Islamic terrorists.

The following text by Chaim Kupferberg, first published by Global Research in October 2003, shortly after the arrest of KSM, reveals with foresight and accuracy the nature of the propaganda ploy. According to Kupferberg, a "marketing plan" was established in June 2002 to introduce Khalid Sheikh Mohammed to the public as the 9/11 mastermind.

Kupferberg exposes with accuracy and foresight, how the official legend was fabricated around Khalid Sheikh Mohammed.

His analysis reveals the historical background behind the creation of the 9/11

Legend. The latter serves to drown the lies and inconsistencies contained in the official 9/11 narrative; it also sustains the "global war on terrorism."

Serious doubts have been expressed on the authenticity of the KSM confession. The latter is ultimately intended, in a clumsy and inept fashion, to uphold the shaky legitimacy of the Bush administration.

The Official Legend of 9/11 as a Prefabricated Set-up

by Chaim Kupferberg

EXCERPT:

As we will see, the Moussaoui indictment had laid the groundwork for the eventual Khalid Shaikh Mohammed/ Ramzi Binalshibh/ Mustafa Ahmed nexus that really gets rolling in June 2002, when Khalid is first introduced as the 9/11 "mastermind", then proceeds through Binalshibh's choreographed arrest in September 2002, and culminates with the simultaneous arrest of Khalid and Mustafa Ahmed in March 2003. Further, we will see how FBI Director Mueller uses the details in the Moussaoui indictment to explicitly pair up Khalid and Mustafa Ahmed -- a full nine months before these characters end up sharing news space for their own simultaneously choreographed apprehensions.

The unsealed December 2001 Moussaoui indictment also set out two "unindicted co-conspirators" who had yet to play their final roles in the unfolding 9/11 Legend -- Ramzi Binalshibh and Mustafa Ahmed al-hawsawi (the "official" paymaster)...

Of the various pivot points in the unfolding 9/11 Legend, the time period of June 4-5 2002 was among the most significant.

...Around the same time that the joint Senate-House Inquiry was proceeding under the co-chairmanship of Bob Graham and Porter Goss (the September 11 breakfast partners of Omar Saeed's reported ISI "handler"), Khalid Shaikh Mohammed was formally introduced as the operative mastermind behind 9/11. John J. Lumpkin of the Associated Press wrote the definitive article here, courtesy of the revelations of an anonymous "top U.S. counterterrorism official."

...Lumpkin's key June article served as a guidepost as to how the unfolding 9/11 Legend would finally crystallize. As reported by Lumpkin, in the same article where Khalid was introduced as the new 9/11 mastermind, he was also "accused of working with Ramzi Yousef in the first bombing of the World Trade Center [in '93]" in addition to working with Yousef on a 1995 plot (code-named Bojinka) to bomb a dozen airliners headed to the United States

...It was not by accident that the 9/11 paymaster - now officially dubbed as Mustafa Ahmed al-Hisawi - was mentioned in an article introducing Khalid as the mastermind. As it turned out, about the same time that Lumpkin's article was making the rounds, Robert Mueller was making a statement before the Senate-House Committee, narrating the full details of the money trail story (as set out in the Moussaoui indictment), but this time adding the role of Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, who, according to Mueller's statement, shared a credit card with Mustafa Ahmed "Alhawsawi."

Thus, Mueller inserted Khalid into the Money Trail Story by way of a direct connection with the "Mustafa Ahmad" alias. And now, thanks to Lumpkin, "Mustafa Ahmad" was not to be thought of as simply a convenient pseudonym, but rather as a real person, bin Laden's bona fide "financial chief"...

...Once Lumpkin's June 2002 article on Khalid was out, further incriminating details were coming out fast and furious. According to CBS News, U.S. officials now had "evidence" that Khalid had met with "some of the 9/11 hijackers at their Hamburg, Germany apartment in 1999." Presumably, Ramzi Binalshibh - Mohammed Atta's Hamburg roommate who was also thought to be a potential "twentieth hijacker" - was among them. Lumpkin's key June article also mentioned Binalshibh as part of Atta's Hamburg "cell." And as Binalshibh was paired with Mustafa Ahmed as an "unindicted co-conspirator" in the Moussaoui indictment, we have perhaps an indication that Khalid, Binalshibh, and Mustafa Ahmed were part of a concerted strategy touched off in early June 2002 to bring this phase of the 9/11 Legend to a close. Conveniently timed for release on the very next day - June 6, 2002 - further news followed that, according to National Security Agency intercepts, Khalid was heard talking on the telephone with hijacker Mohammed Atta. Moreover, for the very first time, authorities were now reporting that Khalid was actually the uncle of Ramzi Yousef. In other words, when the nephew failed to bring down the Towers in '93, the uncle took up the slack in '01.

Perhaps it was this sort of conceptually artistic symmetry that made Khalid so attractive as the designated mastermind. Through Khalid, one had a direct connection to the first World Trade Center attack, providing a smoking gun continuity leading directly to al-Qaida. Prior to Khalid's June 2002 public promotion, he was lurking on the official terror lists merely as an indicted conspirator in the 1995 Bojinka plot masterminded by Ramzi Yousef. Thus, while Khalid had not previously been directly connected to the 9/11 plot, he did make the "most wanted" cut based on his alleged 1995 collaboration with Yousef. With that in mind, one can almost picture sitting in with the members of the National Security Council on a balmy Spring morning in late May 2002, leafing through their photo albums as they argued over the most appropriate candidate to close off the official 9/11 Legend. As it turned out, they chose the guy with the unibrow and the hair shirt.

What was the official reason for revealing the role of Khalid at this point in time? According to CBS News, it was senior al-Qaida figure Abu Zubaydah (captured a few months previously) who had "fingered [Khalid] as the mastermind behind the Sept. 11 attacks." Abu Zubaydah, the first "big fish" captured in the War On Terror, had previously - and conveniently - been fingered as a major al-Qaida player by Ahmed Ressam...

... As we will see, once Ramzi Binalshibh's number comes up for apprehension (in September 2002), followed by the capture of Khalid and Mustafa Ahmed in March 2003, another version will be offered for the timing of Khalid's introduction as 9/11 mastermind. But first, we should take note of James Risen's June 5, 2002 article for the New York Times, in which Risen reported that the authorities "had begun to suspect soon after the [Sept. 11] attacks that [Khalid] had some role in the hijackings. But in the next months, a detailed financial investigation of the money trail from the plot led officials to believe that he had a more prominent role than previously suspected." In other words, as Risen had framed it, Khalid had first garnered notice for 9/11 by way of his connection to the money trail. Was this a retrospective addition into the record? -- for Khalid most certainly did not make it into the Money Trail Story as of December 2001, when pretty much all the details of the money trail were crystallized within the Moussaoui indictment. On the other hand, there is a possibility that Khalid was intended from the very beginning to be featured as the 9/11 mastermind, yet perhaps he could not be safely inserted back into the Legend by way of the money trail until that nasty confusion over the "Mustafa Ahmad" alias was resolved...

...By June of 2002, the contents of the Moussaoui indictment could indeed be viewed as the clear signpost pointing the way to the manner in which the final loose ends of the Official 9/11 Legend would be tied up for posterity. With Ramzi Binalshibh and Mustafa Ahmed al-Hisawi already tied together as unindicted co-conspirators in the Moussaoui case, FBI Director Robert Mueller would, by this time, explicitly weave in Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, pairing him up with Mustafa Ahmed and thereby inserting this newly-christened 9/11 mastermind into the Money Trail Story. The Associated Press' John Lumpkin would reference all three in his key June 2002 article. It is as if the powers-that-be were putting this trio of nefarious characters on notice - from here on, their fates were to be indelibly entwined.

If habitual coincidence is the mother of all conspiracy theories, then one must surely raise a discerning eyebrow at the revelation that, around this time - after more than a decade of staying hidden in the shadows - Khalid Shaikh Mohammed suddenly was stricken with an urge to conduct his very first interview, with none other than Ramzi Binalshibh at his side. The journalist chosen for this honor was the London bureau chief of Al-Jazeera, Yosri Fouda...

...On September 9, 2002, the die was cast. Al-Jazeera was broadcasting Part I of Fouda's historic interview with Khalid Shaikh Mohammed and Ramzi Binalshibh. For the first time, millions would hear - from the planners themselves - exactly how the September 11 plot was put in motion. It was al-Jazeera's version of VH1's Behind The Music, featuring guest commentaries from Vincent Cannistraro and Lyndon LaRouche. Unfortunately, viewers would only get the audio feed of Khalid and Binalshibh, as Binalshibh and Khalid purportedly had confiscated from Fouda his videotape of the proceedings before he had taken leave of them back in June.

In more ways than one, September 9 was an ideal launch date for the interview broadcast. By then, the mainstream media had the whole summer to feed the public - and themselves - with various leaks, revelations, and "official" comments concerning Khalid and Binalshibh's newfound place in the 9/11 pantheon. Set-up and payoff. Moreover, the interview was now being broadcast in the immediate lead-up to the first anniversary of the 9/11 attacks, thereby further raising the profile of this historic broadcast...

...It was practically a seamless propaganda extravaganza, except for one small detail - Fouda had gone on record as dating the interview to June of 2002, thereby raising the prospect of two plausible scenarios. Scenario One: Khalid and Binalshibh's respective roles in the plot were first discovered solely due to Fouda's contact with them; or Scenario Two: The decision to send Fouda on his interview errand was made at the same time that a decision was made to market Khalid as the new 9/11 mastermind. Of the two scenarios, the first one was far more palatable - from a propaganda perspective - as at least it could be kept within the borders of plausible deniability, and only Fouda would get burned by it. The second scenario, however, would raise the prospect of one of those uncomfortable coincidences that could conceivably expose the 9/11 Legend as a pre-fabricated set-up.

Only two days after the initial broadcast of Fouda's interview with Khalid and Binalshibh - on the first anniversary commemorating the 9/11 attacks - Pakistani forces, accompanied by FBI agents, raided an apartment complex in Karachi. After a "four hour" gun battle involving "hundreds" of Pakistani soldiers and policemen, the authorities captured, among a few others, Ramzi Binalshibh himself. Their original target, however, had been Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, whom they had been tracking for months throughout Karachi. While Khalid had just barely slipped away only a few hours before Pakistani forces had arrived at his door, the authorities were reportedly "surprised" to discover that they had netted Binalshibh in the process. At least that is now the official version of the day's events...

...With the well-timed arrest of Ramzi Binalshibh in September 2002, journalist Yosri Fouda was in a bind. Only days before, he had gone on record - repeatedly - as dating his interview with Khalid and Binalshibh to June 2002. Up to the time of Binalshibh's arrest, the official legend had it that Khalid's pivotal role as 9/11 mastermind was revealed to U.S. authorities through their interrogation of Abu Zubaydah, who was captured in March 2002. Now, in the aftermath of Binalshibh's capture, word was circulating that perhaps authorities had learned of Khalid's true role by way of Fouda. That contention, of course, would remain most plausible if Fouda's interview could definitively be back-dated to a time before early June 2002 - that is, to a time before Khalid was first publicly announced as 9/11 mastermind. The alternative scenario quite simply pointed to a conclusion that would have to be denied at all costs - that the decision to out Khalid publicly as the 9/11 mastermind was coordinated with the decision to send Fouda on his interview errand with Khalid. Had Fouda erred, then, by initially claiming that his historic interview had taken place in June 2002? Had he possibly exposed a seam pointing the way to a coordinated set-up?

Soon after the Binalshibh arrest, Fouda took the opportunity to revise the date of his interview for the record, revealing to Abdallah Schleifer of the Kamal Adham Center For Journalism:

Fouda: "Actually, this question of dates is very important for another reason. All of these Islamist websites that were denouncing me alluded to my interview as taking place in June. That's what I mentioned both in my article in The Sunday Times Magazine and in my documentary -- that I met them in June."

Schleifer: "So?"

Fouda: "I lied."

Schleifer: "Really?"

Fouda: "Yeah."

Schleifer: "But you're going to come clean with [us], right?"

Fouda: (laughter) "Yes, of course. I lied because I needed to lie. I'll tell you why. Because I thought, maybe even expected, that if something went wrong and I needed to get in touch with them through a website or a statement or a fax ... they would be the only ones who would know that I had met them one month earlier than I let on, and so I'd know I was talking to the right people.

So after the first wave of denunciations a pro-Qa'ida website "jihad.net" put up a statement online in the name of Al-Qa'ida clearing me of any blame or connection with Ramzi's arrest and I knew this was an authentic communique because it alluded to the interview taking place in May."

Apparently, Fouda had lied again, for on March 4, 2003 (i.e. a few days after Khalid's eventual arrest), Fouda offered up this newest version of his 48-hour encounter to The Guardian:

"It was late afternoon, Sunday 21 April 2002, when I packed my bags before joining Khalid Sheikh Mohammed and Ramzi bin al-shibh for a last prayer before saying goodbye."

That, as they say in legal parlance, is a very definite recollection. In short, Fouda had impeached his own testimony through these two explicitly detailed, contradictory dates. Fouda, through this compounded lie, was now calling into question the very credibility of his entire interview with Khalid and Binalshibh...

...Recall that, back in June 2002, the "official" legend at the time had it that it was Abu Zubaydah, back in March 2002, who had spilled the goods on Khalid. Yet with Khalid's March 2003 apprehension, this one aspect of the legend was duly revised. As revealed by Keith Olbermann in a March 3, 2003 MSNBC.com item:

"Ironically, it would be [Fouda's] interview that would point out, to U.S. intelligence, that [Khalid Shaikh] Mohammed and Binalshibh were the brains behind the 9/11 attacks"...

...Within weeks of Binalshibh's Sept. 11, 2002 arrest, the disinformation apparatus was revisiting the Daniel Pearl thread of the 9/11 Legend, this time with a bombshell UPI exclusive from Richard Sale and Anwar Iqbal, dated September 30, 2002:

..."Bob Baer, a former case officer in the agency's Directorate of Operations, said he provided Pearl with unpublished information about Khalid Shaikh Mohammed..."

...'I was working with Pearl,' said Baer, who had written a book about his time as a CIA official and has acted as a consultant and source for numerous media outlets. 'We had a joint project. Mohammed was the story he was working on, not Richard Reid' "...

...In Baer's book, See No Evil, Khalid is mentioned briefly as an expert in hijacking planes, but precious little detail is offered. One must be extremely cautious in assimilating any "official" details about Khalid offered after June 2002, as one cannot be sure as to which biographical details were fabricated solely to buttress Khalid's early June 2002 legend as the 9/11 mastermind. Interestingly, while Baer's brief reference to Khalid in his book is one of the very few public characterizations of him offered between September 2001 and June 2002, one must wonder why Baer chose to wait a good eight months after the Pearl kidnapping before revealing this new chapter about Khalid. Even more so, one must wonder why, back in June 2002, when Khalid was making the headlines as the newly marketed 9/11 mastermind - and at a time when the red-hot Baer was doing the post-9/11 media circuit - he apparently did not find it newsworthy to reveal the Khalid angle to the Pearl story. Or perhaps he had forgotten it altogether, and it had taken as long as three weeks after the Binalshibh arrest to jog his memory.

But with his memory now firmly jogged, apparently he would set out to discover what happened to his "joint project" partner, Daniel Pearl. Perhaps to his horror, he discovered that Pearl might have been disposed of by their joint research subject. "I have heard from (intelligence) people who follow this closely that it was people close to [Khalid Shaikh] Mohammed that killed him [Pearl], if it wasn't Mohammed himself," Baer revealed to UPI...

...On September 26, 2002, only days before Baer's bombshell admission, John Lumpkin of the Associated Press presented his update on the 9/11 paymaster role. Recall that it was Lumpkin who had written, back in early June 2002, the definitive article introducing Khalid as the 9/11 mastermind, including references to the now-official paymaster Mustafa Ahmed al-Hisawi (a.k.a. Shaikh Saïid al-Sharif) and Ramzi Binalshibh. Now, Lumpkin was reporting the contents of Robert Mueller's formerly secret testimony before the Joint Senate-House Committee, made back in early June 2002, around the time of Lumpkin's key article on Khalid...

...And, as if to lay the groundwork for Khalid and al-Hisawi's eventual simultaneous capture, Lumpkin wrote, "Both al-Hisawi and Mohammed are at large and are among the most wanted al-Qaida figures remaining." He might also have mentioned Osama bin Laden and his deputy Ayman al-Zawahiri, but then that wasn't the point of the article.

As I have argued, the time was fast approaching for al-Hisawi, Binalshibh, and Khalid (in conjunction with the Moussaoui indictment) to wrap up this segment of the 9/11 Legend and to take their indelible places in the official history books...

...Approaching the end of 2002, with Binalshibh secretly stashed away in U.S. custody - and with most people focused on the emerging War In Iraq - the time was now ripe to bring this part of the Official 9/11 Legend to its neat and tidy conclusion.

For the record, the aforementioned John J. Lumpkin of the Associated Press (who had written the definitive June 2002 article introducing Khalid as the new 9/11 mastermind) took the opportunity -- on December 27, 2002 -- to clarify the true identity of the official 9/11 paymaster, this time providing the very first explicit acknowledgment of those troublesome contradictions previously conveyed through the pages of the Associated Press...

...Not that many people noticed - or cared. Still, all that prior nasty confusion concerning the 9/11 paymaster alias had to be qualified and clarified in time for [Mustafa Ahmed] al-Hisawi's approaching "official" arrest...

...In any case, the main story points of the Official 9/11 Legend were fully elaborated and resolved with the simultaneous capture of Khalid and the official paymaster, Mustafa Ahmed al-Hisawi, in March 2003. Only weeks later, however, with the War In Iraq in full sway, these presumably senior operatives in the 9/11 plot drew negligible scrutiny from the media and the public at large. Both men were reportedly stashed away in secret locations, presumably sharing the fruits of their interrogations with anonymous officials, who would duly pass off the requisite "scoops" to writers with a curious penchant for special intelligence access (Gerald Posner, for example).

Meanwhile, the -- perhaps choreographed? -- farce of the Moussaoui trial would drag on, with Moussaoui reportedly insistent on calling Khalid and Binalshibh as witnesses for the defense. At this point, one would be cautioned as to drawing any firm conclusions about the ongoing events of the Moussaoui trial. The important fact to keep in mind is that Moussaoui all along was likely set up as the convenient vessel through which the Justice Department and Mueller's FBI -- cunningly obscured by Mueller's hedges -- would gradually elaborate the main contours of the Official 9/11 Legend in that crucial first year following 9/11.

In other words, by way of the lone Moussaoui indictment, the authorities were able to provide the illusion of a massive legal investigation covering literally thousands of pages, spanning continents in order to ferret out the full depth of Moussaoui's nefarious associations. In this respect, one might surmise that once Moussaoui has fully served his purpose as an investigative/propaganda vessel (as he likely already has), the authorities will then proceed to demonstrate that the Moussaoui case was never particularly relevant after all -- thereby successfully concealing the all-important function that his case did serve in the finely calibrated public dissemination of the Official 9/11 Legend.

Given the foregoing, it remains to be seen how the authorities will conclusively deal with the festering anomalies surrounding their three prize catches -- the elusive Binalshibh, the perhaps dead Khalid, and the perhaps fictitious Mustafa Ahmed al-Hisawi. Nevertheless, it is a safe bet that in the meantime, the authorities will continue to weave ever more complex and murky tapestries around the personalities of these operatives, employing the mercenary talents of writers like Gerald Posner to add to the crumbling sediment of "facts."

Who or What is Khalid Sheikh Mohammed?

by Larry Chin

EXCERPTED

Like Osama Bin Laden.....

See "Osamagate" at:

<http://www.globalresearch.ca/articles/CHO110A.html>

KSM remains a propaganda legend, and one of a multitude of 9/11 red herrings that the US government not addressed.

See "Mystery Surrounding Khalid Sheikh Mohammed" at:
<http://www.globalresearch.ca/articles/RAM303A.html>

In addition to the one excerpted above, a] series of investigative articles by Chaim Kupferberg in 2002 exposed critical evidence and damning questions about KSM, "Al-Qaeda," the ISI, 9/11, and the Bush Administration's guiding hand behind all of it:

See "9/11 and the Smoking Gun that Turned on its Tracker" at:
<http://www.globalresearch.ca/articles/KUP209B.html>

See "The Recruiters of 9/11" at:
<http://www.globalresearch.ca/articles/KUP311B.html>

See "Stacking the Patsies of 9/11" at:
<http://www.globalresearch.ca/articles/KUP312B.html>

It remains unclear if KSM was captured in 2002, as purported, or if he was ever delivered into custody to be interrogated. In fact, many credible mainstream reports suggest that KSM is dead, and that he never made it into custody.

There is not a shred of verifiable proof to confirm any aspect of KSM -- or the veracity of this new tribunal. We have only the word of a criminal Bush administration, and the CIA.

KSM: Per Mike Ruppert in Crossing the Rubicon:

"The US government has failed to produce -- publicly, or for the one failed 9/11 criminal prosecution in Germany of Mounir el Motassadeq -- either bin al-Shibh or KSM as material witnesses. No mere mortal has seen either one of them since their reported captures. Credible reports have told us that KSM was killed.

Any information alleged to have come from these 'captured' suspects has come in the form of 'press-release prosecution' by the government. None of it has ever been independently authenticated."

David Ray Griffin on KSM

David Ray Griffin's book, "9/11 & American Empire -- Intellectuals Speak Out" made reference to KSM in Daniele Ganser's chapter -- Pages 80-81:

"...As of now, three conflicting theories dominate the [9/11] discourse.

"The first 9/11 theory is the so-called surprise theory. Offered by the Bush Administration and the Kean-Zelikow report, it claims that Osama bin Laden conspired with Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, Mohammad Atta, and other men to attack the US on 9/11. The surprise theory argues that 9/11 was a Muslim conspiracy. It concedes that there were rumors about a looming attack, but insists that the US intelligence community, including the NSA, CIA, FBI, DIA, and other intelligence services, along with the Pentagon, were unable to prevent the conspiracy from being implemented.

"The second 9/11 theory ...is the so-called LIHOP (let it happen on purpose) theory. Like the surprise theory, it assumes that Osama bin Laden conspired with Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, Mohammed Atta, and other men to attack the US on 9/11. In stark contrast to the surprise theory, however, the LIHOP theory claims that persons within the US government deliberately allowed the attacks to be carried out in order to be able to start a number of wars that had been planned in advance. The LIHOP theory thus argues that 9/11 was a combined Muslim and Jewish-Christian conspiracy, in which the later group outwitted the former.

"The third 9/11 theory on offer is the so-called MIHOP (make it happen on purpose) theory. It argues that criminal persons within the US government, in the Pentagon and the intelligence community, carried out the attacks themselves in order to be able to start a number of wars that had been planned in advance. The MIHOP theory argues that 9/11 was primarily a Christian or Jewish Christian conspiracy, in which Muslims, if involved at all, were only involved in minor ways.

"Theologians have correctly pointed out that no true Christian, Jewish, or Muslim values -- including love and respect for other human beings -- can be found in the crimes of 9/11, and that it is therefore fundamentally wrong to link any of the three largest monotheistic religions of the world to the crime. If religion played a role in the fanatic crime at all, then it was misguided religion."

Khalid Sheikh Mohammed's claim that he was the Wizard of Oz for all of the 9/11 attacks and other attacks prior to and after 9/11 is no different than my bragging that I beat my dad at a few games of chess when I was only twelve years old. I believed I beat him fair and square. It felt good to say so.

But the truth was, my dad LIHOP-ed me. He only revealed the truth to me after I started bragging about it.

If KSM has been tortured into such a broad and fantastic confession, and if he knows his life will be spent behind bars or abruptly halted with a lethal injection, would he really wish to go out knowing he was a patsy? Like a twelve year old tricked into thinking he attained chess dominance over his father?

Or would he rather go out like a martyr and a hero to all Muslim freedom fighters?

This confession is going to end up just like McVeigh's with the OKC bombing. They'll execute him and bury him. And with that, they will bury the truth of who assisted him w/ 9/11.

The KSM confession seems all so convenient in light of the Plame case, the firing of the DA's, and of course their implicit acknowledgement that 9/11 Truth is metastasizing into their plans for global hegemony.

The tipping point is upon us.

Peace.

8.6 Bin-Laden Denies Involvement in the 9/11 Attacks

EXCERPT: An Interview with Usama Bin-Laden per Unmat 28 September 2001

I have already said that I am not involved in the 11 September attacks in the United States. As a Muslim, I try my best to avoid telling a lie. I had no knowledge of these attacks, nor do I consider the killing of innocent women, children and other humans as an appreciable act. Islam strictly forbids causing harm to innocent women, children and other people. Such a practice is forbidden even in the course of a battle. It is the United States, which is perpetrating every maltreatment on women, children and common people of other faiths, particularly the followers of Islam. All that is going on in Palestine for the last 11 months is sufficient to call the wrath of God upon the United States and Israel. There is also a warning for those Muslim countries, which witnessed all these as a silent spectator. What had earlier been done to the innocent people of Iraq, Chechnya and Bosnia? Only one conclusion could be derived from the indifference of the United States and the West to these acts of terror and the patronage of the tyrants by these powers that America is an anti-Islamic power and it is patronizing the anti-Islamic forces. Its friendship with the Muslim countries is just a show, rather deceit. By enticing or intimidating these countries, the United States is forcing them to play a role of its choice. Put a glance all around and you will see that the slaves of the United States are either rulers or enemies of Muslims.

The U.S. has no friends, nor does it want to keep any because the prerequisite of friendship is to come to the level of the friend or consider him at par with you. America does not want to see anyone equal to it. It expects slavery from others. Therefore, other countries are either its slaves or subordinates. However, our case is different. We have pledged slavery to God Almighty alone and after this pledge there is no possibility to become the slave of someone else. If we do that it will be disregardful to both our Sustainer and his fellow beings. Most of the world nations upholding their freedom are the religious ones, which are the enemies of the United States, or the U.S. itself considers them as its enemies.

The countries which do not agree to become the U.S. slaves are China, Iran, Libya, Cuba, Syria [Afghanistan, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Iraq, Sudan, Indonesia, Malaysia] and Russia. Whoever committed the act of 11 September are not the friends of the American people. I have already said that we are against the American system, not against its people, whereas in these attacks, the common American people have been killed. According to my information, the death toll is much higher than what the U.S. Government has stated. But the Bush Administration does not want the panic to spread. The United States should try to trace the perpetrators of these attacks within itself; the people who are a part of the U.S. system, but are dissenting against it. Or those who are working for some other system; persons who want to make the present century as a century of conflict between Islam and Christianity so that their own civilization, nation, country, or ideology could survive. They can be anyone, from Russia to Israel and from India to Serbia. In the U.S. itself, there are dozens of well-organized and well-equipped groups, which are capable of causing a large-scale destruction. Then you cannot forget the American-Jews, who are annoyed with President Bush ever since the elections in Florida and want to avenge him.

Then there are intelligence agencies in the U.S., which require billions of dollars worth of funds from the Congress and the government every year. This [funding issue] was not a big problem till [sic] the existence of the former Soviet Union but after that the budget of these agencies has been in danger. They needed an enemy. So, they first started propaganda against Usama and Taleban and then this incident happened. You see, the Bush Administration approved a budget of 40 billion dollars. Where will this huge amount go? It will be provided to the same agencies, which need huge funds and want to exert their importance. Now they will spend the money for their expansion and for increasing their importance. I will give you an example. Drug smugglers from all over the world are in contact with the U.S. secret agencies. These agencies do not want to eradicate narcotics cultivation and trafficking because their importance will be diminished. The people in the U.S. Drug Enforcement Department are encouraging drug trade so that they could show performance and get millions of dollars worth of budget. General Noriega was made a drug baron by the CIA and, in need, he was made a scapegoat. In the same way, whether it is President Bush or any other U.S. President, they cannot bring Israel to justice for its human rights abuses or to hold it accountable for such crimes. What is this? Is it not that there exists a government within the government in the United States? That secret government must be asked as to who carried out the attacks.

The Framing of Usama Bin Laden?

Operation 9/11 and ISI: Putting the Pieces Together

Extremely Cogent Analysis

By Abid Ullah Jan

The Independent Center for Strategic Studies and Analysis

Published: July 14, 2006

The set-up to implicate bin Laden seems to span a long period of time. Even in the bombings of the U.S. Embassies in Tanzania and Kenya, bin Laden vehemently denied his involvement and refused to take responsibility. According to General Hamid Gul, Osama swore to him on the Qur'an that he had nothing to do with the bombings in Africa. In General Hamid Gul's words:

Mossad is strong in both countries. Remember the Israeli operation to free hostages in Entebbe (Uganda)? Both Kenya and Tanzania were part of the logistical tail. A so-called associate of Osama was framed at Karachi airport. The incidents took place on Aug. 8, 1999, and on the 10th a short, clean-shaven man disembarks at Karachi airport and presents the passport of a bearded man. Not your passport, he was told. He then tries to bribe the clerk with 200 rupees. A ludicrously small sum given the circumstances. The clerk says no and turns him in and he starts singing right away. Not plausible. Osama has sworn to me on the Koran it was not him and he is truthful to a fault. Pious Muslims do not kill innocent civilians who included many Muslim victims. The passport must have been switched while the man was asleep on the plane in what has all the earmarks of a Mossad operation. For 10 years, the Mujahideen fought the Soviets in Afghanistan and not a single Soviet embassy was touched anywhere in the world. So this could not have been Osama's followers.

Evidence for the set-up of Operation 9/11 is further supported by the fact that in 1999, a U.S. National Intelligence Council (NIC) report noted that "al-Qaeda suicide bombers could crash-land an aircraft packed with high explosives into the Pentagon, the headquarters of the CIA, or the White House." Furthermore, at least 11 countries provided advance warning to the United States of the 9/11 attacks.

Two senior Mossad experts were sent to Washington in August 2001 to alert the CIA and FBI to a cell of 200 terrorists said to be preparing a big operation. None of these individuals were arrested. This is not a sign of incompetence.

It only proves that the initial propagation of information was created in order to set the trap -- a trap designed to convincingly hold Arabs responsible for the attacks planned by the insiders. Actually, those agents within the U.S. intelligence community who were responsible for receiving and "acting" on the many foreign warnings received prior to 9/11 were most probably the ones who planted the information about the possible attacks in the first place. Additionally, the United States government hid behind a façade of incompetence and inaction both before the attacks and during the period when Operation 9/11 was unfolding.

8.7 Bin Laden's "Confessional" Video

Can We Get a Close-up?

The "Taliban home video" convicted Osama bin Laden in the eyes of the American public: no trial, judge or jury -- simply a death warrant, supposedly to be delivered by the US military. But much rests on the integrity of the translation and transcript. Is it pure chance that two opening phrases in this key passage are said to be "(inaudible)"?

"The tape was of such poor quality and bin Laden's words so difficult to discern that viewers took away from it what they wanted," writes Michael Slackman for the LA Times. He continues with a quote from one Rashwan from the Al Ahram Center for Political and Strategic Studies in Cairo.

"It's a real scandal," he said, laughing. Bin Laden is a multimillionaire, a man said to possess extraordinary technological capabilities, a man who released previous videos that were slick and well produced, he said, so how could this be his work?"

Anyone could have dubbed on the voices because there are no close-ups of the lips of the people while speaking. What we could hear was a lot of mumbling and during the mumbling, the supposed translation [WWW] comes up with some incriminating phrases.

<http://911review.org/Wiki/BinLadenConfession.shtml>

Osama Gump?

"When a visitor from Saudi Arabia arrives, his voice is clear and there are frequent close-ups. But Bin Laden's voice is always muffled and the camera never zooms in on him."

Truly, the sound is atrocious. In many parts, the transcript reads: "OBL: (...Inaudible...)," and to add to the poor quality of audio, a persistent cough permeates the background. Hafiz al-Mazari of Al-Jazeera TV, appearing on ABC's Nightline, talked about problems of voice and video synchronization.....

To add further confusion to the already murky audio, video and poor translation, the sequence of the events is reversed on the tape. It begins with the end of the visit, a helicopter site visit occupies the middle, and the ending sequence of the tape brings up the beginning of the visit!

Who is Usama's Mama?
Comment by Yana
12-19-1

I have yet to see anyone question who the heck the Shaykh was referring to when he talked about how "the mother" received many phone calls of congratulations!! Now, since the whole tape is admitting (supposedly) that Osama is guilty of 9/11, who is "the mother?" I heard an Arab say that part of the tape is a celebratory party of the birth of a child to one of Osama's wives. I heard that BEFORE I read the transcript. I didn't think much of it at the time, but then when I read the transcript - I thought, "Oh my God! It was a tape about a mother giving birth!" At least some of it. It had to be.

Why else is no one even asking who "the mother" is? That isn't some Islamic expression... so if they admit their own guilt on the tape (supposedly), why code name someone else as "the mother?" And if that is a code name, shouldn't all the news be wondering who is even higher up than Osama that that person's identity is kept secret even on their home video? But not one word of wonder about the mysterious person "the mother." Not one!

It seems so obvious that the Shaykh isn't talking about any attacks to me when he tells how he and the brothers found out the good news and about the phone calls to "the mother." Is it just me? Why could I find no one else on the whole web wondering about this section?

The Bug in the Contextual Ointment?

"What the translators have done is taken a conversation of bin Laden on the subject of what he was thinking and guessing as he watched the news on September 11 as events were unfolding -- and making it seem that he was [recalling] doing this thinking and guessing at some earlier time before the events."

What the Tape Proves

Comment by John Marshall

What the Bin Ladin Tape proves:

The Bin Ladin video tape finally released by the Pentagon turned out to only prove four things:

- 1) That the audio quality of Bin Ladin's voice was the worst of those talking on the video (?)
- 2) The sound was so bad that the Arabic grammar could be heard either way i.e. "we did" or "we said" could also be heard as "they did" or "they said" etc. Which means the difference between a person being a spectator or a mastermind.
- 3) Bin Ladin must be exceedingly stupid to admit in an open dinner party (this while the US Air Force and Special Forces are carpet bombing the entire country) and with kids and guests all over the place that he planned and carried out the WTC attacks while previously declaring to the World he had nothing to do with it.
- 4) If he is that stupid then there is no way a person of that level of intelligence could have pulled off the sophisticated operation Washington claims he did from the caves of Afghanistan.

Where is the "concrete" evidence they claimed to have before that is still being hidden from us?

The Jumping Turban

Comment from Pat Taylor

..... The man that was purportedly Osama bin Laden was not. His profile did not match that of Osama. His nose was flatter than that of Osama. Take a look at past photographs and see for your self. This was a look-alike.

There were filming splices present at the beginning of the second Osama segment. Watch the man on the right as he takes off his turban by unwrapping it from his head and placing the wrapping in his lap. Then, without a supposed break in the film, in the following close up, he was wearing it nicely wrapped around his head.

No Future for BushLaden on MTV

New BushLaden video: Poor production, bad lighting, LOUSY soundtrack mar amateur effort  NOT ready for MTV

In the most-anticipated video release since the one of Madonna's live sex-change performance, BushLaden today released THEIR latest pop video to an eager world. And the world yawned.

WHAT a bomb: this rancid, laughably-amateurish number is arguably the WORST pop video EVER produced in the history of Western civilization (such as there IS any, anymore...).

Terrible production values, MISERABLY dim lighting, pathetic acting, an ABOMINABLY WRETCHED soundtrack and -- worst of all -- a HORRID lead vocal render this video an unmitigated disaster and UTTERLY un-watchable by all but the MOST brain-dead, tone-deaf heavy metal fans still surviving in various isolated pockets worldwide.

It's true: singer Osama bin YoYo has a HORRID, croaky, intolerable and un-listenable voice that makes nails on a blackboard seem like a choir of heavenly angels; it makes Jerry Garcia seem like Luciano Pavarotti.

This clown CANNOT SING. And NEITHER, apparently, can his backup boys, Mullah Moolah and the Tally Bones. In fact, the rest of the band is TOTALLY inaudible on this tape. Although that's almost certainly a LUCKY BREAK for the listening/watching public, it IS a peculiar, and generally INEFFECTIVE, approach to music video production which should NEVER be reprised.

A massive, world-wide public relations effort by band leader dubya bush to hype the video was a TOTAL waste of money, time and effort: no matter WHAT kind of hype this item gets, NOTHING can change the fact that it's an extraordinarily lousy product to have been released by the supposedly professional BushLaden Group, and will be relegated to the ash heap of history at or beyond the speed of LIGHT itself.

Our verdict: NO beat, LOUSY vocal, HORRIBLE production values -- we give it a big fat ZERO.

This clownishly un-professional piece of DRECK from BushLaden will NOT make the Top 20: it won't even make the top 10,000, and that's giving it all the benefit we can, of every doubt there is -- and there are LOTS.

BushLaden: hire some PROFESSIONAL producers next time, and oh -- TAKE SOME SINGING LESSONS!

This will NEVER, EVER show on MTV -- THANK GOD!

8.9 Dick Cheney and the Skyrocketing Value of his Halliburton Options

Cheney's Halliburton stock options rose 3,281% last year, senator finds http://rawstory.com/news/2005/Cheneys_stock_options_rose_3281_last_1011.html

Dick Cheney, War Profiteering, and Halliburton

Bush Administration Designed to Do the Bidding of the Oil Industry

[The Bush Administration's] Defense Policy Board has 30 members, nine of whom have ties to companies that have won more than $76 billion in defense contracts in 2001 and 2002.

Four members are registered lobbyists and one represents two of the three largest defense contractors. You have kind of issues of conflicts of interest. You have larger questions concerning whether or not some of the ostensible basis of our foreign policy is contradicted by the private activities of some of the people involved. For instance, take Vice President Dick Cheney.

Dick Cheney was CEO of Halliburton. One of the stories that has not come out except for the good graces, the persistence of Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.), is the fact that Halliburton has done business in Iran and during Saddam Hussein's regime in Iraq through off-shore subsidiaries.

Cheney was confronted about this and at first denied that early on in his vice-presidency or while he was a candidate for office. It was later proven to be true and he sort of avoided responsibility for it, I guess, by claiming that this was an activity of a subsidiary and that the company didn't really know much about it. The hypocrisy there is that here's a company that's doing business with regimes that this administration has deemed to be supporters of terrorism.

Cheney's relationship with Halliburton's goes back 11 years to when he was secretary of defense under President Bush [I].

And he at that time established a relationship with Halliburton by hiring Kellog, Brown and Root, their subsidiary, to look at how the Defense Department could more efficiently manage some of its operations by inviting private contractors into perform those services.

Then he went to work at Halliburton and became the CEO and Halliburton grew to become from something like the 78th largest to the 17th largest defense contractor under Dick Cheney's leadership. And then he of course, came back into government office but it apparently seems like he hasn't lost his connection to Halliburton. He continues to receive almost $200,000 in annual compensation as a retirement package from Halliburton.

Also, a little known story is that the vice president's office met with Halliburton in October along with other representatives of the oil industry to discuss oil production in Iraq after Saddam was gone. This is back in October [2002] before any decision of going to war was even officially made. That's a meeting that we don't know a lot about. It was reported on by the Wall Street Journal by Thaddeus Herrick on the 16th of January, and the administration denied it even occurred. Much like they won't cough up the documents from the national energy strategy [meetings of April, 2001].

There's a lot of secrecy involved in the relationships between this administration and the corporations that they have deep ties with, particularly the oil and gas industry. The administration has about 41 members, top level administration representatives that came out of the oil and gas industry, including people like Condoleezza Rice who once had an oil tanker owned by Chevron named after her.

The Curse of Dick Cheney

by T. D. Allman

This pattern of misplaced confidence in Cheney, followed by disastrous results, runs throughout his life -- from his days as a dropout at Yale to the geopolitical chaos he has helped create in Baghdad. Once you get to know his history, the cycle becomes clear: First, Cheney impresses someone rich or powerful, who causes unearned wealth and power to be conferred on him. Then, when things go wrong, he blames others and moves on to a new situation even more advantageous to himself.

"Cheney's manner and authority of voice far outstrip his true abilities," says Chas Freeman, who served under Bush's father as ambassador to Saudi Arabia. "It was clear from the start that Bush required adult supervision -- but it turns out Cheney has even worse instincts. He does not understand that when you act recklessly, your mistakes will come back and bite you on the ass."

Bringing Halliburton To Heel

by Charlie Cray
September 27, 2004

The Army's recent decision to break up Halliburton's logistics contract doesn't make a dent in the war profiteer's monopoly. And despite evidence that the giant corporation was vastly overcharging taxpayers for services it provides, it still has almost exclusive access to many contracts in Iraq.....

Leading Pentagon watchdogs have been calling for Halliburton's debarment or suspension from Pentagon contracts since August. At that time the Defense Contract Audit Agency (DCAA) issued a memo complaining that Halliburton could not account for more than $1.8 billion of $4.3 billion of work in Iraq and Kuwait. For the third time, the DCAA recommended that the Pentagon not pay Halliburton until it coughed up all the receipts.

The long list of waste, fraud, bribery and other abuses associated with Halliburton's Iraq contracts now fill volumes. Vigilant oversight by Rep. Henry Waxman's office and Pentagon investigators—with the help of company whistleblowers—have uncovered attempts to charge taxpayers $45 per case of soda, $100 per bag of laundry, $10,000 a day to use five-star hotels in Kuwait. (Meanwhile, the troops are sweating it out in tents in the desert). There's been $167 million worth of price gouging for imported gasoline, and $186 million charged for meals that were never served to the troops, and a $6 million kickback to two employees (fired by the company) from a subcontractor.

Halliburton's Rap Sheet

In fact, there have been so many Halliburton scandals that it's been hard to keep up (go to www.HalliburtonWatch.org for an up-to-date rap sheet). A few of the bigger ones:

-- U.S., Nigerian and French government officials continue to investigate bribery allegations involving a natural gas consortium directed by Halliburton in Nigeria. Jack Stanley—the former head of KBR (the Halliburton subsidiary that also does most of the company's contracting with the military)—was let go after it was discovered that $5 million was siphoned off into a personal bank account. The Financial Times recently reported that while Dick Cheney was CEO the company forced its consortium partners to reappoint a business agent believed to have masterminded the scheme, which involved the use of offshore subsidiaries and Swiss bank accounts.

-- For years, Halliburton has been questioned about circumventing a ban on conducting business with the government of Iran, a member of Bush and Cheney's so-called "axis of evil." After the Treasury Department referred the case to the Department of Justice, a grand jury in Houston opened up an investigation. During Cheney's time as CEO, the company also did business with Saddam. Cheney also led an effort to lobby against the sanctions. "The problem is that the good Lord didn't see fit to put oil and gas reserves where there are democratically elected regimes friendly to the interests of the United States," Cheney once explained.

-- The company recently agreed to pay the SEC more than $7.5 million in penalties for securities violations for certain accounting irregularities. After the SEC settled the case, a new civil suit was filed against the company (Cheney is not a defendant in the case, though it covers a period when he was CEO). It's no surprise that Cheney has been railing against "frivolous lawsuits" on the campaign trail—obviously intended as a jab at John Edwards and a sop to his friends at Halliburton and other companies who have been pushing for relief from asbestos liability and other lawsuits. (As one comedian put it during the RNC, "they hate trial lawyers because they hate trials.")

No one has asked how many of the 151-plus claims the company filed while Cheney was Halliburton's CEO are "frivolous," but in August the Houston Chronicle slammed the company for deciding to sue retirees who complained about the company's termination of health insurance benefits. "It was a blunder on a par with the cattle industry's decision to sue Oprah Winfrey, or Fox News' lawsuit against author and liberal talk radio host Al Franken for using 'fair and balanced' in the title of his latest book."

Suspension and debarment are not unusual remedies for serious contractor abuse and corporate crime. After cooking the books, for example, Enron, WorldCom and Arthur Andersen were all suspended from federal contracts for a period of time.

But when it comes to the contractor abuses witnessed in Iraq, it seems like all has been forgiven. Even the most egregious cases have failed to result in a suspension. For example, CACI International received an extension of its contract even after its role in the Abu Ghraib prison scandal was revealed. There are at least 25 ongoing criminal investigations related to the Iraq reconstruction contracts. Wanna bet how many result in suspension?

$100 Bags of Laundry

22 July 2004

According to deYoung, KBR often sends invoices to the government even if no service is actually delivered. "I was verbally chastised," she said, when KBR executives found out she was giving "too much information" to Army personnel seeking justification for expenses. "The first example [of being chastised] was the laundry incident," she said, referring to the $100 laundry bags KBR's subcontractor had charged the military. In addition, when she informed Halliburton officials that the company charged the government $45 per case of soda, "They made it look like they didn't know how to do these things," she said.

<http://www.halliburtonwatch.org/news/deyoung.html>

Abandoned $85,000 Vehicles

"As every other trucker working on those convoys will tell you, KBR had virtually no facilities in place to do maintenance on these trucks. There were absolutely no oil filters or fuel filters for months on end. I begged for filters but never got any. I was told that oil changes were out of the question. KBR removed all the spare tires in Kuwait. So when one of our trucks got a flat tire on the highway, we just had to leave it there for the Iraqis to loot, which is just crazy. I remember saying to myself when it happened, 'You just lost yourself an $85,000 truck because of a spare tire. We lost a truck because we didn't have $25 hydraulic line to assist the clutch.'"

<http://www.corpwatch.org/article.php?id=11373>

The Halliburton Equipment Bonfires

Greenwald's film features footage of bonfires built to destroy improperly ordered vehicles, computers and other equipment that the contractors purchased at taxpayer expense -- since these contractors are compensated on a "cost-plus" basis, they get paid more for wasting money than saving it.

http://www.boingboing.net/2006/09/24/iraq_for_sale_docume.html

"Lost" Trucks, Office Furniture, and Computers

And that still ain't all. In another case of fraud, government auditors found Halliburton claimed to have lost over $60 million worth of government property in Iraq, including trucks, office furniture and computers.

<http://community.freespeech.org/node/3673>

Running (and Charging) for Empty Trucks

"The paperwork I carried had no details about the contents of our cargo - basically all they were looking for was the number of trucks with freight on them (but) a related problem was that KBR would run trucks empty quite often," Wilson said. "Sometimes they would have five empty trucks, sometimes they would have a dozen. One time we ran 28 trucks and only one had anything on it. There were several times when we had empty trucks both on the way to Anaconda and then on the way back to Cedar II. I don't understand why KBR would have placed our lives in danger that way for no reason."

Titan and the Less Than Literate Linguists

We learn that many of the Abu Ghraib interrogators were civilian employees of CACI, a private consulting firm, and were not accountable to the military chain of command. Titan, a company contracted to deliver linguists to the military, supposedly hired anybody off the street who could speak either Arabic or Farsi along with a little English.

(Some of these "linguists" reportedly could not read or write; hardly any had formal training.)

<http://www.salon.com/ent/movies/review/2006/09/28/btm/index1.html>

Titan Linguists: $657 Million Tab But Not Quite Up To Snuff

The Army command that hired San Diego's Titan Corp. to provide Arabic linguists to units in Iraq is evaluating whether the lucrative contract should be awarded to another company.

The evaluation under way at INSCOM, the Army's Intelligence & Security Command at Fort Belvoir, Va., is part of a five-year renewal process for the Army's worldwide linguist support services contract. INSCOM awarded the five-year contract in 1999.

The contract has come under increased scrutiny after revelations that civilian translators working for Titan were involved in the abuse and torture of Iraqi prisoners at the Abu Ghraib prison.

Titan has sought to renew the contract, which has become the company's single biggest revenue source. But competing bids for the linguist contract, valued at $657 million, have been submitted by Northrop Grumman, L3 Communications and Computer Sciences Corp.....

Some U.S. soldiers who worked with the translators in Iraq also have said that some of the Titan employees lacked sufficient experience and skill to serve as useful interpreters.

<http://www.corpwatch.org/article.php?id=11339>

Halliburton Used Truckers as 'Decoys' in Iraq, Resulting in Unnecessary Deaths

..... The trucks lacked armor plating, the drivers were unarmed, and Army reservist accompanied only some of the trucks. An August 2004 Army report found the convoy's guide had used his boot to draw a rough diagram of the route in the sand before the truckers left.

"The KBR drivers had no type of maps," the redacted report states. "Many of the drivers both military and KBR did not understand the route and knew only to follow the vehicle in front of them."

The lawsuit argues that KBR officials should have known that the convoy was headed into an "explosive war zone." Insurgents had attacked another convoy on the road just hours earlier, according to the lawsuit.

On the road, Johnson's convoy came under fire "from hundreds of enemy forces using women and children as shields," the lawsuit states. The attack left seven truckers and two soldiers dead or missing, and 11 other men wounded.

The lawsuit also accuses Halliburton of luring employees such as Johnson via deceptive advertising, which suggested that workers could earn as much as $ 200,000 but concealed the hazardous conditions in Iraq. One recruiting Web site assured civilian applicants that "with new heightened security, you'll be 100 percent safe."

Halliburton Drivers Sent into Danger Zones With No Maps

"I was reassured by KBR/Halliburton that I was not going to be a soldier but that I was a civilian - a 'non-combatant,'" New Mexico resident Edward Sanchez wrote in testimony to the Democratic Policy Committee. "I was told that we would not be sent into battles or areas of known attack. Unfortunately, KBR/Halliburton broke that promise."

Sanchez alleged that the company "never" provided the drivers with maps and asked people with no experience driving in a fuel truck convoy to do just that. In April 2004, Sanchez was with three of those inexperienced drivers when his convoy was attacked on the way to Baghdad International Airport.

"I heard one of the drivers crying on the radio, 'I'm hit, I'm hit!'" Sanchez recounted. "I heard another driver screaming, 'I'm burning!' Then the radio went silent."

"I was told that we would not be sent into battles or areas of known attack. Unfortunately, KBR/Halliburton broke that promise. "Sanchez himself was also shot. Six other employees were reportedly killed that day; another went missing and is presumed dead.

Calling Halliburton's actions "criminal," former KBR Civilian Convoy Commander Sean Larvenz testified that before Sanchez's convoy departed, he had warned company officials of the insurgent attacks on the road to the airport.

Halliburton Overcharged On Troops' Food

The Wall Street Journal reported that Halliburton "allegedly overcharged more than $16 million for meals at a single U.S. military base in Kuwait during the first seven months of last year, according to Pentagon investigators auditing the company's work... Because of the new meal-billing discrepancies, the Pentagon has extended its audit of KBR food services to include more than 50 other dining facilities in Kuwait and Iraq, according to an e-mail 'alert' sent [January 30, 2004] to more than a dozen U.S. Army contracting officials ... This dispute focuses on meals served at Camp Arifjan, the huge U.S. military base south of Kuwait City. The e-mail memo...said that in July [2003] alone, a Saudi subcontractor hired by KBR billed for 42,042 meals a day on average but served only 14,053 meals a day.

Making Peace with Halliburton's Best Efforts: Compared to the Sewage Failures -- What's a Little Mold?

From a Soldier:

"My life here is very different than I ever [e]xpected to be living that is for sure. I don't even know where to start. I also don't want you to feel bad for me when I tell you some of this stuff. First of all we hardly ever have hot water. That is when we still have water because they have to truck all of our water in from the local villages. Next the septic system here is set up for about half of the people that use it. That leads to the weak link which happens to be in the bathroom that is in my section of the berthing. You know what that means. That means that when she is full the overflow comes up our sinks and spreads poo all over the floor. Also with the water they test it and every time it comes up with ecoli. They had three kinds of bottled water here for us and two of the three kinds have bacteria in them. The last thing that bugs me about this place is there is all kinds of mold on the walls where we sleep. There is mold right next to my head through the whole night.

Private Employees Taking Over Jobs For Which US Soldiers Have Been Trained

EXCERPTS: Frontline Interview with Peter Singer

Author of:

Private Warriors: The Rise of the Privatized Military Industry

The reality of this, and the irony of it, is that we often talk about it in terms of economic cost savings, but there are no proven economic cost savings. There is simply no comprehensive study that we can look at and say that it has proven to save us money.

It's really been about political cost savings. It's been about avoiding the hard choices that come with deploying military forces. And the way to look at this is the counterfactuals: What would we have done otherwise? We would have either had to expand the regular force -- it would have had to either be with regular forces, or it would have had to be with Reserves. That's also politically unpopular, because that's more families that are upset, brunt of the war, etc. Also takes place within a presidential campaign season. Or we would have had to have brought in allies. Well, that's difficult, because you would have had to make political compromises with those allies that we weren't willing to make.

Or you bring in contractors. And by the way, contractors come with the extra positive externality from the perspective of the client here that if contractors are killed, wounded or go missing, they don't go on the public rolls. And so when we talk about the cost, they don't count in the public discussion of it.

We developed the classic Kafkaesque solution, which is we have a problem of outsourcing and coordinating outsourcing, and that we've done too much outsourcing, and we don't have a control over it, so what would be the solution to it? Let's outsource the solution. And so we hire another company to come in and coordinate it.

...

So we hire another company. Then you get to the question of well, who do you turn it over to? Would you go out and find the most talented company that has years and years of experience of this, a company that knows the ground in Iraq well, knows all the players? Would you do that?

Or would you hire a shell company that [is] not even on the list of recommended companies for Iraq that your own government is putting out and has never done this kind of work before? Well, we took the latter option and hired a company called Aegis, which was effectively a British shell company that was run by a fellow named Tim Spicer.

Now, what's interesting is Tim Spicer is a relative no-name in the U.S., but he's a huge name in the U.K. because he was involved in two major international scandals -- the arms-to-Africa scandal, which was this episode with his former company, Sandline, that was involved in some things going on in Sierra Leone, where they were hired there and in potential violation of arms embargos.

And it was this whole mess, and nearly brought down Tony Blair's foreign secretary, [who] nearly had to resign over it. Careers were ended, all this sort of thing. So [Spicer is a] big name from that.

And then [there was] another episode in Papua New Guinea, where his company was hired there to help fight in the civil war there, and local army mutinied and put Tim Spicer in jail. So this guy's a big name in Britain; we don't even know who the heck he is.

I think if you or I looked at these numbers -- and that's the reason why we're not allowed to look at them -- we would find so much fluff within them, because remember, you've got at the employee level someone who's making anywhere from two to 10 times more than a U.S. soldier is making. And that guy is certainly not getting what the company is being paid.

And remember, that company is often three, four, five levels of subcontractors down. And each of those layers isn't taking it at a loss or isn't taking it at no cost. They're adding their own operating margin in there.

And remember, all these companies are staffing up not only those operations, but the entire organization around them, the lobbying efforts around it, the marketing, the real estate, you name it. And so there's so much fluff built into this process that there's no way to argue that it's about cost savings.

And what you have to worry about is when you look at the history of warfare as a whole, when large wars end, you often see soldiers search out work in other areas, which helps feed conflicts in other areas.

...

And so that's what we have to worry [about], is that a lot of these new guys that have entered the market in Iraq may end up searching out work in other areas.

[T]hey've found that it's super-profitable.]

Families Sue Blackwater Over Deaths in Fallujah

Survivors of four Blackwater Security Consulting contractors who were killed and mutilated last year in Iraq sued the Moyock-based company Wednesday, saying it cut corners that led to the men's deaths.

The families contend in the state civil lawsuit that the workers were sent into Fallujah, Iraq, without proper equipment and personnel to defend the supply convoy they were guarding.

"The fact that these four Americans found themselves located in the high-risk, war-torn city of Fallujah without armored vehicles, automatic weapons and fewer than the minimum number of team members was no accident," the lawsuit said. "Instead, this team was sent out without the required equipment and personnel by those in charge at Blackwater."

The lawsuit alleges that one week before the deaths, Blackwater fired a project manager who had insisted that the contractors use armored vehicles. Eliminating the armored vehicles saved Blackwater $1.5 million, the lawsuit says.

Blackwater Hires Kenneth Starr to Fight the Fallujah Lawsuit

"The new 'counsel of record' for the North Carolina-based company is none other than former Whitewater investigator Kenneth Starr—the independent counsel in the 1999 impeachment of President Bill Clinton over the Monica Lewinsky sex scandal," Jeremy Scahill and Garrett Ordower reported online October 26, 2006, in The Nation. "Starr was brought in last week by Blackwater to file motions in front of the US Supreme Court in a case stemming from the killing of four Blackwater contractors in the Iraqi city of Fallujah on March 31, 2004."

"There are undeniable benefits to having Starr, the US Solicitor General under President George H.W. Bush, represent Blackwater—a highly partisan GOP company—in front of a Supreme Court stacked with Bush appointees. Starr also has a personal connection to Blackwater. Starr and Joseph Schmitz, the general counsel and chief operating officer of Blackwater's parent company, the Prince Group, have both worked closely with the arch-conservative Washington Legal Foundation. Since 1993 Starr has served on the legal policy advisory board of the organization for which Schmitz has frequently acted as a spokesperson and attorney," Scahill and Ordower wrote.

Halliburton and Cryptosporidium Contamination

According to some reports, raw water is taken from the Euphrates River at a point less than two miles downstream of a human sewage discharge point. There are likely to be other human and animal fecal discharges into this major river. If this is correct, like many rivers in the United States and around the world that receive runoff and sewage discharges, the raw water from the Euphrates is likely to be contaminated by a variety of disease-causing organisms, ranging from total coliform, E. Coli and other bacteria, to viruses and hardy protozoa like Giardia and Cryptosporidium.

These disease-causing organisms can cause a wide variety of symptoms, including diarrhea, nausea, vomiting, headaches, fever, lightheadedness, and in the event of serious infections can sometimes cause kidney failure and death.

Workers Allege Halliburton Knew Their Water Was Foul

By Larry Margasak
Associated Press

Halliburton, the company formerly headed by Vice President Cheney, disputes the allegations about water problems at Camp Junction City, in Ramadi, even though they were made by its own employees and documented in company e-mails.

"We exposed a base camp population (military and civilian) to a water source that was not treated," said a July 15, 2005, memo written by William Granger, the official for Halliburton's KBR subsidiary who was in charge of water quality in Iraq and Kuwait.

Ben Carter, Halliburton's former water-treatment expert at Camp Junction City, said he discovered the problem last March, a statement confirmed by his e-mail the day after he tested the water.

...

The first memo on the problem -- written by Carter to Halliburton officials on March 24, 2005 -- was an "incident report" from tests Carter performed the previous day.

"It is my opinion that the water source is without question contaminated with numerous micro-organisms, including Coliform bacteria," Carter wrote. "There is little doubt that raw sewage is routinely dumped upstream of intake much less than the required 2 mile distance.

"Therefore, it is my conclusion that chlorination of our water tanks while certainly beneficial is not sufficient protection from parasitic exposure."

Carter said he resigned in early April after Halliburton officials did not take any action to inform the camp population.

The water expert said he told company officials at the base that they would have to notify the military. "They told me it was none of my concern and to keep my mouth shut," he said.

Halliburton Gave Troops Foul Water, Workers Say

By Vicki Allen | January 23, 2006

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - A Halliburton Co. subsidiary provided water to U.S. troops at a camp in Iraq that was twice as contaminated as water from the Euphrates River, former employees of the company said on Monday.

The subsidiary, Kellogg Brown and Root, also blocked employees' attempts to inform the U.S. military at Camp Junction City in Ramadi that the water was foul or tell them that water tanks should immediately be chlorinated, the workers said.

8.13 Torture at Abu Ghraib

American Soldiers Brutalized Iraqis

How far up does the responsibility go?
by Seymour M. Hersh

In the era of Saddam Hussein, Abu Ghraib, twenty miles west of Baghdad, was one of the world's most notorious prisons, with torture, weekly executions, and vile living conditions. As many as fifty thousand men and women—no accurate count is possible—were jammed into Abu Ghraib at one time, in twelve-by-twelve-foot cells that were little more than human holding pits.

In the looting that followed the regime's collapse, last April, the huge prison complex, by then deserted, was stripped of everything that could be removed, including doors, windows, and bricks. The coalition authorities had the floors tiled, cells cleaned and repaired, and toilets, showers, and a new medical center added. Abu Ghraib was now a U.S. military prison. Most of the prisoners, however—by the fall there were several thousand, including women and teenagers—were civilians, many of whom had been picked up in random military sweeps and at highway checkpoints. They fell into three loosely defined categories: common criminals; security detainees suspected of "crimes against the coalition;" and a small number of suspected "high-value" leaders of the insurgency against the coalition forces.

Last June [2003], Janis Karpinski, an Army reserve brigadier general, was named commander of the 800th Military Police Brigade and put in charge of military prisons in Iraq.

General Karpinski, who had wanted to be a soldier since she was five, is a business consultant in civilian life, and was enthusiastic about her new job. In an interview last December with the St. Petersburg Times, she said that, for many of the Iraqi inmates at Abu Ghraib, "living conditions now are better in prison than at home. At one point we were concerned that they wouldn't want to leave."

A month later, General Karpinski was formally admonished and quietly suspended, and a major investigation into the Army's prison system, authorized by Lieutenant General Ricardo S. Sanchez, the senior commander in Iraq, was under way. A fifty-three-page report, obtained by The New Yorker, written by Major General Antonio M. Taguba and not meant for public release, was completed in late February. Its conclusions about the institutional failures of the Army prison system were devastating.

The photographs tell it all. In one, Private England, a cigarette dangling from her mouth, is giving a jaunty thumbs-up sign and pointing at the genitals of a young Iraqi, who is naked except for a sandbag over his head, as he masturbates. Three other hooded and naked Iraqi prisoners are shown, hands reflexively crossed over their genitals. A fifth prisoner has his hands at his sides. In another, England stands arm in arm with Specialist Graner; both are grinning and giving the thumbs-up behind a cluster of perhaps seven naked Iraqis, knees bent, piled clumsily on top of each other in a pyramid. There is another photograph of a cluster of naked prisoners, again piled in a pyramid. Near them stands Graner, smiling, his arms crossed; a woman soldier stands in front of him, bending over, and she, too, is smiling. Then, there is another cluster of hooded bodies, with a female soldier standing in front, taking photographs. Yet another photograph shows a kneeling, naked, unhooded male prisoner, head momentarily turned away from the camera, posed to make it appear that he is performing oral sex on another male prisoner, who is naked and hooded.

Children Raped at Abu Ghraib, Pentagon has Videos

http://stream.realimpact.net/?file=clints/aclu/conf2004_aclu_AmericaAtACrossroads_300.rm

.....of Seymour Hersh speaking at an ACLU event. He says the US government has videotapes of children being raped at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq.

"Some of the worst things that happened you don't know about, okay? Videos, um, there are women there. Some of you may have read that they were passing letters out, communications out to their men. This is at Abu Ghraib ... The women were passing messages out saying 'Please come and kill me, because of what's happened' and basically what happened is that those women who were arrested with young boys, children in cases that have been recorded. The boys were sodomized with the cameras rolling. And the worst above all of that is the soundtrack of the boys shrieking that your government has. They are in total terror. It's going to come out."

By Joan Walsh

"..... Although the photos are a disturbing visual account of particular incidents inside Abu Ghraib prison, they should not be viewed as representing the sum total of what occurred. As the Schlesinger report states in its convoluted prose: "We do know that some of the egregious abuses at Abu Ghraib which were not photographed did occur during interrogation sessions and that abuses during interrogation sessions occurred elsewhere." Also, the documentation doesn't include many details about the detainees who were abused and tortured at Abu Ghraib. While the International Committee of the Red Cross report from February 2004 cited military intelligence officers as estimating that "between 70 to 90 percent of persons deprived of their liberty in Iraq had been arrested by mistake," much remains unknown about the detainees abused in the "hard site" where the Army housed violent and dangerous detainees and where much of the abuse took place.

Finally, it's critical to recognize that this set of images from Abu Ghraib is only one snapshot of systematic tactics the United States has used in four-plus years of the global war on terror. There have been many allegations of abuse, torture and other practices that violate international law, from holding prisoners without charging them at Guantánamo Bay and other secretive U.S. military bases and prison facilities around the world to the practice of "rendition," or the transporting of detainees to foreign countries whose regimes use torture, to ongoing human rights violations inside detention facilities in Iraq. Abu Ghraib in fall 2003 may have been its own particular hell, but the variations of individual abuse perpetrated appear to be exceptional in only one way: They were photographed and filmed."

Abu Ghraib Abuse Firms Are Rewarded

As Prison Ringleader Awaits Sentence, Defence Contractors Win Multi-Million Pentagon Contracts

by Peter Beaumont, Foreign Affairs Editor Sunday January 16, 2005
The Observer

Two US defence contractors being sued over allegations of abuse at Abu Ghraib prison have been awarded valuable new contracts by the Pentagon, despite demands that they should be barred from any new government work.

Three employees of CACI International and Titan - working at Abu Ghraib as civilian contractors - were separately accused of abusive behaviour.

The report on the Abu Ghraib scandal implicated three civilian contractors in the abuses: Steven Stefanowicz from CACI International and John Israel and Adel Nakhla from Titan.

Stefanowicz was charged with giving orders that 'equated to physical abuse,' Israel of lying under oath and Nakhla of raping an Iraqi boy.

It was also alleged that CACI interrogators used dogs to scare prisoners, placed detainees in unauthorised 'stress positions' and encouraged soldiers to abuse prisoners. Titan employees, it has been alleged, hit detainees and stood by while soldiers physically abused prisoners.

Investigators also discovered systemic problems of management and training -- including the fact that a third of CACI International's staff at Abu Ghraib had never received formal military interrogation training.

Despite demands by human rights groups in the US that the two companies be barred from further contracts in Iraq - where CACI alone employed almost half of all interrogators and analysts at Abu Ghraib - CACI International has been awarded a $16 million renewal of its contract. Titan, meanwhile, has been awarded a new contract worth $164 million.

Military, Intelligence and Law Enforcement Officers Opposing Torture

Rear Admiral (ret.) John Hutson, former Judge Advocate General for the Navy

"The United States has been a strong, unwavering advocate for human rights and the rule of law for as long as you and I have been alive. I'm not ready to throw in the towel on that just because we are in a battle with some terrible people. In fact, in a war like this, when we are tempted to respond in kind, we must hold ever more dearly to the values that make us Americans. Torture, or "cruel, inhuman or degrading" conduct, are not part of our national character. Another objection is that torture doesn't work. All the literature and experts say that if we really want usable information, we should go exactly the opposite way and try to gain the trust and confidence of the prisoners. Torture will get you information, but it's not reliable. Eventually, if you don't accidentally kill them first, torture victims will tell you something just to make you stop. It may or may not be true. If you torture 100 people, you'll get 100 different stories. If you gain the confidence of 100 people, you may get one valuable story." (Legal Affairs "Debate Club" January 27, 2005)

Bob Baer, former CIA official

"And torture -- I just don't think it really works. I think it works for the Egyptians, the Syrians, the Saudis, who want to scare the hell out of people. But you don't get the truth. What happens when you torture people is, they figure out what you want to hear and they tell you." (Interview with Slate, May 12, 2004)

Lawrence Korb, former Naval Intelligence officer and Assistant Secretary of Defense during the Reagan Administration

"The highest levels of the U.S. military, the Defense Department, and the White House must be held accountable for putting our troops at greater risk and diminishing America's moral authority across the globe." (Article co-written by John Halpin, Center for American Progress)

Michael Scheuer, formerly a senior CIA official in the Counter-Terrorism Center

"I personally think that any information gotten through extreme methods of torture would probably be pretty useless because it would be someone telling you what you wanted to hear." (60 minutes "CIA flying suspects to Torture?" March 6, 2005)

Dan Coleman, retired FBI agent

"It's human nature. People don't cooperate with you unless they have some reason to." He added, "Brutalization doesn't work. We know that. Besides, you lose your soul." (The New Yorker "Outsourcing Torture" by Jane Mayer)

Army Field Manual 34-52 Chapter 1

"The use of force, mental torture, threats, insults, or exposure to unpleasant and inhumane treatment of any kind is prohibited by law and is neither authorized nor condoned by the US Government. Experience indicates that the use of force is not necessary to gain the cooperation of sources for interrogation. Therefore, the use of force is a poor technique, as it yields unreliable results, may damage subsequent collection efforts, and can induce the source to say whatever he thinks the interrogator wants to hear."

Declassified FBI e-mail dated May 10, 2004, responding to the question of whether FBI in agents Guantanamo agents were instructed to "stand clear" due to interrogation techniques utilized by Department of Defense and Department of Homeland Security

"Our formal guidance has always been that all personnel conduct themselves in interviews in the manner that they would in the field. <redacted> along with the FBI advised that the LEA [Law Enforcement Agencies] at GTMO were not in the practice of the using <redacted> and were of the opinion results obtained from these interrogations were suspect at best. BAU explained to DoD, FBI has been successful for many years obtaining confessions via non-confrontational interviewing techniques."

Why Torture Doesn't Work

By Brig. Gen. David R. Irvine,
AlterNet. Posted November 22, 2005.

When the Wall Street Journal came out in favor of abusive interrogation, it turned a blind eye on reason in favor of supporting the White House line.

Remarkably, of the nation's major newspapers, only the Wall Street Journal has editorialized in support of torture as a useful tool of American intelligence policy. Regrettably, that position does a huge disservice to the nation and its soldiers. There are really only three issues in this debate, and the Journal carefully turned a blind eye to all three: (1) is torture reliable, (2) is it consistent with America's values and Constitution, and (3) does it best serve our national interests?

No one has yet offered any validated evidence that torture produces reliable intelligence. While torture apologists frequently make the claim that torture saves lives, that assertion is directly contradicted by many Army, FBI, and CIA professionals who have actually interrogated al Qaeda captives. Exhibit A is the torture-extracted confession of Ibn al-Shaykh al-Libi, an al Qaeda captive who told the CIA in 2001, having been "rendered" to the tender mercies of Egypt, that Saddam Hussein had trained al Qaeda to use WMD. It appears that this confession was the only information upon which, in late 2002, the president, the vice president, and the secretary of state repeatedly claimed that "credible evidence" supported that claim, even though a now-declassified Defense Intelligence Agency report from February 2002 questioned the reliability of the confession because it was likely obtained under torture. In January 2004, al-Libi recanted his "confession," and a month later, the CIA recalled all intelligence reports based on his statements.

Exhibit B is the case of Manadel al-Jamadi, an Iraqi deemed a "high-value" target by the CIA. After being beaten to an extent that he had several broken ribs, he was subjected to a form of crucifixion known as "Palestinian hanging." Forty-five minutes later, he was dead, never having revealed whatever vital, ticking-bomb information his American interrogator was seeking.

If there is reliable evidence that torture has, in fact, interrupted ticking time bombs and saved lives, the gravity of the crisis created by the administration's free-wheeling torture policy demands straight answers which can be weighed and evaluated by a bipartisan, blue-ribbon commission whose membership might include interrogators, jurists, theologians, national security specialists, military leaders, and political leaders. The damage to our national interests and the dismal record of war candor by this administration has made "trust us" an insufficient justification for such a profound change in American law and moral values.

The Journal claims that Abu Ghraib was an anomaly -- that it has become a "torture narrative" that erroneously blames the CIA for the abuses depicted in the infamous photographs. The Schlesinger report was cited for the conclusion that the perpetrators were merely a group of sadistic, poorly trained Reservists. This argument, however begs the question; the rationale for the McCain amendment rests not upon Abu Ghraib, but upon the cascading stream of documented reports from other places in Afghanistan and Iraq in which brutal torture has been either authorized or winked at by several different military and civilian chains of command.

The Journal further distorts the facts by arguing that techniques such as waterboarding (which induces the sensation of drowning), leaving prisoners outdoors in freezing weather, and stress positions which can cause suffocation and collapse, are not really "torture," but are just "psychological techniques designed to break a detainee." There is, certainly, a psychological component to torture, but the real issue is whether what's done causes severe physical or mental pain or suffering. Of the crucifixion form of "psychological" pressure which the CIA worked upon Jamadi, one of the soldiers who cut him down said he had never seen anyone's arms positioned like that; "[I] was surprised they didn't just pop out of their sockets."

The U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops has endorsed the McCain amendments, and declared, "In the face of this perilous climate, our nation must not embrace a morality based on an attitude that 'desperate times call for desperate measures.' There can be no compromise on the moral imperative to protect the basic human rights of any individual incarcerated for any reason." Our embrace of torture is completely inconsistent with our commitment to equal justice and the rule of law.

The Journal assumes that only the worst of the worst will be subjected to torture when it comes to ticking time bombs. Not only is that assumption unfounded, based upon the widespread abuses in Iraq, it was tried and abandoned by the Israelis. Because it is impossible to confirm with advance certainty what any suspect actually knows, ticking bomb torture can be justified in virtually every interrogation. When Israel experimented with "torture lite," supposedly reserved for ticking-bomb circumstances, it was not long before 85 percent of all Palestinian detainees were being given the harshest treatment allowed. The capability to finely calibrate torture has eluded every democratic government which has tried it.

The inescapable fact is that America's standing in the world, and especially in the Middle East, has never been lower. The price we have paid for our misdirected torture policies has been incalculable. The Arab street may not always grasp the finer points of separation of powers or proportional representation; but everyone, everywhere, comprehends hypocrisy, and judges us for ours. If the torture advocates truly believe that the value of violently coerced information has been worth the plummeting drop in America's world stature, or that such information is worth the clear and present endangerment of captured Americans, it's time to justify the claimed value of torture to the nation in whose name it's being done. Not assumptions, not generalizations, not, "I can't explain because it's classified."

The president and vice president wish to chart a course of heretofore unacceptable savagery toward anyone even suspected of terrorism. If we are to become a nation where a president may torture anyone he wishes, it deserves a broad, sober, fact-based national debate.

Torture Doesn't Work

It Erodes National Security and Democracy

By Alison Brysk

November 14, 2007

San Diego - A morally bankrupt foreign policy. A degeneration of democratic checks and balances.

Those are just a few of the disturbing facets of the state of the US government revealed by the debates over the confirmation of Attorney General Michael Mukasey and his views on whether waterboarding constitutes torture.

But the deepest irony of the Bush administration's ambivalent stance on such medieval tactics – practiced in the name of defending national security – is that torture is not only wrong, it's also a stupid strategy that undermines the defense of democratic societies against terror.

US leaders must correct their profoundly mistaken analysis and ignorance of the lessons of history about torture.

Torture is an ineffective counterinsurgency strategy. One defense of torture is the "ticking bomb" scenario – the idea that an imminent, massive threat to civilians might be stopped by a single detainee who possesses crucial information and will yield actionable intelligence under physical coercion. But this is mostly a law-school legend, not a frequent occurrence in a complex conflict with multiple levels of planning and diffuse local support.

Despite fearful anecdotal claims, the effectiveness of torture in generating intelligence is questionable at best. But we do know that torture produces many false confessions and new enemies, and distracts from more effective, legitimate techniques of interrogation and intelligence-gathering. We also know that democracies that have turned to torture in counterinsurgency – for example, the French in Algeria – have lost, while the British found a solution in Northern Ireland after they gave up abusive tactics.

Torture escalates conflict. The use of torture by targeted societies is strongly associated with an increase in the severity of terror used against them. In interviews with imprisoned terror leaders from the Palestinian territories to India, they state that they adopted and were supported in bloodier tactics when democratic enemies resorted to torture and attacks on civilians.

The "torture-terror nexus" can be seen in Israel. The first intifada was militant but largely peaceful, while the second intifada was characterized by suicide bombings. The tough Israeli response to the first, which an Israeli inquiry showed involved the mistreatment of about 85 percent of Palestinian prisoners, appears to have temporarily suppressed one uprising while planting the seeds of greater violence in the next.

Torture blocks international cooperation against terror among valuable democratic allies. America's adoption of illicit tactics has undermined the legal cooperation that is our best weapon against transnational terror. In Germany, an important prosecution of a terror suspect was handicapped because US evidence gathered in Guantánamo was legally inadmissible.

A Spanish prosecutor has stated that he is unable to order extraditions to the US, as a country that violates Spanish legal guarantees.

In Afghanistan, Canadian and Dutch forces holding critical contested areas are not permitted to release Afghan captives to US facilities where they might be mistreated, deported to Guantánamo, or "rendered" to abusive countries. This policy came into effect after pressure from the Dutch parliament and Canadian courts, on behalf of outraged democratic publics.

Torture drives out legitimate policing. Preventing terrorism is a question of good police work, built on strong ties with the communities that host insurgents, sophisticated knowledge of criminal networks, and swift cooperation among agencies and allies. But current US tactics alienate global publics and local communities, while the secrecy torture requires fosters bureaucratic bungling. Frustrated FBI and military intelligence professionals have resigned, citing sloppy and illegal coercive interrogations by an unaccountable collection of reservists, military police, CIA agents, and private contractors.

Torture undermines the rule of law and corrupts democratic institutions. Democracy is the system the US is fighting to defend. It is also the best defense of US national security – like the rule-of-law strategy that has enabled the United Kingdom to forestall some attacks.

Similarly, America's credibility in promoting democratic reform among unstable front-line allies such as Pakistan depends on honoring its international commitments such as the Convention Against Torture. US commanders believe that adherence to the Geneva Conventions helps ensure the safety of the troops. Democracies that use torture become less democratic, as illicit interrogations are hidden from public view, outsourced to unaccountable special services, diverted to parallel legal systems such as special tribunals, and removed from congressional checks on executive power.

The authorization of, or acquiescence to torture, by US senators is a betrayal of the Constitution they have sworn to defend. It defies the wishes of the majority of Americans of conscience, and it compromises US national security. We must demand that our elected leaders not pander to the politics of fear, but rather meet their responsibility to provide an intelligent, sustainable, and humane national defense.

The Malignancy of Torture

Amy Goodman of Democracy Now interviewed author Alfred McCoy regarding the Bush Administration's sanction of torture.

Excerpt:

Alfred McCoy: [...] There's an absolute ban on torture for a very good reason. Torture taps into the deepest recesses, unexplored recesses of human consciousness, where creation and destruction coexist, where the infinite human capacity for kindness and infinite human capacity for cruelty coexist, and it has a powerful perverse appeal. And once it starts, both the perpetrators and the powerful who order them, let it spread, and it spreads out of control.

When the Bush administration gave those orders for techniques tantamount to torture at the start of the war on terror, I think it was probably their intention that these be limited to top al-Qaida suspects. But within months, we were torturing hundreds of Afghans at Bagram near Kabul. A few months later in 2003, through these techniques, we were torturing literally thousands of Iraqis. You can see in those photos, beyond the details of the techniques that we've described, you can see how that once it starts, it becomes this Dantesque hell, this kind of play palace of the darkest recesses of human consciousness. That's why it's necessary to maintain an absolute prohibition on torture. There is no such thing as a little bit of torture.

Amy Goodman: Professor McCoy, when you started seeing these images, the first photos that came out at Abu Ghraib, the pictures we showed of the hooded man, electrodes coming out of his fingers, standing on the box, your response?

AM: The reason I wrote this book is when that photo came out in April 2004 on CBS news, at the Times, William Safire, for example, writing in the New York Times said this was the work of creeps. Later on, Defense Secretary Schlesinger said that this was just abuse by a few people on the night shift. There was another phrase: "Recycled hillbillies from Cumberland, Maryland." In other words, this was the bad apple thesis. We could blame these bad apples. I looked at those photos, I didn't see individual abuse. What I saw was two textbook, trademark C.I.A. psychological interrogation techniques: self-inflicted pain and sensory disorientation.

AG: And that bombardment of sound is often joked about. "Oh, we played Britney Spears really loud," or whatever it is.

AM: That's one of the problems of talking about this topic in the United States. We regard all of this panoply of psychological techniques as "torture lite," as somehow not really torture. We're the only country in the world that does that. The U.N. convention defines torture as the infliction of severe psychological or physical pain. The U.N. convention which bans torture in 1984 gives equal weight to psychological and physical techniques. We alone as a society somehow exempt all of these psychological techniques.

Back in the early 1990s, the United States was emerging from the Cold War, and we began this process of disarming ourselves and trying to sort of bring ourselves in line with the rest of the international community. President Clinton sent the U.N. Anti-Torture Convention to the U.S. Congress for ratification in 1994; he included four detailed paragraphs of reservation that had been drafted by the Reagan administration. He adopted them without so much as changing a semicolon. When you read those detailed paragraphs of reservation, what you realize is that the United States Congress ratified the treaty, but basically we outlawed only physical torture. Those paragraphs of reservation are carefully written to avoid one word in the 26 printed pages of the U.N. convention. That word is "mental." Basically, we exempted psychological torture.

AG: You wrote a piece, "Why the McCain Torture Ban Won't Work: The Bush Legacy of Legalized Torture."

AM: Most Americans think that it's over, that in December 2005, the U.S. Congress passed the Detainee Treatment Act 2005, which bars all inhumane or cruel treatment. Actually, what has happened is the Bush administration fought that amendment tooth and nail; they fought it with loopholes. Vice President Cheney went to Sen. McCain and asked for a specific exemption for the C.I.A. McCain refused. The National Security Advisor went to McCain and asked for certain kinds of exemptions for the C.I.A. He refused.

So then they started amending it. Basically what happened is, through the process, they introduced loopholes. President Bush said right on Sept. 11, 2001, when he addressed the nation, "I don't care what the international lawyers say. We're going to kick some ass." Those were his words, and then it was up to his legal advisors in the White House and the Justice Department to translate his otherwise unlawful orders into legal directives, and they did it by crafting three very controversial legal principles.

One, that the president, as commander-in-chief, could override laws and treaties. Two, that there was a possible defense for C.I.A. interrogators who engage in torture, and the defenses were of two kinds. First of all, they played around with the word "severe," that torture is the infliction of severe pain. That's when Jay Bybee, who was assistant attorney general, wrote that memo in which he said, "'severe' means equivalent to organ failure," in other words, right up to the point of death. The other thing was that they came up with the idea of intentionality. If a C.I.A. interrogator tortured, but the aim was information, not pain, then he could say that he was not guilty.

The third principle, which was crafted by John Yoo, was Guantánamo is not part of the United States; it is exempt from the writ of U.S. courts. Now, in the process of passing the McCain's ban on inhumane treatment, the White House has cleverly twisted the legislation to reestablish these three key principles. In his signing statement on December 30, President Bush said ...

AG: This was the statement that he signed as he signed the McCain so-called ban on torture?

AM: Right, he emailed it at 8 o'clock at night from his ranch in Crawford on December 30th, that he was signing this legislation into law. He said, "I reserve the right, as commander-in-chief and as head of the unitary executive, to do what I need to do to defend America." The next thing that happened is that McCain, as a compromise, inserted into the legislation a provision that if a C.I.A. operative engages in inhumane treatment or torture but believes that he or she was following a lawful order, then that's a defense.

So they got the second principle, defense for C.I.A. torturers. The third principle is that the White House had Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina amend McCain's amendment by inserting language into it, saying that for the purposes of this act, the U.S. Navy base at Guantánamo Bay is not on U.S. territory.

In the last month, the Bush administration has gone to federal courts and said, "Drop all of your habeas corpus suits from Guantánamo." There are 160 of them. They've gone to the Supreme Court and said, "Drop your Guantánamo case." They have, in fact, used that law to quash legal oversight of their actions.

Torture and the White House: The Green Light

As the first anniversary of 9/11 approached, and a prized Guantánamo detainee wouldn't talk, the Bush administration's highest-ranking lawyers argued for extreme interrogation techniques, circumventing international law, the Geneva Conventions, and the army's own Field Manual. The attorneys would even fly to Guantánamo to ratchet up the pressure — then blame abuses on the military. Philippe Sands follows the torture trail, and holds out the possibility of war crimes charges.

[NOTE: Emphasis added throughout]

The abuse, rising to the level of torture, of those captured and detained in the war on terror is a defining feature of the presidency of George W. Bush. Its military beginnings, however, lie not in Abu Ghraib, as is commonly thought, or in the "rendition" of prisoners to other countries for questioning, but in the treatment of the very first prisoners at Guantánamo. Starting in late 2002 a detainee bearing the number 063 was tortured over a period of more than seven weeks. In his story lies the answer to a crucial question: How was the decision made to let the U.S. military start using coercive interrogations at Guantánamo?

The Bush administration has always taken refuge behind a "trickle up" explanation: that is, the decision was generated by military commanders and interrogators on the ground. This explanation is false. The origins lie in actions taken at the very highest levels of the administration—by some of the most senior personal advisers to the president, the vice president, and the secretary of defense.

At the heart of the matter stand several political appointees—lawyers—who, it can be argued, broke their ethical codes of conduct and took themselves into a zone of international criminality, where formal investigation is now a very real option. This is the story of how the torture at Guantánamo began, and how it spread.

“Crying. Angry. Yelled for Allah.”

One day last summer I sat in a garden in London with Dr. Abigail Seltzer, a psychiatrist who specializes in trauma victims. She divides her time between Great Britain’s National Health Service, where she works extensively with asylum seekers and other refugees, and the Medical Foundation for the Care of Victims of Torture. It was uncharacteristically warm, and we took refuge in the shade of some birches. On a table before us were three documents. The first was a November 2002 “action memo” written by William J. (Jim) Haynes II, the general counsel of the U.S. Department of Defense, to his boss, Donald Rumsfeld; the document is sometimes referred to as the Haynes Memo. Haynes recommended that Rumsfeld give “blanket approval” to 15 out of 18 proposed techniques of aggressive interrogation. Rumsfeld duly did so, on December 2, 2002, signing his name firmly next to the word “Approved.” Under his signature he also scrawled a few words that refer to the length of time a detainee can be forced to stand during interrogation: “I stand for 8–10 hours a day. Why is standing limited to 4 hours?”

The second document on the table listed the 18 proposed techniques of interrogation, all of which went against long-standing U.S. military practice as presented in the Army Field Manual. The 15 approved techniques included certain forms of physical contact and also techniques intended to humiliate and to impose sensory deprivation. They permitted the use of stress positions, isolation, hooding, 20-hour interrogations, and nudity. Haynes and Rumsfeld explicitly did not rule out the future use of three other techniques, one of which was waterboarding, the application of a wet towel and water to induce the perception of drowning.

The third document was an internal log that detailed the interrogation at Guantánamo of a man identified only as Detainee 063, whom we now know to be Mohammed al-Qahtani, allegedly a member of the 9/11 conspiracy and the so-called 20th hijacker. According to this log, the interrogation commenced on November 23, 2002, and continued until well into January. The techniques described by the log as having been used in the interrogation of Detainee 063 include all 15 approved by Rumsfeld.

“Was the detainee abused? Was he tortured?” I asked Seltzer. Cruelty, humiliation, and the use of torture on detainees have long been prohibited by international law, including the Geneva Conventions and their Common Article 3. This total ban was reinforced in 1984 with the adoption of the Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, which criminalizes torture and complicity in torture.

A careful and fastidious practitioner, Seltzer declined to give a straight yes or no answer. In her view the definition of torture is essentially a legal matter, which will turn on a particular set of facts. She explained that there is no such thing as a medical definition of torture, and that a doctor must look for pathology, the abnormal functioning of the body or the mind. We reviewed the definition of torture, as set out in the 1984 Convention, which is binding on 145 countries, including the United States. Torture includes “any act by which severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, is intentionally inflicted on a person.”

Seltzer had gone through the interrogation log, making notations. She used four different colors to highlight moments that struck her as noteworthy, and the grim document now looked bizarrely festive. Yellow indicated episodes of abusive treatment. Pink showed where the detainee’s rights were respected—where he was fed or given a break, or allowed to sleep. Green indicated the many instances of medical involvement, where al-Qahtani was given an enema or was hospitalized suffering from hypothermia. Finally, blue identified what Seltzer termed “expressions of distress.”

We talked about the methods of interrogation. “In terms of their effects,” she said, “I suspect that the individual techniques are less important than the fact that they were used over an extended period of time, and that several appear to be used together: in other words, the cumulative effect.” Detainee 063 was subjected to systematic sleep deprivation. He was shackled and cuffed; at times, head restraints were used. He was compelled to listen to threats to his family. The interrogation leveraged his sensitivities as a Muslim: he was shown pictures of scantily clad models, was touched by a female interrogator, was made to stand naked, and was forcibly shaved. He was denied the right to pray. A psychiatrist who witnessed the interrogation of Detainee 063 reported the use of dogs, intended to intimidate “by getting the dogs close to him and then having the dogs bark or act aggressively on command.” The temperature was changed, and 063 was subjected to extreme cold. Intravenous tubes were forced into his body, to provide nourishment when he would not eat or drink.

We went through the marked-up document slowly, pausing at each blue mark. Detainee 063’s reactions were recorded with regularity. I’ll string some of them together to convey the impression:

Detainee began to cry. Visibly shaken. Very emotional. Detainee cried. Disturbed. Detainee began to cry. Detainee bit the IV tube completely in two. Started moaning. Uncomfortable. Moaning. Began crying hard spontaneously. Crying and praying. Very agitated. Yelled. Agitated and violent. Detainee spat. Detainee proclaimed his innocence. Whining. Dizzy. Forgetting things. Angry. Upset. Yelled for Allah.

The blue highlights went on and on.

Urinated on himself. Began to cry. Asked God for forgiveness. Cried. Cried. Became violent. Began to cry. Broke down and cried. Began to pray and openly cried. Cried out to Allah several times. Trembled uncontrollably.

Was Detainee 063 subjected to severe mental pain or suffering? Torture is not a medical concept, Seltzer reminded me. “That said,” she went on, “over the period of 54 days there is enough evidence of distress to indicate that it would be very surprising indeed if it had not reached the threshold of severe mental pain.” She thought about the matter a little more and then presented it a different way: “If you put 12 clinicians in a room and asked them about this interrogation log, you might get different views about the effect and long-term consequences of these interrogation techniques. But I doubt that any one of them would claim that this individual had not suffered severe mental distress at the time of his interrogation, and possibly also severe physical distress.”

The Authorized Version

The story of the Bush administration’s descent down this path began to emerge on June 22, 2004. The administration was struggling to respond to the Abu Ghraib scandal, which had broken a couple of months earlier with the broadcast of photographs that revealed sickening abuse at the prison outside Baghdad. The big legal guns were wheeled out. Alberto Gonzales and Jim Haynes stepped into a conference room at the Eisenhower Executive Office Building, next to the White House. Gonzales was President Bush’s White House counsel and would eventually become attorney general. Haynes, as Rumsfeld’s general counsel, was the most senior lawyer in the Pentagon, a position he would retain until a month ago, when he resigned—“returning to private life,” as a press release stated. Gonzales and Haynes were joined by a third lawyer, Daniel Dell’Orto, a career official at the Pentagon. Their task was to steady the beat and make it clear that the events at Abu Ghraib were the actions of a few bad eggs and had nothing to do with the broader policies of the administration.

Gonzales and Haynes spoke from a carefully prepared script. They released a thick folder of documents, segmented by lawyerly tabs. These documents were being made public for the first time, a clear indication of the gravity of the political crisis. Among the documents were the Haynes Memo and the list of 18 techniques that Seltzer and I would later review. The log detailing the interrogation of Detainee 063 was not released; it would be leaked to the press two years later.

For two hours Gonzales and Haynes laid out the administration’s narrative. Al-Qaeda was a different kind of enemy, deadly and shadowy. It targeted civilians and didn’t follow the Geneva Conventions or any other international rules. Nevertheless, the officials explained, the administration had acted judiciously, even as it moved away from a purely law-enforcement strategy to one that marshaled “all elements of national power.” The authorized version had four basic parts.

First, the administration had moved reasonably—with care and deliberation, and always within the limits of the law. In February 2002 the president had determined, in accordance with established legal principles, that none of the detainees at Guantánamo could rely on any of the protections granted by Geneva, even Common Article 3. This presidential order was the lead document, at Tab A. The administration’s point was this: agree with it or not, the decision on Geneva concealed no hidden agenda; rather, it simply reflected a clear-eyed reading of the actual provisions. The administration, in other words, was doing nothing more than trying to proceed by the book. The law was the law.

Relating to this was a second document, one that had been the subject of media speculation for some weeks. The authors of this document, a legal opinion dated August 1, 2002, were two lawyers in the Justice Department’s Office of Legal Counsel: Jay Bybee, who is now a federal judge, and John Yoo, who now teaches law at Berkeley. Later it would become known that they were assisted in the drafting by David Addington, then the vice president’s lawyer and now his chief of staff. The Yoo-Bybee Memo declared that physical torture occurred only when the pain was “equivalent in intensity to the pain accompanying serious physical injury, such as organ failure, impairment of bodily function, or even death,” and that mental torture required “suffering not just at the moment of infliction but ... lasting psychological harm.” Interrogations that did not reach these thresholds—far less stringent than those set by international law—were allowed. Although findings that issue from the Office of Legal Counsel at Justice typically carry great weight, at the press conference Gonzales went out of his way to decouple the Yoo-Bybee Memo from anything that might have taken place at Guantánamo. The two lawyers had been asked, in effect, to stargaze, he said. Their memo simply explored “the limits of the legal landscape.” It included “irrelevant and unnecessary” discussion and never made it into the hands of the president or of soldiers in the field. The memo did not, said Gonzales, “reflect the policies that the administration ultimately adopted.”

The second element of the administration’s narrative dealt with the specific source of the new interrogation techniques. Where had the initiative come from? The administration pointed to the military commander at Guantánamo, Major General Michael E. Dunlavey. Haynes would later describe him to the Senate Judiciary Committee, during his failed confirmation hearings for a judgeship in 2006, as “an aggressive major general.” The techniques were not imposed or encouraged by Washington, which had merely reacted to a request from below. They came as a result of the identification locally of “key people” at Guantánamo, including “a guy named al-Qahtani.” This man, Detainee 063, had proved able to resist the traditional non-coercive techniques of interrogation spelled out in the Army Field Manual, and as the first anniversary of 9/11 approached, an intelligence spike pointed to the possibility of new attacks. “And so it is concluded at Guantánamo,” Dell’Orto emphasized, reconstructing the event, “that it may be time to inquire as to whether there may be more flexibility in the type of techniques we use on him.” A request was sent from Guantánamo on October 11, 2002, to the head of the U.S. Southern Command (SouthCom), General James T. Hill. Hill in turn forwarded Dunlavey’s request to General Richard Myers, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Ultimately, Rumsfeld approved “all but three of the requested techniques.” The official version was clear: Haynes and Rumsfeld were just processing a request coming up the chain from Guantánamo.

The third element of the administration’s account concerned the legal justification for the new interrogation techniques. This, too, the administration said, had originated in Guantánamo. It was not the result of legal positions taken by politically appointed lawyers in the upper echelons of the administration, and certainly not the Justice Department. The relevant document, also dated October 11, was in the bundle released by Gonzales, a legal memo prepared by Lieutenant Colonel Diane Beaver, the staff judge advocate at Guantánamo. That document—described pointedly by Dell’Orto as a “multi-page, single-spaced legal review”—sought to provide legal authority for all the interrogation techniques. No other legal memo was cited as bearing on aggressive interrogations. The finger of responsibility was intended to point at Diane Beaver.

The fourth and final element of the administration’s official narrative was to make clear that decisions relating to Guantánamo had no bearing on events at Abu Ghraib and elsewhere. Gonzales wanted to “set the record straight” about this. The administration’s actions were inconsistent with torture. The abuses at Abu Ghraib were unauthorized and unconnected to the administration’s policies.

Gonzales and Haynes laid out their case with considerable care. The only flaw was that every element of the argument contained untruths.

The real story, pieced together from many hours of interviews with most of the people involved in the decisions about interrogation, goes something like this: The Geneva decision was not a case of following the logic of the law but rather was designed to give effect to a prior decision to take the gloves off and allow coercive interrogation; it deliberately created a legal black hole into which the detainees were meant to fall. The new interrogation techniques did not arise spontaneously from the field but came about as a direct result of intense pressure and input from Rumsfeld's office. The Yoo-Bybee Memo was not simply some theoretical document, an academic exercise in blue-sky hypothesizing, but rather played a crucial role in giving those at the top the confidence to put pressure on those at the bottom. And the practices employed at Guantánamo led to abuses at Abu Ghraib.

The fingerprints of the most senior lawyers in the administration were all over the design and implementation of the abusive interrogation policies. Addington, Bybee, Gonzales, Haynes, and Yoo became, in effect, a torture team of lawyers, freeing the administration from the constraints of all international rules prohibiting abuse.

Killing Geneva

In the early days of 2002, as the number of al-Qaeda and Taliban fighters captured in Afghanistan began to swell, the No. 3 official at the Pentagon was Douglas J. Feith. As undersecretary of defense for policy, he stood directly below Paul Wolfowitz and Donald Rumsfeld. [NOTE: Mr. Feith advocated intervention in Iraq in the 2000 paper, "A Clean Break;" the other two as members of PNAC.]

Feith's job was to provide advice across a wide range of issues, and the issues came to include advice on the Geneva Conventions and the conduct of military interrogations.

I sat down with Feith not long after he left the government. He was teaching at the school of foreign service at Georgetown University, occupying a small, eighth-floor office lined with books on international law. He greeted me with a smile, his impish face supporting a mop of graying hair that seemed somehow at odds with his 54 years. Over the course of his career Feith has elicited a range of reactions. General Tommy Franks, who led the invasion of Iraq, once called Feith "the fucking stupidest guy on the face of the earth." Rumsfeld, in contrast, saw him as an "intellectual engine." In manner he is the Energizer Bunny, making it hard to get a word in edgewise. After many false starts Feith provided an account of the president's decision on Geneva, including his own contribution as one of its principal architects.

"This was something I played a major role in," he began, in a tone of evident pride. With the war in Afghanistan under way, lawyers in Washington understood that they needed a uniform view on the constraints, if any, imposed by Geneva. Addington, Haynes, and Gonzales all objected to Geneva. Indeed, Haynes in December 2001 told the CentCom admiral in charge of detainees in Afghanistan "to 'take the gloves off' and ask whatever he wanted" in the questioning of John Walker Lindh. (Lindh, a young American who had become a Muslim and had recently been captured in northern Afghanistan, bore the designation Detainee 001.)

A month later, the administration was struggling to adopt a position. On January 9, John Yoo and Robert Delahunty, at the Justice Department, prepared an opinion for Haynes. They concluded that the president wasn't bound by traditional international-law prohibitions. This encountered strong opposition from Colin Powell and his counsel, William H. Taft IV, at the State Department, as well as from the Tjags—the military lawyers in the office of the judge advocate general—who wanted to maintain a strong U.S. commitment to Geneva and the rules that were part of customary law.

On January 25, Alberto Gonzales put his name to a memo to the president supporting Haynes and Rumsfeld over Powell and Taft. This memo, which is believed to have been written by Addington, presented a “new paradigm” and described Geneva’s “strict limitations on questioning of enemy prisoners” as “obsolete.” Addington was particularly distrustful of the military lawyers. “Don’t bring the Tjags into the process—they aren’t reliable,” he was once overheard to say.

Feith took up the story. He had gone to see Rumsfeld about the issue, accompanied by Myers. As they reached Rumsfeld’s office, Myers turned to Feith and said, “We have to support the Geneva Conventions. If Rumsfeld doesn’t go along with this, I’m going to contradict them in front of the president.” Feith was surprised by this uncharacteristically robust statement, and by the way Myers referred to the secretary bluntly as “Rumsfeld.”

Douglas Feith had a long-standing intellectual interest in Geneva, and for many years had opposed legal protections for terrorists under international law. He referred me to an article he had written in 1985, in The National Interest, setting out his basic view. Geneva provided incentives to play by the rules; those who chose not to follow the rules, he argued, shouldn’t be allowed to rely on them, or else the whole Geneva structure would collapse. The only way to protect Geneva, in other words, was sometimes to limit its scope. To uphold Geneva’s protections, you might have to cast them aside.

But that way of thinking didn’t square with the Geneva system itself, which was based on two principles: combatants who behaved according to its standards received P.O.W. status and special protections, and everyone else received the more limited but still significant protections of Common Article 3. Feith described how, as he and Myers spoke with Rumsfeld, he jumped protectively in front of the general. He reprised his “little speech” for me. “There is no country in the world that has a larger interest in promoting respect for the Geneva Conventions as law than the United States,” he told Rumsfeld, according to his own account, “and there is no institution in the U.S. government that has a stronger interest than the Pentagon.” So Geneva had to be followed? “Obeying the Geneva Conventions is not optional,” Feith replied. “The Geneva Convention is a treaty in force. It is as much part of the supreme law of the United States as a statute.” Myers jumped in. “I agree completely with what Doug said and furthermore it is our military culture. It’s not even a matter of whether it is reciprocated—it’s a matter of who we are.”

Feith was animated as he relived this moment. I remained puzzled. How had the administration gone from a commitment to Geneva, as suggested by the meeting with Rumsfeld, to the president’s declaration that none of the detainees had any rights under Geneva? It all turns on what you mean by “promoting respect” for Geneva, Feith explained. Geneva didn’t apply at all to al-Qaeda fighters, because they weren’t part of a state and therefore couldn’t claim rights under a treaty that was binding only on states. Geneva did apply to the Taliban, but by Geneva’s own terms Taliban fighters weren’t entitled to P.O.W. status, because they hadn’t worn uniforms or insignia. That would still leave the safety net provided by the rules reflected in Common Article 3— but detainees could not rely on this either, on the theory that its provisions applied only to “armed conflict not of an international character,” which the administration interpreted to mean civil war. This was new. In reaching this conclusion, the Bush administration simply abandoned all legal and customary precedent that regards Common Article 3 as a minimal bill of rights for everyone.

In the administration’s account there was no connection between the decision on Geneva and the new interrogation rules later approved by Rumsfeld for Detainee 063; its position on Geneva was dictated purely by the law itself. I asked Feith, just to be clear: Didn’t the administration’s approach mean that Geneva’s constraints on interrogation couldn’t be invoked by anyone at Guantánamo? “Oh yes, sure,” he shot back. Was that the intended result?, I asked. “Absolutely,” he replied. I asked again: Under the Geneva Conventions, no one at Guantánamo was entitled to any protection? “That’s the point,” Feith reiterated. As he saw it, either you were a detainee to whom Geneva didn’t apply or you were a detainee to whom Geneva applied but whose rights you couldn’t invoke. What was the difference for the purpose of interrogation?, I asked. Feith answered with a certain satisfaction, “It turns out, none. But that’s the point.”

That indeed was the point. The principled legal arguments were a fig leaf. The real reason for the Geneva decision, as Feith now made explicit, was the desire to interrogate these detainees with as few constraints as possible. Feith thought he’d found a clever way to do this, which on the one hand upheld Geneva as a matter of law—the speech he made to Myers and Rumsfeld—and on the other pulled the rug out from under it as a matter of reality. Feith’s argument was so clever that Myers continued to believe Geneva’s protections remained in force—he was “well and truly hoodwinked,” one seasoned observer of military affairs later told me.

Feith’s argument prevailed. On February 7, 2002, President Bush signed a memorandum that turned Guantánamo into a Geneva-free zone. As a matter of policy, the detainees would be handled humanely, but only to the extent appropriate and consistent with military necessity. “The president said ‘humane treatment,’” Feith told me, inflecting the term sourly, “and I thought that was O.K. Perfectly fine phrase that needs to be fleshed out, but it’s a fine phrase—‘humane treatment.’ ” The Common Article 3 restrictions on torture or “outrages upon personal dignity” were gone.

“This year I was really a player,” Feith said, thinking back on 2002 and relishing the memory. I asked him whether, in the end, he was at all concerned that the Geneva decision might have diminished America’s moral authority. He was not. “The problem with moral authority,” he said, was “people who should know better, like yourself, siding with the assholes, to put it crudely.”

“I Was on a Timeline”

As the traditional constraints on aggressive interrogation were removed, Rumsfeld wanted the right man to take charge of Joint Task Force 170, which oversaw military interrogations at Guantánamo. Two weeks after the decision on Geneva he found that man in Michael Dunlavey. Dunlavey was a judge in the Court of Common Pleas in Erie, Pennsylvania, a Vietnam veteran, and a major general in the reserves with a strong background in intelligence.

Dunlavey met one-on-one with Rumsfeld at the end of February. They both liked what they saw. When I met Dunlavey, now back at his office in Erie, he described that initial meeting: “He evaluated me. He wanted to know who I was. He was very focused on the need to get intelligence. He wanted to make sure that the moment was not lost.” Dunlavey was a strong and abrasive personality (“a tyrant,” one former jag told me), but he was also a cautious man, alert to the nuances of instruction from above. Succinctly, Dunlavey described the mission Rumsfeld had given him. “He wanted me to ‘maximize the intelligence production.’ No one ever said to me, ‘The gloves are off.’ But I didn’t need to talk about the Geneva Conventions. It was clear that they didn’t apply.” Rumsfeld told Dunlavey to report directly to him. To the suggestion that Dunlavey report to SouthCom, Dunlavey heard Rumsfeld say, “I don’t care who he is under. He works for me.”

He arrived at Guantánamo at the beginning of March. Planeloads of detainees were being delivered on a daily basis, though Dunlavey soon concluded that half of them had no intelligence value. He reported this to Rumsfeld, who referred the matter to Feith. Feith, Dunlavey said, resisted the idea of repatriating any detainees whatsoever. (Feith says he made a series of interagency proposals to repatriate detainees.)

Dunlavey described Feith to me as one of his main points of contact. Feith, for his part, had told me that he knew nothing about any specific interrogation issues until the Haynes Memo suddenly landed on his desk. But that couldn’t be right—in the memo itself Haynes had written, “I have discussed this with the Deputy, Doug Feith and General Myers.” I read the sentence aloud. Feith looked at me. His only response was to tell me that I had mispronounced his name. “It’s Fythe,” he said. “Not Faith.”

In June, the focus settled on Detainee 063, Mohammed al-Qahtani, a Saudi national who had been refused entry to the United States just before 9/11 and was captured a few months later in Afghanistan. Dunlavey described to me the enormous pressure he came under—from Washington, from the top—to find out what al-Qahtani knew. The message, he said, was: “Are you doing everything humanly possible to get this information?” He received a famous Rumsfeld “snowflake,” a memo designed to prod the recipient into action. “I’ve got a short fuse on this to get it up the chain,” Dunlavey told me, “I was on a timeline.” Dunlavey held eye contact for more than a comfortable moment. He said, “This guy may have been the key to the survival of the U.S.”

The interrogation of al-Qahtani relied at first on long-established F.B.I. and military techniques, procedures sanctioned by the Field Manual and based largely on building rapport. This yielded nothing. On August 8, al-Qahtani was placed in an isolation facility to separate him from the general detainee population. Pressure from Washington continued to mount. How high up did it go?, I asked Dunlavey. “It must have been all the way to the White House,” he replied.

Meanwhile, unbeknownst to Dunlavey and the others at Guantánamo, interrogation issues had arisen in other quarters. In March 2002 a man named Abu Zubaydah, a high-ranking al-Qaeda official, was captured in Pakistan. C.I.A. director George Tenet wanted to interrogate him aggressively but worried about the risk of criminal prosecution. He had to await the completion of legal opinions by the Justice Department, a task that had been entrusted by Alberto Gonzales to Jay Bybee and John Yoo. “It took until August to get clear guidance on what Agency officers could legally do,” Tenet later wrote. The “clear guidance” came on August 1, 2002, in memos written by Bybee and Yoo, with input from Addington. The first memo was addressed to Gonzales, redefining torture and abandoning the definition set by the 1984 torture convention. This was the Yoo-Bybee Memo made public by Gonzales nearly two years later, in the wake of Abu Ghraib. Nothing in the memo suggested that its use was limited to the C.I.A.; it referred broadly to “the conduct of interrogations outside of the United States.” Gonzales would later contend that this policy memo did “not reflect the policies the administration ultimately adopted,” but in fact it gave carte blanche to all the interrogation techniques later recommended by Haynes and approved by Rumsfeld. The second memo, requested by John Rizzo, a senior lawyer at the C.I.A., has never been made public. It spells out the specific techniques in detail. Dunlavey and his subordinates at Guantánamo never saw these memos and were not aware of their contents.

The lawyers in Washington were playing a double game. They wanted maximum pressure applied during interrogations, but didn’t want to be seen as the ones applying it—they wanted distance and deniability. They also wanted legal cover for themselves. A key question is whether Haynes and Rumsfeld had knowledge of the content of these memos before they approved the new interrogation techniques for al-Qahtani. If they did, then the administration’s official narrative—that the pressure for new techniques, and the legal support for them, originated on the ground at Guantánamo, from the “aggressive major general” and his staff lawyer—becomes difficult to sustain. More crucially, that knowledge is a link in the causal chain that connects the keyboards of Feith and Yoo to the interrogations of Guantánamo.

When did Haynes learn that the Justice Department had signed off on aggressive interrogation? All indications are that well before Haynes wrote his memo he knew what the Justice Department had advised the C.I.A. on interrogations and believed that he had legal cover to do what he wanted. Everyone in the upper echelons of the chain of decision-making that I spoke with, including Feith, General Myers, and General Tom Hill (the commander of SouthCom), confirmed to me that they believed at the time that Haynes had consulted Justice Department lawyers. Moreover, Haynes was a close friend of Bybee’s. “Jim was tied at the hip with Jay Bybee,” Thomas Romig, the army’s former judge advocate general, told me. “He would quote him the whole time.” Later, when asked during Senate hearings about his knowledge of the Yoo-Bybee Memo, Haynes would variously testify that he had not sought the memo, had not shaped its content, and did not possess a copy of it—but he carefully refrained from saying that he was unaware of its contents. Haynes, with whom I met on two occasions, will not speak on the record about this subject.

The Glassy-Eyed Men

As the first anniversary of 9/11 approached, Joint Task Force 170 was on notice to deliver results. But the task force was not the only actor at Guantánamo. The C.I.A. had people there looking for recruits among the detainees. The Defense Intelligence Agency (D.I.A.) was interrogating detainees through its humint (human intelligence) Augmentation Teams. The F.B.I. was carrying out its own traditional non-aggressive interrogations.

The source of the various new techniques has been the stuff of speculation. In the administration's official account, as noted, everything trickled up from the ground at Guantánamo. When I suggested to Mike Dunlavey that the administration's trickle-up line was counter-intuitive, he didn't disabuse me. "It's possible," he said, in a tone at once mischievous and unforthcoming, "that someone was sent to my task force and came up with these great ideas."

One F.B.I. special agent remembers an occasion, before any new techniques had been officially sanctioned, when military interrogators set out to question al-Qaeda for 24 hours straight—employing a variation on a method that would later appear in the Haynes Memo. When the agent objected, he said he was told that the plan had been approved by "the secretary," meaning Rumsfeld.

Diane Beaver, Dunlavey's staff judge advocate, was the lawyer who would later be asked to sign off on the new interrogation techniques. When the administration made public the list, it was Beaver's legal advice the administration invoked. Diane Beaver gave me the fullest account of the process by which the new interrogation techniques emerged. In our lengthy conversations, which began in the autumn of 2006, she seemed coiled up—mistreated, hung out to dry. Before becoming a military lawyer Beaver had been a military police officer; once, while stationed in Germany, she had visited the courtroom where the Nuremberg trials took place. She was working as a lawyer for the Pentagon when the hijacked airplane hit on 9/11, and decided to remain in the army to help as she could. That decision landed her in Guantánamo.

It was clear to me that Beaver believed Washington was directly involved in the interrogations. Her account confirmed what Dunlavey had intimated, and what others have told me—that Washington's views were being fed into the process by people physically present at Guantánamo. D.I.A. personnel were among them. Later allegations would suggest a role for three C.I.A. psychologists.

During September a series of brainstorming meetings were held at Guantánamo to discuss new techniques. Some of the meetings were led by Beaver. "I kept minutes. I got everyone together. I invited. I facilitated," she told me. The sessions included representatives of the D.I.A. and the C.I.A. Ideas came from all over. Some derived from personal training experiences, including a military program known as sere (Survival, Evasion, Resistance, and Escape), designed to help soldiers persevere in the event of capture. Had sere been, in effect, reverse-engineered to provide some of the 18 techniques? Both Dunlavey and Beaver told me that sere provided inspiration, contradicting the administration's denials that it had. Indeed, several Guantánamo personnel, including a psychologist and a psychiatrist, traveled to Fort Bragg, sere's home, for a briefing.

Ideas arose from other sources. The first year of Fox TV's dramatic series 24 came to a conclusion in spring 2002, and the second year of the series began that fall. An inescapable message of the program is that torture works. "We saw it on cable," Beaver recalled. "People had already seen the first series. It was hugely popular." Jack Bauer had many friends at Guantánamo, Beaver added. "He gave people lots of ideas."

The brainstorming meetings inspired animated discussion. "Who has the glassy eyes?," Beaver asked herself as she surveyed the men around the room, 30 or more of them. She was invariably the only woman present—as she saw it, keeping control of the boys. The younger men would get particularly agitated, excited even. "You could almost see their dicks getting hard as they got new ideas," Beaver recalled, a wan smile flickering on her face. "And I said to myself, You know what? I don't have a dick to get hard—I can stay detached."

Not everyone at Guantánamo was enthusiastic. The F.B.I. and the Naval Criminal Investigative Service refused to be associated with aggressive interrogation. They opposed the techniques.

One of the N.C.I.S. psychologists, Mike Gelles, knew about the brainstorming sessions but stayed away. He was dismissive of the administration's contention that the techniques trickled up on their own from Guantánamo. "That's not accurate," he said flatly. "This was not done by a bunch of people down in Gitmo—no way."

That view is buttressed by a key event that has received virtually no attention. On September 25, as the process of elaborating new interrogation techniques reached a critical point, a delegation of the administration's most senior lawyers arrived at Guantánamo. The group included the president's lawyer, Alberto Gonzales, who had by then received the Yoo-Bybee Memo; Vice President Cheney's lawyer, David Addington, who had contributed to the writing of that memo; the C.I.A.'s John Rizzo, who had asked for a Justice Department sign-off on individual techniques, including waterboarding, and received the second (and still secret) Yoo-Bybee Memo; and Jim Haynes, Rumsfeld's counsel. They were all well aware of al-Qahtani. "They wanted to know what we were doing to get to this guy," Dunlavey told me, "and Addington was interested in how we were managing it." I asked what they had to say. "They brought ideas with them which had been given from sources in D.C.," Dunlavey said. "They came down to observe and talk." Throughout this whole period, Dunlavey went on, Rumsfeld was "directly and regularly involved."

Beaver confirmed the account of the visit. Addington talked a great deal, and it was obvious to her that he was a "very powerful man" and "definitely the guy in charge," with a booming voice and confident style. Gonzales was quiet. Haynes, a friend and protégé of Addington's, seemed especially interested in the military commissions, which were to decide the fate of individual detainees. They met with the intelligence people and talked about new interrogation methods. They also witnessed some interrogations. Beaver spent time with the group. Talking about the episode even long afterward made her visibly anxious. Her hand tapped and she moved restlessly in her chair. She recalled the message they had received from the visitors: Do “whatever needed to be done.”

That was a green light from the very top—the lawyers for Bush, Cheney, Rumsfeld, and the C.I.A. The administration’s version of events—that it became involved in the Guantánamo interrogations only in November, after receiving a list of techniques out of the blue from the “aggressive major general”—was demonstrably false.

“A Dunk in the Water”

Two weeks after this unpublicized visit the process of compiling the list of new techniques was completed. The list was set out in a three-page memorandum from Lieutenant Colonel Jerald Phifer, dated October 11 and addressed to Dunlavey.

The Phifer Memo identified the problem: “current guidelines” prohibited the use of “physical or mental torture, threats, insults, or exposure to inhumane treatment as a means of or aid to interrogation.” The prohibition dated back to 1863 and a general order issued by Abraham Lincoln.

The list of new interrogation techniques turned its back on this tradition. The 18 techniques were divided into three categories and came with only rudimentary guidance. No limits were placed on how many methods could be used at once, or for how many days in succession. The detainee was to be provided with a chair. The environment should be generally comfortable. If the detainee was uncooperative, you went to Category I. This comprised two techniques, yelling and deception.

If Category I produced no results, then the military interrogator could move to Category II. Category II included 12 techniques aimed at humiliation and sensory deprivation: for instance, the use of stress positions, such as standing; isolation for up to 30 days; deprivation of light and sound; 20-hour interrogations; removal of religious items; removal of clothing; forcible grooming, such as the shaving of facial hair; and the use of individual phobias, such as the fear of dogs, to induce stress.

Finally came Category III, for the most exceptionally resistant. Category III included four techniques: the use of “mild, non-injurious physical contact,” such as grabbing, poking, and light pushing; the use of scenarios designed to convince the detainee that death or severely painful consequences were imminent for him or his family; exposure to cold weather or water; and waterboarding. This last technique, which powerfully mimics the experience of drowning, was later described by Vice President Cheney as a “dunk in the water.”

By the time the memo was completed al-Qahtani had already been separated from all other detainees for 64 days, in a cell that was “always flooded with light.” An F.B.I. agent described his condition the following month, just as the new interrogation techniques were first being directed against him: the detainee, a 2004 memo stated, “was talking to non-existent people, reporting hearing voices, [and] crouching in a corner of the cell covered with a sheet for hours on end.”

Ends and Means

Diane Beaver was insistent that the decision to implement new interrogation techniques had to be properly written up and that it needed a paper trail leading to authorization from the top, not from “the dirt on the ground,” as she self-deprecatingly described herself. “I just wasn’t comfortable giving oral advice,” she explained, as she had been requested to do. “I wanted to get something in writing. That was my game plan. I had four days. Dunlavey gave me just four days.” She says she believed that senior lawyers in Washington would review her written advice and override it if necessary. It never occurred to her that on so important an issue she would be the one to provide the legal assessment on which the entire matter would appear to rest—that her word would be the last word. As far as she was concerned, getting the proposal “up the command” was victory enough. She didn’t know that people much higher up had already made their decisions, had the security of secret legal cover from the Justice Department, and, although confident of their own legal protection, had no intention of soiling their hands by weighing in on the unpleasant details of interrogation.

Marooned in Guantánamo, Beaver had limited access to books and other documents, although there was Internet access to certain legal materials. She tried getting help from more experienced lawyers—at SouthCom, the Joint Chiefs, the D.I.A., the Jag School—but to no avail.

In the end she worked on her own, completing the task just before the Columbus Day weekend. Her memo was entitled “Legal Review of Aggressive Interrogation Techniques.” The key fact was that none of the detainees were protected by Geneva, owing to Douglas Feith’s handiwork and the president’s decision in February. She also concluded that the torture convention and other international laws did not apply, conclusions that a person more fully schooled in the relevant law might well have questioned: “It was not my job to second-guess the president,” she told me. Beaver ignored customary international law altogether. All that was left was American law, which is what she turned to.

Given the circumstances in which she found herself, the memo has a certain desperate, heroic quality. She proceeded methodically through the 18 techniques, testing each against the standards set by U.S. law, including the Eighth Amendment to the Constitution (which prohibits “cruel and unusual punishment”), the federal torture statute, and the Uniform Code of Military Justice. The common theme was that the techniques were fine “so long as the force used could plausibly have been thought necessary in a particular situation to achieve a legitimate government objective, and it was applied in a good faith effort and not maliciously or sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm.” That is to say, the techniques are legal if the motivation is pure. National security justifies anything.

Beaver did enter some important caveats. The interrogators had to be properly trained. Since the law required “examination of all facts under a totality of circumstances test,” all proposed interrogations involving Category II and III methods had to “undergo a legal, medical, behavioral science, and intelligence review prior to their commencement.” This suggested concerns about these new techniques, including whether they would be effective. But in the end she concluded, I “agree that the proposed strategies do not violate applicable federal law.” The word “agree” stands out—she seems to be confirming a policy decision that she knows has already been made.

Time and distance do not improve the quality of the advice. I thought it was awful when I first read it, and awful when I reread it. Nevertheless, I was now aware of the circumstances in which Beaver had been asked to provide her advice. Refusal would have caused difficulty. It was also reasonable to expect a more senior review of her draft. Beaver struck me as honest, loyal, and decent. Personally, she was prepared to take a hard line on many detainees. She once described them to me as “psychopaths. Skinny, runty, dangerous, lying psychopaths.” But there was a basic integrity to her approach. She could not have anticipated that there would be no other piece of written legal advice bearing on the Guantánamo interrogations.

She could not have anticipated that she would be made the scapegoat.

Once, after returning to a job at the Pentagon, Beaver passed David Addington in a hallway—the first time she had seen him since his visit to Guantánamo. He recognized her immediately, smiled, and said, “Great minds think alike.”

The “voco”

On October 11, Dunlavey sent his request for approval of new techniques, together with Diane Beaver’s legal memo, to General Tom Hill, the commander of SouthCom. Two weeks later, on October 25, Hill forwarded everything to General Myers, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs, in Washington.

Hill’s cover letter contains a sentence—“Our respective staffs, the Office of the Secretary of Defense, and Joint Task Force 170 have been trying to identify counter-resistant techniques that we can lawfully employ”—which again makes it clear that the list of techniques was no surprise to Rumsfeld’s office, whatever its later claims. Hill also expressed serious reservations. He wanted Pentagon lawyers to weigh in, and he explicitly requested that “Department of Justice lawyers review the third category of techniques.”

At the level of the Joint Chiefs the memo should have been subject to a detailed review, including close legal scrutiny by Myers’s own counsel, Jane Dalton, but that never happened. It seems that Jim Haynes short-circuited the approval process.

Alberto Mora, the general counsel of the navy, says he remembers Dalton telling him, “Jim pulled this away. We never had a chance to complete the assessment.”

When we spoke, Myers confessed to being troubled that normal procedures had been circumvented. He held the Haynes Memo in his hands, looking carefully at the sheet of paper as if seeing it clearly for the first time. He pointed: “You don’t see my initials on this.” Normally he would have initialed a memo to indicate approval, but there was no confirmation that Myers had seen the memo or formally signed off on it before it went to Rumsfeld. “You just see I’ve ‘discussed’ it,” he said, noting a sentence to that effect in the memo itself. “This was not the way this should have come about.”

Thinking back, he recalled the “intrigue” that was going on, intrigue “that I wasn’t aware of, and Jane wasn’t aware of, that was probably occurring between Jim Haynes, White House general counsel, and Justice.”

Further confirmation that the Haynes Memo got special handling comes from a former Pentagon official, who told me that Lieutenant General Bantz Craddock, Rumsfeld's senior military assistant, noticed that it was missing a buck slip, an essential component that shows a document's circulation path, and which everyone was supposed to initial. The Haynes Memo had no "legal chop," or signature, from the general counsel's office. It went back to Haynes, who later signed off with a note that said simply, "Good to go."

Events moved fast as the process was cut short. On November 4, Dunlavey was replaced as commander at Guantánamo by Major General Geoffrey Miller. On November 12 a detailed interrogation plan was approved for al-Qahtani, based on the new interrogation techniques. The plan was sent to Rumsfeld for his personal approval, General Hill told me.

Ten days later an alternative plan, prepared by Mike Gelles and others at the N.C.I.S. and elsewhere, using traditional non-aggressive techniques, was rejected. By then the F.B.I. had communicated its concerns to Haynes's office about developments at Guantánamo. On November 23, well before Rumsfeld gave formal written approval to the Haynes Memo, General Miller received a "voco"—a vocal command—authorizing an immediate start to the aggressive interrogation of al-Qahtani. No one I spoke with, including Beaver, Hill, and Myers, could recall who had initiated the voco, but an army investigation would state that it was likely Rumsfeld, and he would not have acted without Haynes's endorsement.

Al-Qahtani's interrogation log for Saturday, November 23, registers the immediate consequence of the decision to move ahead.

"The detainee arrives at the interrogation booth. His hood is removed and he is bolted to the floor."

Reversal

Four days after the voco, Haynes formally signed off on his memo. He recommended, as a matter of policy, approval of 15 of the 18 techniques. Of the four techniques listed in Category III, however, Haynes proposed blanket approval of just one: mild non-injurious physical contact.

He would later tell the Senate that he had "recommended against the proposed use of a wet towel"—that is, against waterboarding—but to the contrary, in his memo he stated that "all Category III techniques may be legally available." Rumsfeld placed his name next to the word "Approved" and wrote the jocular comment that may well expose him to difficulties in the witness stand at some future time.

As the memo was being approved, the F.B.I. communicated serious concerns directly to Haynes's office. Then, on December 17, Dave Brant, of the N.C.I.S., paid a surprise visit to Alberto Mora, the general counsel of the navy. Brant told him that N.C.I.S. agents had information that abusive actions at Guantánamo had been authorized at a “high level” in Washington. The following day Mora met again with Brant. Mike Gelles joined them and told Mora that the interrogators were under extraordinary pressure to achieve results. Gelles described the phenomenon of “force drift,” where interrogators using coercion come to believe that if some force is good, then more must be better.

As recounted in his official “Memorandum for Inspector General, Department of the Navy,” Mora visited Steve Morello, the army’s general counsel, and Tom Taylor, his deputy, who showed him a copy of the Haynes Memo with its attachments. The memorandum describes them as demonstrating “great concern.” In the course of a long interview Mora recalled Morello “with a furtive air” saying, “Look at this. Don’t tell anyone where you got it.” Mora was horrified by what he read. “I was astounded that the secretary of defense would get within 100 miles of this issue,” he said. (Notwithstanding the report to the inspector general, Morello denies showing Mora a copy of the Haynes Memo.)

On December 20, Mora met with Haynes, who listened attentively and said he would consider Mora’s concerns. Mora went away on vacation, expecting everything to be sorted out. It wasn’t: Brant soon called to say the detainee mistreatment hadn’t stopped. On January 9, 2003, Mora met Haynes for a second time, expressing surprise that the techniques hadn’t been stopped. Haynes said little in response, and Mora felt he had made no headway. The following day, however, Haynes called to say that he had briefed Rumsfeld and that changes were in the offing. But over the next several days no news came.

On the morning of Wednesday, January 15, Mora awoke determined to act. He would put his concerns in writing in a draft memorandum for Haynes and Dalton. He made three simple points. One: the majority of the Category II and III techniques violated domestic and international law and constituted, at a minimum, cruel and unusual treatment and, at worst, torture. Two: the legal analysis by Diane Beaver had to be rejected. Three: he “strongly non-concurred” with these interrogation techniques. He delivered the draft memo to Haynes’s office. Two hours later, at about five p.m. on January 15, Haynes called Mora. “I’m pleased to tell you the secretary has rescinded the authorization,” he said.

The abusive interrogation of al-Qahtani lasted a total of 54 days. It ended not on January 12, as the press was told in June 2004, but three days later, on January 15. In those final three days, knowing that the anything-goes legal regime might disappear at any moment, the interrogators made one last desperate push to get something useful out of al-Qahtani. They never did.

By the end of the interrogation al-Qahtani, according to an army investigator, had “black coals for eyes.”

The Great Migration

Mike Gelles, of the N.C.I.S., had shared with me his fear that the al-Qahtani techniques would not simply fade into history—that they would turn out to have been horribly contagious. This “migration” theory was controversial, because it potentially extended the responsibility of those who authorized the Guantánamo techniques to abusive practices elsewhere. John Yoo has described the migration theory as “an exercise in hyperbole and partisan smear.”

But is it? In August 2003, Major General Miller traveled from Guantánamo to Baghdad, accompanied by Diane Beaver. They visited Abu Ghraib and found shocking conditions of near lawlessness. Miller made recommendations to Lieutenant General Ricardo Sanchez, the commander of coalition forces in Iraq. On September 14, General Sanchez authorized an array of new interrogation techniques. These were vetted by his staff judge advocate, who later told the Senate Armed Services Committee that operating procedures and policies “in use in Guantánamo Bay” had been taken into account. Despite the fact that Geneva applied in Iraq, General Sanchez authorized several techniques that were not sanctioned by the Field Manual—but were listed in the Haynes Memo. The abuses for which Abu Ghraib became infamous began one month later.

Three different official investigations in the space of three years have confirmed the migration theory. The August 2006 report of the Pentagon’s inspector general concluded unequivocally that techniques from Guantánamo had indeed found their way to Iraq. An investigation overseen by former secretary of defense James R. Schlesinger determined that “augmented techniques for Guantanamo migrated to Afghanistan and Iraq where they were neither limited nor safeguarded.”

Jim Haynes and Donald Rumsfeld may have reversed themselves about al-Qahtani in January 2003, but the death blow to the administration’s outlook did not occur for three more years. It came on June 29, 2006, with the U.S. Supreme Court’s ruling in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, holding that Guantánamo detainees were entitled to the protections provided under Geneva’s Common Article 3. The Court invoked the legal precedents that had been sidestepped by Douglas Feith and John Yoo, and laid bare the blatant illegality of al-Qahtani’s interrogation.

A colleague having lunch with Haynes that day described him as looking “shocked” when the news arrived, adding, “He just went pale.” Justice Anthony Kennedy, joining the majority, pointedly observed that “violations of Common Article 3 are considered ‘war crimes.’”

Jim Haynes appears to remain a die-hard supporter of aggressive interrogation. Shortly after the Supreme Court decision, when he appeared before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Senator Patrick Leahy reminded him that in 2003 Haynes had said there was “no way” that Geneva could apply to the Afghan conflict and the war on terror. “Do you now accept that you were mistaken in your legal and policy determinations?” Leahy asked. Haynes would say only that he was bound by the Supreme Court’s decision.

As the consequences of Hamdan sank in, the instinct for self-preservation asserted itself. The lawyers got busy. Within four months President Bush signed into law the Military Commissions Act. This created a new legal defense against lawsuits for misconduct arising from the “detention and interrogation of aliens” between September 11, 2001, and December 30, 2005. That covered the interrogation of al-Qahtani, and no doubt much else. Signing the bill on October 17, 2006, President Bush explained that it provided “legal protections that ensure our military and intelligence personnel will not have to fear lawsuits filed by terrorists simply for doing their jobs.”

In a word, the interrogators and their superiors were granted immunity from prosecution. Some of the lawyers who contributed to this legislation were immunizing themselves. The hitch, and it is a big one, is that the immunity is good only within the borders of the United States.

A Tap on the Shoulder

The table in the conference room held five stacks of files and papers, neatly arranged and yellow and crisp with age. Behind them sat an elderly gentleman named Ludwig Altstötter, rosy-cheeked and cherubic. Ludwig is the son of Josef Altstötter, the lead defendant in the 1947 case United States of America v. Josef Altstötter et al., which was tried in Germany before a U.S. military tribunal. The case is famous because it appears to be the only one in which lawyers have ever been charged and convicted for committing international crimes through the performance of their legal functions. It served as the inspiration for the Oscar-winning 1961 movie Judgment at Nuremberg, whose themes are alluded to in Marcel Ophüls’s classic 1976 film on wartime atrocities, The Memory of Justice, which should be required viewing but has been lost to a broader audience. Nuremberg was, in fact, where Ludwig and I were meeting.

The Altstötter case had been prosecuted by the Allies to establish the principle that lawyers and judges in the Nazi regime bore a particular responsibility for the regime’s crimes. Sixteen lawyers appeared as defendants. The scale of the Nazi atrocities makes any factual comparison with Guantánamo absurd, a point made to me by Douglas Feith, and with which I agree. But I wasn’t interested in drawing a facile comparison between historical episodes. I wanted to know more about the underlying principle.

Josef Altstötter had the misfortune, because of his name, to be the first defendant listed among the 16. He was not the most important or the worst, although he was one of the 10 who were in fact convicted (4 were acquitted, one committed suicide, and there was one mistrial). He was a well-regarded member of society and a high-ranking lawyer. In 1943 he joined the Reich Ministry of Justice in Berlin, where he served as a Ministerialdirektor, the chief of the civil-law-and-procedure division. He became a member of the SS in 1937. The U.S. Military Tribunal found him guilty of membership in that criminal organization—with knowledge of its criminal acts—and sentenced him to five years in prison, which he served in full. He returned to legal practice in Nuremberg and died in 1979. Ludwig Altstötter had all the relevant documents, and he generously invited me to go over them with him in Nuremberg.

I took Ludwig to the most striking passage in the tribunal’s judgment. “He gave his name as a soldier and a jurist of note and so helped to cloak the shameful deeds of that organisation from the eyes of the German people.” The tribunal convicted Altstötter largely on the basis of two letters. Ludwig went to the piles on the table and pulled out fading copies of the originals. The first, dated May 3, 1944, was from the chief of the SS intelligence service to Ludwig’s father, asking him to intervene with the regional court of Vienna and stop it from ordering the transfer of Jews from the concentration camp at Theresienstadt back to Vienna to appear as witnesses in court hearings. The second letter was Altstötter’s response, a month later, to the president of the court in Vienna. “For security reasons,” he wrote, “these requests cannot be granted.” The U.S. Military Tribunal proceeded on the basis that Altstötter would have known what the concentration camps were for.

The words “security reasons” reminded me of remarks by Jim Haynes at the press conference with Gonzales: “Military necessity can sometimes allow ... warfare to be conducted in ways that might infringe on the otherwise applicable articles of the Convention.” Haynes provided no legal authority for that proposition, and none exists. The minimum rights of detainees guaranteed by Geneva and the torture convention can never be overridden by claims of security or other military necessity. That is their whole purpose.

Mohammed al-Qahtani is among the first six detainees scheduled to go on trial for complicity in the 9/11 attacks; the Bush administration has announced that it will seek the death penalty. Last month, President Bush vetoed a bill that would have outlawed the use by the C.I.A. of the techniques set out in the Haynes Memo and used on al-Qahtani. Whatever he may have done, Mohammed al-Qahtani was entitled to the protections afforded by international law, including Geneva and the torture convention. His interrogation violated those conventions. There can be no doubt that he was treated cruelly and degraded, that the standards of Common Article 3 were violated, and that his treatment amounts to a war crime. If he suffered the degree of severe mental distress prohibited by the torture convention, then his treatment crosses the line into outright torture. These acts resulted from a policy decision made right at the top, not simply from ground-level requests in Guantánamo, and they were supported by legal advice from the president’s own circle.

Those responsible for the interrogation of Detainee 063 face a real risk of investigation if they set foot outside the United States. Article 4 of the torture convention criminalizes “complicity” or “participation” in torture, and the same principle governs violations of Common Article 3.

It would be wrong to consider the prospect of legal jeopardy unlikely. I remember sitting in the House of Lords during the landmark Pinochet case, back in 1999—in which a prosecutor was seeking the extradition to Spain of the former Chilean head of state for torture and other international crimes—and being told by one of his key advisers that they had never expected the torture convention to lead to the former president of Chile’s loss of legal immunity. In my efforts to get to the heart of this story, and its possible consequences, I visited a judge and a prosecutor in a major European city, and guided them through all the materials pertaining to the Guantánamo case. The judge and prosecutor were particularly struck by the immunity from prosecution provided by the Military Commissions Act.

“That is very stupid,” said the prosecutor, explaining that it would make it much easier for investigators outside the United States to argue that possible war crimes would never be addressed by the justice system in the home country—one of the trip wires enabling foreign courts to intervene. For some of those involved in the Guantánamo decisions, prudence may well dictate a more cautious approach to international travel. And for some the future may hold a tap on the shoulder.

“It’s a matter of time,” the judge observed. “These things take time.” As I gathered my papers, he looked up and said, “And then something unexpected happens, when one of these lawyers travels to the wrong place.”

The Murder of Manadel al-Jamadi

Manadel Al-Jamadi was one of the CIA's “ghost” detainees at Abu Ghraib -- prisoners being held secretly [albeit briefly] by the agency.

His death in November 2003 became public with the release of photos of Abu Ghraib guards giving a thumbs-up over his bruised and puffy-faced corpse, which had been packed in ice. One of those guards was Pvt. Charles Graner, who last month received 10 years in a military prison for abusing detainees.

Al-Jamadi died in a prison shower room during about a half-hour of questioning, before interrogators could extract any information, according to the documents, which consist of statements from Army prison guards to investigators with the military and the CIA's Inspector General's office.

One Army guard, Sgt. Jeffery Frost, said the prisoner's arms were stretched behind him in a way he had never before seen. Frost told investigators he was surprised al-Jamadi's arms “didn't pop out of their sockets,” according to a summary of his interview.

Frost and other guards had been summoned to reposition al-Jamadi, who an interrogator said was not cooperating. As the guards released the shackles and lowered al-Jamadi, blood gushed from his mouth “as if a faucet had been turned on,” according to the interview summary.

The military pathologist who ruled the case a homicide found several broken ribs and concluded al-Jamadi died from pressure to the chest and difficulty breathing.

Dr. Michael Baden, a distinguished civilian pathologist who reviewed the autopsy for a defense attorney in the case, agreed in an interview that the position in which al-Jamadi was suspended could have contributed to his death.

Al-Jamadi's Death per Joan Baez' Blog

Photographs of grinning GIs crouched over the iced-down, battered corpse of Manadel al-Jamadi were among the most horrific images of the 2003 Abu Ghraib prison scandal. The photos became one of the most powerful symbols for those who opposed to the American invasion of Iraq.

The Iraqi insurgent died within hours of his capture, while being interrogated by the CIA. A military autopsy ruled Jamadi's death a homicide, but no one has been held accountable for his death.

An NPR special report recounts the final hours of Jamadi's life, compiled from a review of thousands of CIA and military documents. Interviews with those present the night he died reveal the techniques used to extract information from Jamadi, and also show a discrepancy between military police and CIA agents about what happened just before his death.

Jamadi's Capture

The assignment was clear: kill or capture Jamadi. The CIA had identified the Iraqi as a former officer in Saddam Hussein's army and a key leader of a terrorist cell. He was also considered a suspect in an attack on the al-Rashid Hotel during a visit by Deputy Secretary of Defense Paul Wolfowitz in October 2003.

At 2 a.m. on Nov. 4, 2003, a convoy of humvees and blacked-out CIA Chevy Suburbans entered a deserted street in a hostile Baghdad suburb. The humvees stopped in front of a three-story apartment building, and a platoon of Navy SEALs tumbled out of the humvees and raced up the stairs.

SEAL Dan Cerrillo described the capture to CIA investigators six months later. As Cerrillo placed a charge on the apartment, the door opened. Cerrillo rushed the door, striking Jamadi with it.

Then, according to the report, Cerrillo hit Jamadi "in the face with two fists and attempted to wrestle the subject to the ground, but Jamadi resisted and they engaged in hand-to-hand combat." After a considerable struggle, Jamadi was eventually subdued and cuffed by Cerrillo, a hood was placed over his head, and he was taken first to an Army base, then to the SEALs field base, known as Camp Jenny Pozzi.

Jamadi was interrogated there for nearly an hour and a half. Eyewitnesses interviewed by CIA investigators say Jamadi was seated and stripped, and cold water was poured over him. A Navy SEAL said at one point, the interrogator leaned into a pressure point on Jamadi's chest with his foreman.

Jamadi was then moved to Abu Ghraib for further interrogation. At the prison, MPs stretched Jamadi's arms directly behind him and shackled his wrists to window bars. If the arms bear the full weight of the body, the position can be extremely painful. But MPs later told CIA investigators that Jamadi had been given enough slack to kneel or stand.

During this new round of questioning by CIA agents, Jamadi slumped forward, with his weight on his shackled wrists. MPs, while trying to reposition Jamadi, discovered he was dead. His death occurred within five-and-a-half hours of his capture.

Death Ruled a 'Homicide'

Nearly two years later, the CIA is still investigating Jamadi's death. A military autopsy labeled his death a homicide, due to "blunt force trauma to the torso complicated by compromised respiration."

Autopsy photos show lacerations and multiple bruises on Jamadi's feet, thighs and arms. His most significant injuries -- five broken ribs -- are not visible in the photos. There were no bruises in that area, leading military medical examiners to say that the fractures were probably caused by a slow, deliberate application of force, such as someone kneeling on his chest.

NPR consulted Dr. Edmund Donoghue, chief medical examiner of Cook County, Ill., and president of the American Academy of Forensic Scientists, on the military's autopsy report. Donoghue agreed with its findings.

How Jamadi was shackled "makes it very difficult to breathe because you are suspended in a very awkward position," Donoghue told NPR. "When you combine it with having the hood over your head and having broken ribs, it's fairly clear that this death was caused by asphyxia because he couldn't breathe properly," said Donoghue.

It remains unclear at what point Jamadi's ribs were broken.

Military officials who investigated the Abu Ghraib scandal made it clear that at the time of Jamadi's interrogation, the CIA was playing outside the rules.

A 2004 report by Major General George Fay concluded: "CIA detention and interrogation practices led to a loss of accountability, abuse, reduced interagency cooperation, and an unhealthy mystique that further poisoned the atmosphere at Abu Ghraib."

The SEALs denied hitting Jamadi with enough force during his capture and transport to cause any lethal injury. The leader of the SEAL platoon, Lt. Andrew Ledford, was acquitted on charges of dereliction of duty for allowing his men to beat Jamadi. Careers were wrecked but no one was convicted of a crime. No action has been taken by the CIA.

Human rights groups and some members of Congress have expressed frustration with the slow pace of the CIA's response in this and other cases of alleged detainee abuse by the agency. In an Army trial scheduled for December, the CIA will again be under scrutiny for its role in the death of an Iraqi general, who was stuffed into a sleeping bag and died, according to an autopsy, of asphyxia due to smothering and chest compression.

Testimony Details Last Hours of Iraqi Prisoner's Life

By Richard A. Serrano
Times Staff Writer

5:37 PM PDT, May 17, 2004

WASHINGTON — When CIA officers brought the Iraqi detainee to Abu Ghraib prison, his head was covered with an empty sandbag and Army guards were ordered to take him directly to a shower room that served as a makeshift interrogation center at the overcrowded, shell-damaged facility outside Baghdad.

An hour later, in the midst of intensive questioning by military intelligence officials, the prisoner collapsed and died. Only then did interrogators remove the hood to reveal severe head wounds that had never been treated.

The dead prisoner, whose identity has not been made public, would become famous around the world in the photograph of the body wrapped in plastic sheeting and packed in ice - among the grisliest images yet made public in the Iraqi prisoner abuse scandal.

An account of his final hours - and of the failure to provide medical attention to a severely wounded prisoner - is contained in sworn testimony statements provided to Army investigators by military police guards at Abu Ghraib.

Even after the prisoner died, the documents say, officials continued to pursue their own agendas: They haggled over who was responsible for the body. Eventually, the body deteriorated to where it had to be disposed.

The official documents describing the grim episode were based on testimony at a secret military court hearing held last month on the charges against Sgt. Javal Davis, one of seven members of the 372nd Military Police Company accused of beating and humiliating Iraqi detainees.

"He wasn't dead at first," said Spc. Jason A. Kenner, explaining that guards were told not to remove the prisoner's hood when they took him to the shower room.

"We didn't know how much he was injured. He went into the showers for interrogation, and about an hour later he died on them. I was sent to find out what was going on. Later that day, they decided to put him on ice."

"After he passed [away], the sandbag was removed and I saw that he was severely beaten on his face," Kenner testified. "At the time, they would interrogate people in the shower rooms. He was shackled to the wall. The shower room was just used because there was no other space available."

Another guard in the 372nd Company, Spc. Bruce Brown, said: "I heard of a dead detainee being stored in the hard site. We would spray air freshener to cover the scent. They finally took the body away."

In their testimony, Kenner and Brown agreed that the CIA brought the prisoner to Abu Ghraib and ordered guards to take him to the interrogation facility without removing the hood. They disagreed on who was involved in the subsequent questioning: Kenner said it was the CIA alone, while Brown said the CIA and military intelligence officers worked together.

Both Kenner and Brown referred to the CIA by its commonly used pseudonym, the OGA, or Other Government Agency. A CIA spokesman said he could not comment because the incident is under investigation by the agency's inspector general's office in conjunction with military investigations.

In other testimony at the Davis hearing, other guards said military intelligence officers routinely deprived prisoners of food, sleep, clothes and cigarettes, and sometimes sunshine, and expected guards to treat prisoners just as harshly or worse.

Separately, a key defendant in the scandal said in a sworn statement to Army investigators that mistreatment of prisoners was known and condoned throughout Abu Ghraib and no one ordered a halt to the abuses -- or to photographing humiliated inmates.

"Everyone in the company from the commander down" knew what was going on, said Pfc. Lynndie England, the Army soldier seen laughing, smoking and flashing the thumbs-up in front of naked male Iraqis. "The pictures were shown to anyone who wanted to see them. Cpl. (Charles) Graner told me he showed them to his platoon sergeant and platoon leader."

England said guards forced detainees to crawl on their hands and knees on broken glass, threw a nerf football at handcuffed prisoners and forced male detainees to wear women's sanitary "maxi pads."

She also said Graner, her lover with whom she is now pregnant, applied needle and thread to prisoners after beating them.

"Cpl. Graner would personally stitch up detainees if the wound weren't too bad," she said. "He would take pictures of his work. One particular incident Cpl. Graner ran a former Iraqi general into a wall and split his lip. Cpl. Graner stitched up his lip."

England, interviewed at Ft. Bragg, N.C., on May 5, said she did not believe the guards went too far in punishing detainees, and said that much of what happened at the prison's notorious Tier 1A was done in sport.

"We thought it looked funny so pictures were taken," she said. It was "basically us fooling around."

England described abuse by all seven defendants, including herself, except one -- Spc. Megan Ambuhl, who is not seen in any of the prison photographs. "She rarely participated," England said. "She really wasn't part of all this."

As have other defendants, England described Graner and Staff Sgt. Ivan L. (Chip) Frederick II as the leaders of the rogue guard unit, and said Davis was close behind.

"He was the intimidator," she said. "Very big. He would push them around or into walls. He also stepped on their toes. He would help with rowdy detainees."

"Personnel from MI (military intelligence) and OGA would tell us to keep it up, that we were doing a good job," she said. "I was just told we were doing a good job."

She said there were many other abuses, but "I can't remember all of them." And yet she felt no guards should be punished because "we did what we were told."

That excuse is at the heart of the defense of the seven accused guards. At the court hearing for Davis on April 7, Sgt. Hydrue S. Johnson described how he said intelligence officers held sway over guards.

A member of the 372nd Military Police Company that also was home to the seven guards now being prosecuted, Johnson testified that military intelligence officers never explicitly ordered guards to "rough up" detainees. But he said guards throughout the prison looked to the MIs for guidance on how to treat them.

"I did not question anything of MI personnel," Johnson testified. "They were there longer than me. I did not question them."

With the first court-martial scheduled for Wednesday, when Spc. Jeremy Sivits is expected to plead guilty and begin helping prosecutors in trying to convict the others, the statements by England, Johnson and others reflect the effort by some guards to show that prison interrogators must share the blame for abuses.

The interrogators helped establish a climate of abuse and Army supervisors did not intervene to stop the misconduct, they said.

Brown said he had "little to no contact with MI" officers. "I would only see them in passing, and said hi or bye," he said.

But, he added, "there were situations where they gave us ideas on how to treat detainees. They had sleep management plans and eating plans."

Kenner said intelligence officers "would take away their clothes and the detainees would sleep in their cells naked."

Sgt. William A. Cathcart, also of the 372nd, said he routinely asked MI and OGA officers how to properly handle detainees but he "got no response." Intelligence officers told him the interrogators were putting together a formal SOP, or standing operating procedure, "but I never saw it."

Still other guards testified that they would never have followed any direct encouragements to abuse or humiliate detainees, such as making them masturbate in front of others.

"If an MI (officer) told me to make detainees masturbate together, I would cut off his air supply," said Joyner. "This is not acceptable instruction to me. There is no special training to know this behavior is wrong, except 'life.' "

The End of America: Torture as an Empowering Lever of Fascism

Randi Rhodes Interviews Naomi Wolf on her crucial book:

"The End of America: Letters of Warning to a Young Patriot"

"... the conclusion is to rise up, and to understand that we have very little time."

Randi Rhodes: This book cuts across political parties and ideologies, it speaks directly to those among us who are concerned about the ever-tightening noose

(yes, noose) being placed around our necks, by taking away our liberties piece by piece ... It is a checklist, the ten things to do if you want to be a dictator in America, and I went through the list one day, with the audience, and it was so surprisingly easy to check off every one of the ten things. Now you did a great deal of research to show how the events of the last seven years in this country are parallel to steps taken in the worst dictatorships of the 20th Century. Would you like to go through them with us?

Naomi Wolf: I would be thrilled, especially since your audience are exactly the people who need to rise up and lead the charge to save the country before it's too late. What I did was look at various times and places when a would-be dictator or despot wanted to close down an open society or crush a pro-democracy movement. And so I looked at Italy in the 1920s, which was a parliamentary democracy, and Germany in the 1930s [also] a parliamentary democracy, I looked at Russia in the 1930s, East Germany in the 1950s, Czechoslovakia in the 1960s, China's crackdown on democracy at the end of the 1980s, and Pinochet's coup in Chile in 1973. What I saw made my hair stand on end. ... All would-be dictators do the same ten things, whether they are on the right or the left, and those ten things are happening in America. I will do the first four, because it is too scary to do all ten at once. The first thing a would-be dictator always does is to #1: Invoke A Terrifying Internal and External Threat, and often that threat is real, and they will manipulate the fear of it. For example, Stalin talked about "sleeper cells," now readers of End of America will see a lot of recycling of phrases and images and actual sound-bites from the Greatest Hits of Mid-20th Century Dictatorship. Stalin talked about "sleeper cells," he invented this. These were capitalist agents who were going to hide among the Soviet citizens and cause terror. Pinochet talked about "armed insurgents," and there were armed insurgents, but then he used hyped documents to scare people, and we have seen hyped documents with the yellow cake. So the second thing they always do is #2: Create A Gulag, i.e., develop a secret prison system outside the rule of law, where torture takes place. And often, they will have military tribunals that strip prisoners of due process. And of course, despite the White House sound-bites, "We don't torture, we don't torture," they are torturing people right now -- in our name, at this very moment. The reason it is so worrying to us here in Middle America, innocent American citizens that we are ... We should worry about these brown people that are being tortured on this island, not only for the moral reasons, but because would-be despots always start with people on the margins and move to the center. So in Germany, they started torturing, when torture was still illegal, anarchists, communists, homosexuals, Jews, whatever, and the Germans were fine with that, but always there is this blurring of the line, where within a very few months, or after a year and half, as in the case of Germany, they will go after people at the heart of civil society, meaning you and me, Randi, and a lot of people listening, activists, labor leaders, opposition leaders, outspoken clergy; and the evidence of this not being an exaggerated fear is that the President has claimed the right to call anyone an enemy combatant. If he says I am an enemy combatant, then I am an enemy combatant, and I can be taken to a cell and kept there in solitary confinement.

Randi Rhodes: And we know that it has happened to journalists. Recently. There is a story out there about an Associated Press journalist, a Pulitzer Prize winning photo-journalist, there was this drumbeat of "that person is a terrorist," and he has been detained by the United States, we don't know where he is, we don't know what the charges are, he doesn't know what the charges are, and simply talking about that person will get you angry letters from Gen. Petraeus' right hand guy. ...

and it has been a year and a half. And because he had the audacity to question the detainment of this person, Glenn Greenwald got these crazy e-mails from ... Gen. Petraeus' public affairs officer.

Naomi Wolf: I think this is the same AP photographer whom I mention in my chapter about going after the press, Bilal Hussein, and yes, he was taking pictures of women and children who are casualties of the war, very moving and emotional pictures. He is a Pulitzer Prize winner, and they disappeared him. He is gone. I see what they are doing to reporters in Iraq as practice, because they are going after reporters here at home as well. For example, Greg Palast, who wrote Armed Madhouse, was investigated by the Department of Homeland Security. There is a record number of journalists in prison. Josh Wolf, a blogger, is in jail in San Francisco. There are these drumbeats, like to call Bill Keller a "traitor," and prosecute him for treason for publishing the SWIFT banking stories.

Now what is so chilling about that is that if you read Stalin, it is one of those recycling moments, Stalin actually charged the publisher of Ivestia, the equivalent of the NY Times, with treason in 1936. Right-wing pundits were calling for Bill Keller to be executed. And Nikolai Bukarin was actually executed. So it is not a happy trajectory. ...

Randi Rhodes: ... This book is so well-researched, and it shows clearly that the secret to all dictatorships, to all repressive leaders, the way that they seize power is incremental and it always takes a similar route to the one we are seeing in the United States. ... Now, we are up to #3, and #3 is one of the most troubling for people to digest, although the recent news is going to make it easier ...

Naomi Wolf: ... #3: Develop A Thug Caste, i.e., a military force that is not answerable to the people. We know Blackwater has closed ties to George Bush. We know Blackwater just got a billion dollar contract to closer to home. We know that they just murdered 17 civilians in cold blood in Iraq. We know that the State Department is covering up for them. And that's a bad sign, because we know that what happens in a fascist shift, the state starts to protect its torturers and murderers. Most people don't know that the guys who work for Blackwater are hand-selected from countries like Chile, Nicaragua, Ecuador, Salvador, Nigeria -- places where the paramilitary and the military are trained to torture their own civilians. And not only that, most people do not know that Blackwater is already working with Homeland Security, patrolling the streets of New Orleans after Katrina, and Jeremy Scahill reported that contractors were firing at civilians in New Orleans, and most of us need to know that Blackwater's business plans call for expanded operations in the United States in the event of a natural disaster, or a "public emergency." And to close the circle, the 2007 Defense Authorization Act gives the President, on his say-so alone, the power to define a "public emergency," deploy either Blackwater or federalized National Guard, and tell Congress after the fact. Why is this so frightening? Why does this keep me up at night? I was in Chicago last week, and people told me, "Oh yeah, Blackwater just opened a training facility in Fremont, Illinois, right near the Mississippi River, a major waterway for the United States. ... Blackwater has been positioned along the Mexican border. ... What is on their web site? News about unruly demonstrators in New York. NOTHING stops the President from, tomorrow, sending Blackwater to taser, or worse, protesters who are "out of control" ... on the streets of your home town or mine ... And you mentioned, Randi, that all would-be dictators #4: Setup An Internal Surveillance System and aim it at ordinary citizens. Mussolini pioneered this, Hitler took over from that, Stalin perfected it, the East

German Stasi made it into an art form, and you do not have to surveil most citizens, only 10% of East Germans were under surveillance, but everyone thought they had a file, so I believe that all of this information about FISA coming from the White House is messaging to us that nothing is private anymore. The reason this is so disturbing personally to me is that when you go on to an airplane now, they know what you are reading, who your seat mate is, who you are going to visit when you get off the plane, and what their phone number is. This really scares me to death personally, because for a year and a half, every time I got on a plane, I would be taken aside and given extra searching ... There is a watch list, and a no-fly list combined. The White House now says that there are almost 800,000 Americans on it, and I am on it. I was off it for a year and a half, but on my last flight from LA back to here, I was terrified because I had just been interviewing someone who had been detained in LA for five hours, and had her green card removed, and was threatened with being put in a cell and locked up, the Chairman of the Board of Greenpeace International, and I am back on the watch list, and there are critics of the administration, environmentalists, peace activists on the watch list, and are getting harassed when they fly, people like Richard Murphy, a top Constitutional scholar, who had just given a speech that was critical of Bush ... [Sen.] Ted Kennedy is on the watch list, staff at the ACLU are on the watch list ... a colonel in the military who has been critical of the Iraq war, he is on the watch list, his sixteen year old son is on the watch list, and his 83-year-old mother is on the watch list.

So why is this so terrifying? It is just a hassle when they take you aside for extra checking, but in a closing society, based on the historical blueprint, and these blueprints are predictive, readers of The End of America can tell from the historical blueprint what is going to happen six months from now. Based on the historical blueprint, you could predict what happens in February, which horrifies me, which are that the borders are going to close, the way they did it in Germany and Russia, meaning in February a little noticed proviso says you are going to need apply to the government for permission to fly out of the country. And I am sorry to tell you that this is a hallmark, a turning point, a no going back point of a closing society.

Randi Rhodes: Which brings us to #5, which is harass citizens groups how small or trivial, it could be a small church in Pasadena where the minister was preaching that Jesus was in favor of peace, or it could be the ACLU ... We know that the Quakers in Florida, who simply wanted to debate whether or not the recruiters should have access to schools [were targeted]. Of course, we found out the hard way that inside of No Child Left Behind, there is a mandate that you must open your schools to recruiters. So the setup of the internal surveillance system leads right into #5: Harass Citizens' Groups, the harassment of citizens groups, and #6: Engage in Arbitrary Detention and Release -- I am so proud of you for noticing this -- I have always been sort of confused and confounded by the catch and release program that we have at Guantanamo Bay and that we had at Abu Ghraib ... We found out that the people in Abu Ghraib that had been rounded up and put in a prison that was under mortar attack, which is a big no-no in the military, but they did it, were literally released because they had done nothing; after we found out about the torture, we found out about the circumstances under which these people were rounded up, they had stolen a loaf of bread or a gallon of gas ... Same with Guantanamo ... There were rumors that there were six to eight hundred, but we are down to approximately two hundred, and they were just arbitrarily capturing and releasing people. Now what is the point of that?

Naomi Wolf: It is a really relevant question, especially now that Mukasey's nomination hinges on whether or not he is going to say it's torture, which it is, waterboarding is torture. If he does that, it is a fascinating and important moment -- because if he does say it, which he can't, but if they force him to the line of criminality goes right up to George Bush and Cheney, and they know this ... The legislation of the Military Commissions Act was designed to protect them, and their torturers, from being prosecuted. So what is the catch and release thing? You're absolutely right, most of the people in Guantanamo are innocent people who were handed over by bounty hunters for five thousand dollars ... It baffled me too, until I did the research on the purpose of torture.

There are huge profits to be made from a global war on terror, a hyped global war on terror ... Basically, at the end of the Cold War, that third of the economy that made Cold War weapons was looking at declining market share unless we found a new enemy, and so these same arms manufacturers have now shifted into security technologies and surveillance technologies, and they have lobbyists, and their lobbyists are working closely with Homeland Security, and writing these laws. So, in a hyped war, where billions are at stake, you need an enemy. Torture doesn't get better intelligence. Everyone who has interrogated people knows that. Torture gets you false confessions. And I looked at the Gulag, and how the same kinds of behavior that they are using ... at Guantanamo, they took right from Stalin's Gulag: the heat and cold, the standing positions ... And there are memoirs from the Gulag that say after three days of the standing positions, we would have signed anything. So, this is designed to get false confessions. In this horrific economy, I asked myself why, given the international community hates it, and it doesn't get good intelligence, Americans don't like it that much, why is torture so monomaniacally pursued by this administration?

And the answer, horrifically, is that a false confession of guilt by a brown person with a Moslem name has a very high economic value, and a very high political value, right now.

Randi Rhodes: The idea that there are independent contractors, or whatever you want to call them, that are actually getting paid to do this, and the uniformed military are the ones that take the fall, they go to Leavenworth. But there are paid people in there, instructing, and the orders come from on high. That Mukasey won't say whether waterboarding is torture, and the excuse that the White House gave is that he hasn't been read into the program ...

Meanwhile, we are reading articles publicly, about how beautifully it worked on Khalid Sheik Mohammed, the waterboarding ... You had supposedly CIA guys saying, "He lasted two minutes, two minutes is a long time for a waterboard guy to last." How could he take an oath to uphold the truth the whole truth and nothing but the truth in testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee and say, "Oh well I do not know that we do waterboard," and yet have a media reporting so widely that waterboarding worked so well with this guy.

Naomi Wolf: He can't say it. People do not understand what huge jeopardy he is putting the President in. He is really in an interesting corner. I do not think Congress really understands its power. If he acknowledges that waterboarding is torture, truly we can begin hearings -- and we should begin them now -- on criminal behavior on the part of the President, and Cheney, and right on down the chain of command. Because this came from the top.

Randi Rhodes: ...#7: Target Key Individuals ... Let's look at the parliament of Italy or the parliament of Germany, the Enabling Act and all of that. What makes Congress roll over and play dead like this? Is it that they are afraid? Is it that they have been wiretapped? Is it that they are being blackmailed? Are they being promised enormous amounts of profits? What made the Enabling Act possibly?

Naomi Wolf: Well, it seems clear from the historical record that someone in the White House has read history deeply, and reproducing tactics, because you are exactly right. What happened in 1931 to 1933 is that there was an alleged terrorist act, Communists allegedly set fire to the Reichstag, i.e., Congress. They said "Oh, my God, they have plans to blow up infrastructure, they have plans to blow up the water supply." They claimed there were all of these terrorist acts that they never had to produce the evidence for. Germans were petrified. And so, the parliament passed the Enabling Act because they didn't want to be seen as unpatriotic. And the Enabling Act is the model for the PATRIOT Act. It said, "Yes, you can open Germans mail, you can listen to their phones." It stripped Germans of civil liberties. It guts parliament of its own powers. The parliament right before Hitler became Chancellor weren't Nazis, but they were so intimidated by all of this that they gutted their own constitutional powers, which opened the door for the nightmare to come.

People do not realize that Hitler did not seize power in a coup. He seized power absolutely legally. He used the law to subvert the law, exactly as we are seeing now. So what happened to Congress? It is a good question. I do argue that surveillance intimidates people, because we all have secrets. And all of them know that their bisexuality, their affairs, their addictions, their conversations with their shrinks or their accountants are all transparent now. People are very intimidated when that happens. But I would have to say with the penumbra of violence that is emanating from this administration ... They are going after people's loved ones. Valerie Plame said that the bolts were taken off her deck, which is fifty feet above ground, and she has two small children. I do not know if they have received actual threats, but their complete passivity makes one speculate, because that is something that happens in a fascist shift. The brown shirts were lining the halls of parliament, even before Hitler was Chancellor, and the same in Italy, they were intimidating legislators. But there is enough sense of recrimination, violent intimidation, people being prosecuted, people going to jail in Alabama, that even without a direct threat to one's children, people would hesitate to engage in robust democracy if one was in Congress.

Randi Rhodes: And then, of course, my favorite, #8: Control the Press. Now the press, of course, is completely corporate these days, and yet there are still some voices out there, yours and mine included. And they can never really shutdown all of the truth-telling. So one of the tactics that has been used before you institute a complete state run media system is to inundate the air waves with an inordinate amount of lies, so that people do not know the difference anymore.

Naomi Wolf: That was such an insight to me, in reading about fascism and totalitarianism, there were all these good books coming out, like Frank Rich's and Amy Goodman's, pointing out the lies of the Bush administration, but when I was reading about Stalin, and the Chinese politburo, I realized that lying has a different function in a fascist shift. A would-be fascist, and I use that term quite technically, it's when the state starts to use violence against the individual to oppose democracy, which is what we are seeing now ... In a fascist shift, the leader lies in order to confuse people, in order to flood the plain of discourse with lies, so that citizens can no longer trust their agency. That's what we are seeing now.

Randi Rhodes: And then, of course, #9: Dissent Equals Treason. I think that is self-evident to each and every person listening, that US citizens have been broadly painted as "unpatriotic," broadly painted as "traitorous" for even suggesting that we question whether or not the shifting reasons for our occupation of an unarmed nation was legitimate, we are branded as less than American, less than patriotic, less than someone who would wear the uniform and die for our country, even though many of us did wear the uniform, and would have died for our country, if we had been asked. And then there is #10: Suspend the Rule of Law, i.e., a complete suspension of the rule of law. That's pretty much "case closed," isn't it?

Naomi Wolf: Unfortunately. We are in a very dire emergency. The conclusion isn't to despair, the conclusion is to rise up. And to understand that we have very little time. But the good news is that when millions of people do rise up, even in a closing democracy, they have great power to push back and restore the rule of law. You are right to be worried, especially about #10. At the end of the book, I have got these various scenarios, based on the historical record, about things that we are likely to see in the months running up to the election. The months leading up to the election, according to the blueprint, are very unstable, Randi. And we are likely to see hyped threats, agents provocateurs (i.e., agents of the state, dressed like protesters, but intent on creating disruptions, some kind of violence, to give the police an excuse to crack down violently on protesters) ... We are likely to see increased harassment of voting rights groups. I was reading Goebbels, and that's why I wasn't surprised that the White House tried to purge the whole civil service, with the US Attorneys scandal, because that is what Goebbels did in 1933, and that is what despots imitate ever since. He purged the civil service. He focused on lawyers and judges. Then you can still have elections, but it is over, essentially, because your guys are the ones deciding. So we are in very great peril. Congress and the people are wrong in thinking we can just vote them out, because based on the historical record, it is very unlikely that we are going to have a transparent election.

New Iraq Constitution Lays the Ground for Oil Field Sell-Off

"As Iraq goes to the polls in this month's referendum on the draft Constitution, the fate of the country's oil reserves has once again escaped public scrutiny – despite their central importance to Iraq's future economy."

Keeping Iraq's Oil in the Ground

By Greg Palast

AlterNet

Wednesday 14 June 2006

World oil production today stands at more than twice the 15-billion a-year maximum projected by Shell Oil in 1956 -- and reserves are climbing at a faster clip yet. That leaves the question, Why this war?

Did Dick Cheney send us in to seize the last dwindling supplies? Unlikely. Our world's petroleum reserves have doubled in just twenty-five years -- and it is in Shell's and the rest of the industry's interest that this doubling doesn't happen again. The neo-cons were hell-bent on raising Iraq's oil production. Big Oil's interest was in suppressing production, that is, keeping Iraq to its OPEC quota or less. This raises the question, did the petroleum industry, which had a direct, if hidden, hand, in promoting invasion, cheerlead for a takeover of Iraq to prevent overproduction?

It wouldn't be the first time. If oil is what we're looking for, there are, indeed, extra helpings in Iraq. On paper, Iraq, at 112 billion proven barrels, has the second largest reserves in OPEC after Saudi Arabia. That does not make Saudi Arabia happy. Even more important is that Iraq has fewer than three thousand operating wells... compared to one million in Texas.

That makes the Saudis even unhappier. It would take a decade or more, but start drilling in Iraq and its reserves will about double, bringing it within gallons of Saudi Arabia's own gargantuan pool. Should Iraq drill on that scale, the total, when combined with the Saudis', will drown the oil market. That wouldn't make the Texans too happy either.

So Fadhil Chalabi's plan for Iraq to pump 12 million barrels a day, a million more than Saudi Arabia, is not, to use Bob Ebel's (Center for Strategic and International Studies) terminology, "ridiculous" from a raw resource view, it is ridiculous politically. It would never be permitted. An international industry policy of suppressing Iraqi oil production has been in place since 1927.

We need again to visit that imp called "history."

It began with a character known as "Mr. 5%"-- Calouste Gulbenkian -- who, in 1925, slicked King Faisal, neophyte ruler of the country recently created by Churchill, into giving Gulbenkian's "Iraq Petroleum Company" (IPC) exclusive rights to all of Iraq's oil.

Gulbenkian flipped 95% of his concession to a combine of western oil giants: Anglo-Persian, Royal Dutch Shell, CFP of France, and the Standard Oil trust companies (now ExxonMobil and its "sisters.") The remaining slice Calouste kept for himself -- hence, "Mr. 5%."

The oil majors had a better use for Iraq's oil than drilling it -- not drilling it.

The oil bigs had bought Iraq's concession to seal it up and keep it off the market. To please his buyers' wishes, Mr. 5% spread out a big map of the Middle East on the floor of a hotel room in Belgium and drew a thick red line around the gulf oil fields, centered on Iraq.

All the oil company executives, gathered in the hotel room, signed their name on the red line -- vowing not to drill, except as a group, within the red-lined zone. No one, therefore, had an incentive to cheat and take red-lined oil.

All of Iraq's oil, sequestered by all, was locked in, and all signers would enjoy a lift in worldwide prices.

Anglo-Persian Company, now British Petroleum (BP), would pump almost all its oil, reasonably, from Persia (Iran). Later, the Standard Oil combine, renamed the Arabian-American Oil Company (Aramco), would limit almost all its drilling to Saudi Arabia. Anglo-Persian (BP) had begun pulling oil from Kirkuk, Iraq, in 1927 and, in accordance with the Red-Line Agreement, shared its Kirkuk and Basra fields with its IPC group -- and drilled no more.

The following was written three decades ago:

Although its original concession of March 14, 1925, covered all of Iraq, the Iraq Petroleum Co., under the ownership of BP (23.75%), Shell (23.75%), CFP [of France] (23.75%), Exxon (11.85%), Mobil (11.85%), and [Calouste] Gulbenkian (5.0%), limited its production to fields constituting only one-half of 1 percent of the country's total area.

During the Great Depression, the world was awash with oil and greater output from Iraq would simply have driven the price down to even lower levels.

Plus ça change...

When the British Foreign Office fretted that locking up oil would stoke local nationalist anger, BP-IPC agreed privately to pretend to drill lots of wells, but make them absurdly shallow and place them where, wrote a company manager, "there was no danger of striking oil."

This systematic suppression of Iraq's production, begun in 1927, has never ceased. In the early 1960s, Iraq's frustration with the British-led oil consortium's failure to pump pushed the nation to cancel the BP-Shell-Exxon concession and seize the oil fields.

Britain was ready to strangle Baghdad, but a cooler, wiser man in the White House, John F. Kennedy, told the Brits to back off.

President Kennedy refused to call Iraq's seizure an "expropriation" akin to Castro's seizure of U.S.-owned banana plantations. Kennedy's view was that Anglo-American companies had it coming to them because they had refused to honor their legal commitment to drill.

But the freedom Kennedy offered the Iraqis to drill their own oil to the maximum was swiftly taken away from them by their Arab brethren.

The OPEC cartel, controlled by Saudi Arabia, capped Iraq's production at a sum equal to Iran's, though the Iranian reserves are far smaller than Iraq's. The excuse for this quota equality between Iraq and Iran was to prevent war between them. It didn't.

To keep Iraq's Ba'athists from complaining about the limits, Saudi Arabia simply bought off the leaders by funding Saddam's war against Iran and giving the dictator $7 billion for his "Islamic bomb" program.

In 1974, a U.S. politician broke the omerta over the suppression of Iraq's oil production. It was during the Arab oil embargo that Senator Edmund Muskie revealed a secret intelligence report of "fantastic" reserves of oil in Iraq undeveloped because U.S. oil companies refused to add pipeline capacity.

Muskie, who'd just lost a bid for the Presidency, was dubbed a "loser" and ignored. The Iranian bombing of the Basra fields (1980-88) put a new kink in Iraq's oil production. Iraq's frustration under production limits explodes periodically.

In August 1990, Kuwait's craven siphoning of borderland oil fields jointly owned with Iraq gave Saddam the excuse to take Kuwait's share. Here was Saddam's opportunity to increase Iraq's OPEC quota by taking Kuwait's (most assuredly not approved by the U.S.). Saddam's plan backfired.

The Basra oil fields not crippled by Iran were demolished in 1991 by American B-52s.

Saddam's petro-military overreach into Kuwait gave the West the authority for a more direct oil suppression method called the "Sanctions" program, later changed to "Oil for Food." Now we get to the real reason for the U.N. embargo on Iraqi oil exports.

According to the official U.S. position:

Sanctions were critical to preventing Iraq from acquiring equipment that could be used to reconstitute banned weapons of mass destruction (WMD) programs.

How odd.

If cutting Saddam's allowance was the purpose, then sanctions, limiting oil exports, was a very suspect method indeed. The nature of the oil market (a cartel) is such that the elimination of two million barrels a day increased Saddam's revenue.

One might conclude that sanctions were less about WMD and more about EPS (earnings per share) of oil sellers.

In other words, there is nothing new under the desert sun. Today's fight over how much of Iraq's oil to produce (or suppress) simply extends into this century the last century's pump-or-control battles. In sum, Big Oil, whether in European or Arab-OPEC dress, has done its damned best to keep Iraq's oil buried deep in the ground to keep prices high in the air. Iraq has 74 known fields and only 15 in production; 526 known "structures" (oil-speak for "pools of oil"), only 125 drilled.

And they won't be drilled, not unless Iraq says, "Mother, may I?" to Saudi Arabia, or, as the James Baker/Council on Foreign Relations paper says, "Saudi Arabia may punish Iraq." And believe me, Iraq wouldn't want that.

The decision to expand production has, for now, been kept out of Iraqi's hands by the latest method of suppressing Iraq's oil flow -- the 2003 invasion and resistance to invasion. And it has been darn effective.

Iraq's output in 2003, 2004 and 2005 was less than produced under the restrictive Oil-for-Food Program.

Whether by design or happenstance, this decline in output has resulted in tripling the profits of the five U.S. oil majors to $89 billion for a single year, 2005, compared to pre-invasion 2002.

That suggests an interesting arithmetic equation. Big Oil's profits are up $89 billion a year in the same period the oil industry boosted contributions to Mr. Bush's reelection campaign to roughly $40 million.

That would make our president "Mr. 0.05%."

A History of Oil in Iraq

Suppressing It,

Not Pumping It

- Ø 1925-28. "Mr. 5%" sells his monopoly on Iraq's oil to British Petroleum and Exxon, who sign a "Red-Line Agreement" vowing not to compete by drilling independently in Iraq.
- Ø 1948. Red-Line Agreement ended, replaced by oil combines' "dog in the manger" strategy -- taking control of fields, then capping production--drilling shallow holes where "there was no danger of striking oil."
- Ø 1961. OPEC, founded the year before, places quotas on Iraq's exports equal to Iran's, locking in suppression policy.
- Ø 1980-88. Iran-Iraq War. Iran destroys Basra fields. Iraq cannot meet OPEC quota.
- Ø 1991. Desert Storm. Anglo-American bombings cut production.
- Ø 1991-2003. United Nations Oil embargo (zero legal exports) followed by Oil-for-Food Program limiting Iraqi sales to 2 million barrels a day.
- Ø 2003-? "Insurgents" sabotage Iraq's pipelines and infrastructure.
- Ø 2004. Options for Iraqi Oil. The secret plan adopted by U.S. State Department overturns Pentagon proposal to massively increase oil production. State Department plan, adopted by government of occupied Iraq, limits state oil company to OPEC quotas.

The preceding article is excerpted from Greg Palast's new book, Armed Madhouse (Dutton Adult, 2006).

The Corporate-U.S. Takeover of the Iraq Economy

How the Iraq occupation embedded US corporations into the Iraq economy, satisfying a multi-decade design on Iraq's oil wealth.

The roots of the economic takeover of Iraq are long and deep. They became more aggressive after the strongest U.S. ally in the region, the Shah of Iran, was deposed in the 1979. The roots of the quest of dominance of the oil-rich region are found in both the Democratic and Republican Party, but the most aggressive pursuit has been by George W. Bush.

Former President Jimmy Carter wrote in his memoirs that many Americans "deeply resented that the greatest nation on the earth was being jerked around by a few desert states." And, when he was president he put forward "the Carter Doctrine" in a State of the Union Address in 1980 that acknowledged "the overwhelming dependence of the Western democracies on oil supplies from the Middle East" and promised military force would be used to ensure access to Middle East oil: "Any attempt by an outside force to gain control of the Persian Gulf will be regarded as an assault on the vital interests of the United States of America and . . . will be repelled by any means necessary including the use of force."

But, according to a book by Antonia Juhasz, "The Bush Agenda," it was the Reagan, Bush I and Bush II administrations that most aggressively pursued the Iraq oil economy. Her excellent book tells a story that explains the reasons for the invasion and occupation of Iraq. It shows how the Reagan and Bush I administrations began by building a friendly trade relationship that provided money, arms, intelligence, and political protection to Saddam Hussein -- despite his brutal record as a despotic dictator. And, how the Clinton years led to 'regime change' in Iraq becoming the policy of the United States and naturally following that was the Bush II's military invasion of the country.

She highlights the web of corporate interests from the oil, oil engineering and military sectors of the U.S. economy that have combined with government to the build-up to the invasion of Iraq. Many of the corporate players -- Chevron, Bechtel, Lockheed Martin and Halliburton -- have corporate leaders who went into and out of government over the years, influencing the direction of U.S. policy and then ensuring that their corporations profited mightily from the policies they put in place. Juhasz points to Dick Cheney, Donald Rumsfeld, L. Paul Bremer, Scooter Libby, Robert Zoellick, Paul Wolfowitz, Zalmay Khalizad and George Shultz, as key players in the long term quest to take over Iraq's economy.

The Root of the Problem: Corporate Globalization of Trade

The story of the invasion of Iraq and theft of the Iraqi economy is part of a larger story of multi-national corporations and corporate globalization affecting much of the world. Under the guise of "free trade" economic policies that make multinational corporations more powerful than governments.

Laws favoring corporations are put in place: less regulation, less commitment to specific locations, and restrictions on government preventing the shift of economic benefit away from small, local business, workers, consumers and the environment.

Globalization of trade claims to benefit by trickling down the profit, but in reality it continues to funnel wealth to the top -- making the rich richer, the poor poorer and the middle class smaller.

Summary

"THE GRAND CHESSBOARD - American Primacy And It's Geostrategic Imperatives," Zbigniew Brzezinski, Basic Books, 1997.

These are the very first words in the book: "Ever since the continents started interacting politically, some five hundred years ago, Eurasia has been the center of world power." - p. xiii. Eurasia is all of the territory east of Germany and Poland, stretching all the way through Russia and China to the Pacific Ocean. It includes the Middle East and most of the Indian subcontinent. The key to controlling Eurasia, says Brzezinski, is controlling the Central Asian Republics. And the key to controlling the Central Asian republics is Uzbekistan. Thus, it comes as no surprise that Uzbekistan was forcefully mentioned by President George W. Bush in his address to a joint session of Congress, just days after the attacks of September 11, as the very first place that the U.S. military would be deployed.

As FTW has documented in previous stories, major deployments of U.S. and British forces had taken place before the attacks. And the U.S. Army and the CIA had been active in Uzbekistan for several years. There is now evidence that what the world is witnessing is a cold and calculated war plan -- at least four years in the making -- and that, from reading Brzezinski's own words about Pearl Harbor, the World Trade Center attacks were just the trigger needed to set the final conquest in motion.

EXCERPTS: BRZEZINSKI on EURASIA

MR. B's BIO as it appears on the TRILATERAL COMMISSION website.....

"Zbigniew Brzezinski played an important role in the formation of the Commission. He was its first Director (1973-76) and its major intellectual dynamo in those years. Dr. Brzezinski rejoined the Commission in 1981 and now serves on the Executive Committee. President Carter was a member from mid-1973 until his election, when he left in accordance with Commission rules barring individuals holding administration posts. President Bush was invited to join in early 1977 after he left the government. He resigned in late 1978, two years before he became Vice President. Richard B. Cheney was a Commission member from 1997 until he became a candidate for the Vice Presidency and resigned in 2000." -- Trilateral Commission

- 1997 - In his book, The Grand Chessboard, Dr. Zbigniew Brzezinski (former national security advisor for President Carter, former director of the Council on Foreign Relations, and a member of the Trilateral Commission along with Bush Sr. and Dick Cheney) writes of an imperialistic endeavor of controlling the world's vast natural resources (oil, natural gas, minerals, gold, etc.) and also human labor in Eurasia (specifically central Asia/Uzbekistan) that the U.S. must undertake to maintain global domination despite the American public's indecisiveness towards the external projection of American power (in which he reminds the reader that the American public supported U.S.'s engagement in World War II largely because of the shock effect of the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor) and cautions that it will become more difficult to establish consensus on foreign policy issues with an ever increasingly multi-cultural society in America unless the public widely perceives a massive direct external threat.

"... The defeat and collapse of the Soviet Union was the final step in the rapid ascendance of a Western Hemisphere power, the United States, as the sole and, indeed, the first truly global power... (p. xiii)

"... But in the meantime, it is imperative that no Eurasian challenger emerges, capable of dominating Eurasia and thus of also challenging America. The formulation of a comprehensive and integrated Eurasian geostrategy is therefore the purpose of this book. (p. xiv)

"The attitude of the American public toward the external projection of American power has been much more ambivalent. The public supported America's engagement in World War II largely because of the shock effect of the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor. (p. 24-25)

"For America, the chief geopolitical prize is Eurasia... Now a non-Eurasian power is preeminent in Eurasia - and America's global primacy is directly dependent on how long and how effectively its preponderance on the Eurasian continent is sustained." (p.30)

"In that context, how America 'manages' Eurasia is critical... A power that dominates Eurasia would control two of the world's three most advanced and economically productive regions. A mere glance at the map also suggests that control over Eurasia would almost automatically entail Africa's subordination, rendering the Western Hemisphere and Oceania geopolitically peripheral to the world's central continent. About 75 per cent of the world's people live in Eurasia, and most of the world's physical wealth is there as well, both in its enterprises and underneath its soil. Eurasia accounts for 60 per cent of the world's GNP and about three-fourths of the world's known energy resources." (p.31)

"It is also a fact that America is too democratic at home to be autocratic abroad. This limits the use of America's power, especially its capacity for military intimidation. Never before has a populist democracy attained international supremacy. But the pursuit of power is not a goal that commands popular passion, except in conditions of a sudden threat or challenge to the public's sense of domestic well-being. The economic self-denial (that is, defense spending) and the human sacrifice (casualties, even among professional soldiers) required in the effort are uncongenial to democratic instincts. Democracy is inimical to imperial mobilization." (p.35)

"Two basic steps are thus required: first, to identify the geostrategically dynamic Eurasian states that have the power to cause a potentially important shift in the international distribution of power and to decipher the central external goals of their respective political elites and the likely consequences of their seeking to attain them... second, to formulate specific U.S. policies to offset, co-opt, and/or control the above..." (p. 40)

"...To put it in a terminology that harkens back to the more brutal age of ancient empires, the three grand imperatives of imperial geostrategy are to prevent collusion and maintain security dependence among the vassals, to keep tributaries pliant and protected, and to keep the barbarians from coming together." (p.40)

"Henceforth, the United States may have to determine how to cope with regional coalitions that seek to push America out of Eurasia, thereby threatening America's status as a global power." (p.55)

"Uzbekistan, nationally the most vital and the most populous of the central Asian states, represents the major obstacle to any renewed Russian control over the region. Its independence is critical to the survival of the other Central Asian states, and it is the least vulnerable to Russian pressures." (p. 121)

"Moreover, they [the Central Asian Republics] are of importance from the standpoint of security and historical ambitions to at least three of their most immediate and more powerful neighbors, namely Russia, Turkey and Iran, with China also signaling an increasing political interest in the region. But the Eurasian Balkans are infinitely more important as a potential economic prize: an enormous concentration of natural gas and oil reserves is located in the region, in addition to important minerals, including gold." (p.124)

"The world's energy consumption is bound to vastly increase over the next two or three decades. Estimates by the U.S. Department of energy anticipate that world demand will rise by more than 50 percent between 1993 and 2015, with the most significant increase in consumption occurring in the Far East. The momentum of Asia's economic development is already generating massive pressures for the exploration and exploitation of new sources of energy and the Central Asian region and the Caspian Sea basin are known to contain reserves of natural gas and oil that dwarf those of Kuwait, the Gulf of Mexico, or the North Sea." (p.125)

"Uzbekistan is, in fact, the prime candidate for regional leadership in Central Asia." (p.130)

"Once pipelines to the area have been developed, Turkmenistan's truly vast natural gas reserves augur a prosperous future for the country's people." (p.132)

"In fact, an Islamic revival -- already abetted from the outside not only by Iran but also by Saudi Arabia -- is likely to become the mobilizing impulse for the increasingly pervasive new nationalisms, determined to oppose any reintegration under Russian -- and hence infidel -- control." (p. 133).

"For Pakistan, the primary interest is to gain Geostrategic depth through political influence in Afghanistan -- and to deny to Iran the exercise of such influence in Afghanistan and Tajikistan -- and to benefit eventually from any pipeline construction linking Central Asia with the Arabian Sea." (p.139)

"Turkmenistan... has been actively exploring the construction of a new pipeline through Afghanistan and Pakistan to the Arabian Sea..." (p.145)

"It follows that America's primary interest is to help ensure that no single power comes to control this geopolitical space and that the global community has unhindered financial and economic access to it." (p148)

"China's growing economic presence in the region and its political stake in the area's independence are also congruent with America's interests." (p.149)

"America is now the only global superpower, and Eurasia is the globe's central arena. Hence, what happens to the distribution of power on the Eurasian continent will be of decisive importance to America's global primacy and to America's historical legacy." (p.194)

"Without sustained and directed American involvement, before long the forces of global disorder could come to dominate the world scene. And the possibility of such a fragmentation is inherent in the geopolitical tensions not only of today's Eurasia but of the world more generally." (p.194)

"With warning signs on the horizon across Europe and Asia, any successful American policy must focus on Eurasia as a whole and be guided by a Geostrategic design." (p.197)

"That puts a premium on maneuver and manipulation in order to prevent the emergence of a hostile coalition that could eventually seek to challenge America's primacy..." (p. 198)

"The most immediate task is to make certain that no state or combination of states gains the capacity to expel the United States from Eurasia or even to diminish significantly its decisive arbitration role." (p. 198)

"In the long run, global politics are bound to become increasingly uncongenial to the concentration of hegemonic power in the hands of a single state. Hence, America is not only the first, as well as the only, truly global superpower, but it is also likely to be the very last." (p.209)

"Moreover, as America becomes an increasingly multi-cultural society, it may find it more difficult to fashion a consensus on foreign policy issues, except in the circumstance of a truly massive and widely perceived direct external threat."
(p. 211)

8.17 Western Intelligence Support for the Development of Islamic Radicalism

[This article also referenced under 5.1]

Born in the CIA

by Amjad Hussain

There are hundreds of similar madrassas in Pakistan and Afghanistan. How a religious school located along the turbulent North Western Frontier of Pakistan came to be the training ground for the likes of Taliban of Afghanistan and their supporters in Pakistan is an interesting question. The answer, however, lies not in the devastated Afghan countryside or in Pakistan but in Langley, Virginia, the home of America's Central Intelligence Agency. After the Soviet withdrew from Afghanistan, the country was engulfed in a bloody civil war. The Taliban were the answer to the nasty conflict between the warring factions of Afghan freedom fighters or mujahideen. To understand the Taliban phenomenon, we need to rewind to the early days of the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan.

The US was "caught off guard....."

[NOTE: See Brzezinski's contention to the contrary on the following page.]

..... when the Soviet forces entered Afghanistan in 1979. Though an indigenous Islamic resistance movement had arisen against the Soviets, it had no chance of succeeding on its own. America, for its own strategic reasons, was eager to help but needed a common link that the mujahideen could identify with. That common link between America and its allies and the hapless mujahideen turned out to be religion.

From that point on, the struggle was between the camps of believers and non-believers or as was stated at the time, between Dar-ul-Islam, the abode of the faithful, and Dar-ul-Harb, the abode of the infidels. This medieval concept envisioned the world into two distinct camps. Once inside the abode of the faithful, the West became a full partner in jihad against the Soviet infidels.

For ten years (1979-1989), the CIA and the Pakistan army trained and equipped mujahideen and Muslim mercenaries from around the world to fight the Soviet infidels. Armed with the latest American weapons and burning with religious zeal, the mujahideen took on a super power and defeated it. But at an enormous cost. Five million Afghans were forced to flee the country, the land was devastated and a pervasive gun and drug culture permeated Afghanistan and next door Pakistan.

1986-1992: CIA and British Recruit and Train Militants Worldwide To Help Fight Afghan War

According to Australian journalist John Pilger, in this year, "CIA Director William Casey [gives] his backing to a plan put forward by Pakistan's intelligence agency, the ISI, to recruit people from around the world to join the Afghan jihad. More than 100,000 Islamic militants [are] trained in Pakistan between 1986 and 1992, in camps overseen by the CIA and [the British intelligence agency] MI6, with the [British special forces unit] SAS training future al-Qaeda and Taliban fighters in bomb-making and other black arts. Their leaders [are] trained at a CIA camp in Virginia."

This operation is named Operation Cyclone. While the operation is originally designed to defeat the Soviets in Afghanistan, it continues for several years after the Soviets leave Afghanistan in 1989. [Guardian, 9/20/2003]

EXCERPT: American Support of Jihadis
Through the CIA's Intervention in Afghanistan

Interview with Zbigniew Brzezinski,
Founding Member of the Trilateral Commission
President Jimmy Carter's National Security Adviser

According to this 1998 interview with Zbigniew Brzezinski, the CIA's intervention in Afghanistan preceded the 1979 Soviet invasion. This decision of the Carter Administration in 1979 to intervene and destabilise Afghanistan is the root cause of Afghanistan's destruction as a nation.

Q: And neither do you regret having supported the Islamic fundamentalism, having given arms and advice to future terrorists?

B: What is most important to the history of the world? The Taliban or the collapse of the Soviet empire? Some stirred-up Moslems or the liberation of Central Europe and the end of the cold war?

Q: Some stirred-up Moslems? But it has been said and repeated Islamic fundamentalism represents a world menace today.

B: Nonsense! It is said that the West had a global policy in regard to Islam. That is stupid. There isn't a global Islam. Look at Islam in a rational manner and without demagoguery or emotion. It is the leading religion of the world with 1.5 billion followers. But what is there in common among Saudi Arabian fundamentalism, moderate Morocco, Pakistan militarism, Egyptian pro-Western or Central Asian secularism? Nothing more than what unites the Christian countries.

<http://www.globalresearch.ca/articles/BRZ110A.html>

The CIA's "Operation Cyclone:"

Stirring the Hornet's Nest of Islamic Unrest

[Zbigniew] Brzezinski not long ago revealed that on July 3, 1979, unknown to the American public and Congress, President Jimmy Carter secretly authorised $500 million to create an international terrorist movement that would spread Islamic fundamentalism in Central Asia and "destabilise" the Soviet Union.....

The CIA called this Operation Cyclone and in the following years poured $4 billion into setting up Islamic training schools in Pakistan (Taliban means "student").

Young zealots were sent to the CIA's spy training camp in Virginia, where future members of al-Qaeda were taught "sabotage skills" -- terrorism.

Others were recruited at an Islamic school in Brooklyn, New York, within sight of the fated Twin Towers.

In Pakistan, they were directed by British MI6 officers and trained by the SAS.

The result, quipped Brzezinski, was "a few stirred up Muslims" -- meaning the Taliban.

The Wall Street Journal declared: "The Taliban are the players most capable of achieving peace. Moreover, they were crucial to secure the country as a prime trans-shipment route for the export of Central Asia's vast oil, gas and other natural resources."

No American newspaper dares suggest that the prisoners in Camp X-Ray are the product of this policy, nor that it was one of the factors that led to the attacks of September 11.

Nor do they ask: who were the real winners of September 11?

The day the Wall Street stock market opened after the destruction of the Twin Towers, the few companies showing increased value were the giant military contractors Alliant Tech Systems, Northrop Gruman, Raytheon (a contributor to New Labour) and Lockheed Martin.

As the US military's biggest supplier, Lockheed Martin's share value rose by a staggering 30 per cent.

Within six weeks of September 11, the company (with its main plant in Texas, George Bush's home state) had secured the biggest military order in history: a $200 billion contract to develop a new fighter aircraft. The greatest taboo of all, which Orwell would surely recognise, is the record of the United States as a terrorist state and haven for terrorists.

This truth is virtually unknown by the American public and makes a mockery of Bush's (and Blair's) statements about "tracking down terrorists wherever they are."

They don't have to look far.

Florida, currently governed by the President's brother, Jeb Bush, has given refuge to terrorists who, like the September 11 gang, have hijacked aircraft and boats with guns and knives.

Most have never had criminal charges brought against them.

Why? All of them are anti-Castro Cubans. Former Guatemalan Defence Minister Gramajo Morales, who was accused of "devising and directing an indiscriminate campaign of terror against civilians," including the torture of an American nun and the massacre of eight people from one family, studied at Harvard University on a US government scholarship.

During the 1980s, thousands of people were murdered by death squads connected to the army of El Salvador, whose former chief now lives comfortably in Florida.

The former Haitian dictator, General Prosper Avril, liked to display the bloodied victims of his torture on television.

When he was overthrown, he was flown to Florida by the US government, and granted political asylum.

A leading member of the Chilean military during the reign of General Pinochet, whose special responsibility was executions and torture, lives in Miami.

The Iranian general who ran Iran's notorious prisons, is a wealthy exile in the US.

One of Pol Pot's senior henchmen, who enticed Cambodian exiles back to their certain death, lives in Mount Vernon, New York.

What all these people have in common, apart from their history of terrorism, is that they either worked directly for the US government or carried out the dirty work of US policies.

The al-Qaeda training camps are kindergartens compared with the world's leading university of terrorism at Fort Benning in Georgia.

Known until recently as the School of the Americas, its graduates include almost half the cabinet ministers of the genocidal regimes in Guatemala, two thirds of the El Salvadorean army officers who committed, according to the United Nations, the worst atrocities of that country's civil war, and the head of Pinochet's secret police, who ran Chile's concentration camps.

There is terrible irony at work here. The humane response of people all over the world to the terrorism of September 11 has long been hijacked by those running a rapacious great power with a history of terrorism second to none.

Global supremacy, not the defeat of terrorism, is the goal; only the politically blind believe otherwise.

The "Bosnian" Pattern Replicated in Kosovo, Macedonia, and Chechnya

by Kurt Nimmo

EXCERPTS:

Don't expect our corporate media "op-ed" stenographers to deviate from their Pentagon and neocon generated scripts and connect the dots now that another in-your-face link between "al-Qaeda" terrorism and state-sponsored terrorism (one in the same) has surfaced.

"Omar Khyam, an accused leader among seven men charged in 2004 with stockpiling half a ton of explosives in an Al Qaeda-linked bombing plot, took the stand Tuesday long enough to refuse to continue his testimony. The judge temporarily adjourned the trial, which began in March," reports the Los Angeles Times. "On Monday, Khyam stunned his own lawyer when he declared that his relatives in Pakistan had been intimidated in recent days by agents of the powerful Inter-Services Intelligence agency, which has a shadowy history of contacts with Islamic extremist networks."

No mention here of the "shadowy" fact the ISI is a branch office of the CIA. "A number of officers from the ISI's Covert Action Division received training in the US and many covert action experts of the CIA were attached to the ISI to guide it in its operations against the Soviet troops by using the Afghan Mujahideen, Islamic fundamentalists of Pakistan and Arab volunteers," writes B. Raman for the South Asia Analysis Group. These "Arab volunteers" and "Islamic fundamentalists," of the most virulent strain (Saudi Wahhabism), are now known as "al-Qaeda," a wily and phantasmal enemy specifically designed to serve as a forever enemy, an elusive Goldsteinesque enemy explicitly engineered to pose a threat in perpetuum.

For instance, as Michel Chossudovsky notes, the "Bosnian pattern," as described in a Republican Party Committee congressional report published in 1997, "was replicated in Kosovo" with "the complicity of NATO and the US State Department. Mujahideen mercenaries [recruited, trained, and financed by the CIA and ISI] from the Middle East and Central Asia were recruited to fight in the ranks of the Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA) in 1998-99, largely supporting NATO's war effort. Confirmed by British military sources, the task of arming and training of the KLA had been entrusted in 1998 to the US Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA) and Britain's Secret Intelligence Services MI6, together with 'former and serving members' of 22 SAS [Britain's 22nd Special Air Services Regiment], as well as three British and American private security companies." This pattern was also put to work in Macedonia and Chechnya.

Omar Khyam has revealed but another glimmer of the precise nature of the "al-Qaeda" terror network, information useful for connecting dots but that will of course be studiously ignored by our corporate media stenographers. "Khyam has revealed more information than was expected," remarked Sajjan Gohel of the Asia-Pacific Foundation, billed as a counter-terrorism think tank. "He has given a lot of insight into how very many British Muslims have been recruited. I think everyone was shocked. The question now is whether the whole truth will come out."

Of course, it does not matter if "the whole truth will come out," as it is irrelevant, especially for a society unable to connect the dots and, really, not wanting to connect the dots and learn the truth, as this particular truth interrupts sit-coms and football games.

For every person who looks beyond the official story and gleans the indisputable truth about "al-Qaeda" and various other intelligence contrivances engineered by the Pentagon, CIA, MI-6, Mossad, et al, there are literally millions of people who buy into the official explanation, or rather Brothers Grimm machination -- [that] the Muslims, represented by the dead Osama and al-Zarqawi, are out to get us and an incessant "clash of civilizations" is required, with attendant police state and tyranny at home.

Indeed, the "whole truth," according to our neocon rulers, is nothing less than base "appeasement" of "bad guys," those who wish us harm. Soon enough, especially after the imminent shock and awe of Iran, espousing the truth will result in Gestapo door knocks-with battering rams manned by ninja-clad thugs tossing stun grenades-at three in the morning, thus shuffling "fifth columnists," as Sen. Lindsey Graham would likely describe the readers of this blog, off to Rex 84 camps where waterboarding and secret military tribunals are the order of the day.

Why "Jihad" Came to Yugoslavia

"The CIA Recruited and Trained the Jihadists" Jürgen Elsässer interviewed by Silvia Cattori

The Yugoslav Caldron

In his latest book, "How the Jihad Came to Europe," German journalist Jürgen Elsässer unravels the Jihadist thread. Muslim fighters recruited by the CIA to fight against the Soviets in Afghanistan were used successively in Yugoslavia and Chechnya, still supported by the CIA, but perhaps sometimes out of its control. Basing himself on diverse sources, mainly Yugoslavian, Dutch, and German, he reconstructed the development of Osama bin Laden and his lieutenants at the side of NATO in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

Silvia Cattori: Your investigation into the actions of the secret services makes a frightening report. We discover that since the 80's the United States has invested billions of dollars to finance criminal activities and that by means of the CIA they are directly implicated in the attacks attributed to the Moslems. What is the contribution of your book?

Jurgen Elsässer: It is the only work that establishes the tie between wars in the Balkan of the 90's and the attack of September 11, 2001. All the large attacks, in New York, in London, in Madrid, would never have taken place without the recruitment by the American and British secret services of these jihadists who have been blamed for the attacks. I bring a new light on the manipulations of the intelligence agencies. Other books than mine have noted the presence of Osama Ben Laden in the Balkans. But their authors presented the Moslem fighters in the Balkan as enemies of the west. The information that I collected from multiple sources, demonstrate that these jihadists are puppets in the hands of the west and are not, as one pretends, enemies.

SC: In the case of the war in the Balkan, the manipulations of various States are clearly designated in your book. The United States supported Ben Laden whose work was to form the Mujahidines. How can anyone continue to ignore that these attempts that horrify public opinion would never have existed if these "terrorists" had not been driven and financed by the western intelligence services?

JE: Yes, indeed, it is the result of facts that one can observe. But one cannot say that the western intervention in ex - Yugoslavia had for [its] objective to prepare [the] attack of September 11. To be precise: these attacks are a consequence of western politics of the 90's because NATO put these jihadists in place in the Balkans and collaborated with them. The Moslem militants who have been designated the persons responsible for the attacks of September 11 were part of this network.

SC: According to you, what was the interest of the United States and Germany to set the people of the Balkans one against the other?

JE: The west had a common interest to destroy Yugoslavia, to dismember it, because, after the end of the soviet bloc, it would have been a model of the intelligent combination of capitalist and socialist elements. But the west wanted to impose the neoliberal model on all countries.

The neoconservatives, grouped around [Richard] Pearl, had written a document one year before September 11, according to which America had need of a catalyzing event similar to the attack on Pearl Harbor. September 11 was this catalyzing event. I believe that people around Pearl wished for the attacks of September 11.

SC: What was the objective pursued by the United States in attacking Serbia? Was it merely about, as is indicated in your book, the US getting itself installed in a strategic region situated on a transit line for the oil and the gas of central Asia? Or did the alliance of the United States with the Moslem fighters directed by Izetbegovic have a second objective: to create a Moslem extremism at the doors of Europe in order to make use of it in the setting of terrorist manipulations? And, if yes, towards what goal?

JE: The United States wanted, as did Austria at the end of the 19th century in Bosnia, to create a "European" Islam to weaken the Islamic states in the Middle East, meaning, at that time, the Ottoman empire, and today, Iran and the Arab states. The neoconservatives had other plans again: to construct a clandestine network of "fundamentalist" puppets to do the dirty work against "old" Europe.

SC: The result, a terrifying civil war. How could Europe have participated in the destruction of Yugoslavia, which appeared as an example of the perfectly successful cohabitation between ethnic groups? By making the Serbians the guilty party, didn't Europe destroy a country that was one of the major constructions of the postwar era? On what legitimacy did Europe base its intervention?

JE: First, in the beginning of the 90's, Germany led the attack based upon the principles of the self-determination of ethnic groups: in other words, Hitler's old ruse against Czechoslovakia and Poland in 1938/39. Then, the United States took the relay and praised "human rights," an obvious swindle.

Once the war was finished in Afghanistan, Osama Ben Laden recruited these jihadist militants. It was his work. It was he that trained them, partially with the support of the CIA, and put them in place in Bosnia. The Americans tolerated the connection between the President Izetbegovic and Ben Laden. Two years later, in 1994, the Americans began to send weapons, in a common clandestine operation with Iran. After the treaty of Dayton, in November 1995, the CIA and the Pentagon recruited [the] best of the jihadists that had fought in Bosnia.

SC: How does it happen that these Moslems got into the hands of services that served ideological interests opposed to theirs?

JE: I analyzed testimonies given by some jihadists interrogated by the German judges. They said that after the treaty of Dayton, which stipulated that all foreign ex-fighters had to leave the country, they didn't have any more money and had nowhere to go. As for those that could remain in Bosnia, because they had been provided with Bosnian passports, they were without work and without money. The day when the recruiters came and rang at their doors and proposed to pay them 3000 dollars a month to serve in the Bosnian army, they didn't know that they were recruited and paid by emissaries of the CIA to serve the United States.

SC: After, when they were sent to prepare the attacks in London in July 2005, for example, did they not become aware that they were in the hands of western intelligence agents who manipulated them?

JE: It is not clear that it was really the young Moslems from the suburbs of London that committed the attacks, as the police claim. There are other indications according to which the bombs were fixed under the trains. It is possible the bombs were attached under the trains without these young men knowing about it. In that case it is not sure that the young Moslems, incriminated by the investigation, committed these attempts.

SC: It is hard to understand the goal that the western States pursue when they engage their services in criminal manipulations?

JE: This is not easy to say. Remember Kennedy's murder. Who did it? It is certain that it was people from the CIA that supported the second killer, it is certain that Oswald was murdered by a man who had been mandated by the CIA. What is not clear is if these men recruited by the CIA acted on order of Johnson or Dulles, or if they were link to the milieu of extremist Cuban exiles, which means affiliated to the mafia. I don't believe that Bush or Blair are chiefs. I don't believe in the theory of the big conspiracy. I believe that the secret services hire men who are ordered to carry out the dirty business; these agents act as they want. Perhaps you know that on September 11, 2001, someone tried to kill Bush. What does it mean? It is difficult to explain.

SC: Do you mean that Bush is, for example, himself hostage of the people who, inside the Pentagon, form a State within the state, one that also escapes the command of the American army? Are you thinking about people that are under the direct influence of characters such as Pearl, Wolfowitz, Feith? Do you think that it is they who, after the war of the Balkans, would have been the real backers of these attacks and that these attacks are not separate from each other, that there is a link between Madrid and London? Does it mean that the Americans are ready to ally with the devil to sow chaos everywhere under the pretext of this anti-Muslim, anti-Arabic war waged under the banner of terrorism? A fabricated terrorism?

JE: Yes, there is a duplicate government that escapes Bush's control. It is the neoconservatives, such as Cheney, Rumsfeld, Wolfowitz, Pearl, the people tied into the oil and the military industries. The global chaos is in the interest of the military industry. When there is chaos all over the world, one can sell weapons and oil for a bigger price.

8.19 Al-Qaeda as a CIA Asset

by Peter Dale Scott, author of Drugs, Oil, and War

9/11 in Historical Perspective: Flawed Assumptions
Deep Politics: Drugs, Oil, Covert Operations and Terrorism:
A briefing for Congressional Staff, July 22, 2005

The American people have been seriously misled about the origins of the al Qaeda movement blamed for the 9/11 attacks, just as they have been seriously misled about the reasons for America's invasion of Iraq.

The truth is that for at least two decades the United States has engaged in energetic covert programs to secure U.S. control over the Persian Gulf, and also to open up Central Asia for development by U.S. oil companies. Americans were eager to gain access to the petroleum reserves of the Caspian Basin, which at that time were still estimated to be "the largest known reserves of unexploited fuel in the planet."

To this end, time after time, U.S. covert operations in the region have used so-called "Arab Afghan" warriors as assets, the jihadis whom we loosely link with the name and leadership of al Qaeda. In country after country these "Arab Afghans" have been involved in trafficking Afghan heroin.

America's sponsorship of drug-trafficking Muslim warriors, including those now in Al Qaeda, dates back to the Afghan War of 1979-89, sponsored in part by the CIA's links to the drug-laundering Bank of Credit and Commerce International (BCCI). It was part of CIA Director Casey's strategy for launching covert operations over and above those approved and financed by a Democratic-controlled Congress.

The most conspicuous example of this alliance with drug-traffickers in the 1980s was the Contra support operation. Here again foreign money and drug profits filled the gap after Congress denied funds through the so-called Boland amendments; in this case government funds were used to lie about the Contras to the American people. This was followed by a massive cover-up, in which a dubious role was played by then-Congressman Lee Hamilton, later of the 9/11 Commission.

The lying continues. The 9/11 Commission Report assures Americans that "Bin Ladin and his comrades had their own sources of support and training, and they received little or no assistance from the United States." This misleading statement fails to consider that:

1) Al Qaeda elements received considerable indirect U.S. Government assistance, first in Afghanistan until 1992, and thereafter in other countries such as Azerbaijan (1992-95). Before 1992, for example, the Afghan leader Jallaladin Haqqani organized and hosted the Arab Afghan volunteers known later as al Qaeda; and Haqqani "received bags of money each month from the [CIA] station in Islamabad." The Arab Afghans were also trained in urban terrorism, including car bombings, by Pakistani ISI operatives who were in turn trained by the CIA.

2) Key members of the network which became al Qaeda, such as Sheikh Omar Abdel Rahman, Ali Mohamed, Mohamed Jamal Khalifa, and lead hijacker Mohammed Atta, were granted visas to enter the United States, despite being suspected of terrorism. Al Qaeda foot soldiers were also admitted to the United States for training under a special visa program.

3) At Fort Belvoir, Virginia, an al Qaeda operative was given a list of Muslim candidates for al Qaeda's jihad.

4) When al Qaeda personnel were trained in the United States by a key al Qaeda operative, Sergeant Ali Mohamed of the U.S. Army Special Forces, Mohamed was still on the U.S. Army payroll.

5) Repeatedly al Qaeda terrorists were protected by FBI officials from investigation and prosecution.

In part America's limited covert assistance to al Qaeda after 1989 was in order not to offend al Qaeda's two primary supporters which America needed as allies: the intelligence networks of Saudi Arabia and Pakistan. But unquestionably the entry of United States oil companies into oil-rich Azerbaijan was achieved with the assistance of a U.S.-organized covert program using "Arab Afghan" operatives associated with bin Laden. Oil was the driving force of U.S. involvement in Central and South Asia, and oil led to U.S. coexistence with both al Qaeda and the world-dominating Afghan heroin trade.

This brings us to another extraordinary distortion in the 9/11 Report:

While the drug trade was a source of income for the Taliban, it did not serve the same purpose for al Qaeda, and there is no reliable evidence that Bin Ladin was involved in or made his money through drug trafficking.

That drug-trafficking does support al Qaeda-connected operations has been energetically asserted by the governments of Great Britain and many other European countries, as well as the head of the U.S. Congressional Task Force on Terrorism. Heroin-trafficking has been a source of income in particular for al Qaeda-related warriors in Tajikistan, Uzbekistan, Azerbaijan, Chechnya, and Kosovo. Most recently it has supported terrorist attacks in the Netherlands and Spain.

U.S. support for al Qaeda elements, particularly in Azerbaijan and Kosovo, has increased dramatically the flow of heroin to Western Europe and the United States.

The Example of Azerbaijan

In the former Soviet Republic of Azerbaijan, Arab Afghans clearly assisted this effort of U.S. oil companies to penetrate the region. In 1991-92, Richard Secord, Heinie Aderholt, and Ed Dearborn, three veterans of U.S. operations in Laos and Iran-Contra, turned up in Baku under the cover of an oil company, MEGA Oil. MEGA never did find oil, but did contribute materially to the removal of Azerbaijan from the sphere of post-Soviet Russian influence.

As MEGA operatives in Azerbaijan, Secord, Aderholt, Dearborn, and their men engaged in military training, passed "brown bags filled with cash" to members of the government, and above all set up an airline on the model of Air America which soon was picking up hundreds of Mujahideen mercenaries in Afghanistan. (Secord and Aderholt claim to have left Baku before the Mujahideen arrived.) Meanwhile, Mujahideen leader Gulbuddin Hekmatyar in Afghanistan, who at the time was still allied with bin Laden, was "observed recruiting Afghan mercenaries [i.e. Arab Afghans] to fight in Azerbaijan against Armenia and its Russian allies." At this time, heroin flooded from Afghanistan through Baku into Chechnya, Russia, and even North America. It is difficult to believe that MEGA's airline (so much like Air America) did not become involved. [NOTE: Air America is the infamous CIA proprietary airline operation that transported opium and heroin out of the "Golden Triangle" and all over Southeast Asia prior to and during the United States' adventures in Vietnam. See: Air America, by Christopher Robbins, Avon Books, 1985, Chapter 9.]

The triple pattern of drugs, oil, and al Qaeda was seen again in Kosovo in 1998, where the Al-Qaeda-backed Islamist jihadis of the Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA) received overt American assistance from the U.S. Government. Though unmentioned in mainstream books on the war, both the al Qaeda and drug backgrounds of the KLA are recognized by experts and to my knowledge never contested by them.

Though the origins of the Kosovo tragedy were rooted in local enmities, oil and drugs were prominent in the outcome. At the time critics charged that US oil interests were interested in building a trans-Balkan pipeline with US Army protection; although initially ridiculed, these critics were eventually proven correct. BBC News announced in December 2004 that a $1.2 billion pipeline, south of a huge new U.S. Army base in Kosovo, has been given a go-ahead by the governments of Albania, Bulgaria, and Macedonia.

Meanwhile by 2000, according to DEA statistics, Afghan heroin accounted for almost 20 percent of the heroin seized in the United States -- nearly double the percentage taken four years earlier. Much of it is now distributed by Kosovar Albanians.

Sergeant Ali Mohamed and U.S. Intelligence Links to the Al Qaeda Leadership

The Report describes Ali Mohamed as "a former Egyptian army officer who had moved to the United States in the mid-1980s, enlisted in the U.S. Army, and become an instructor at Fort Bragg," as well as helping to plan the bombing of the U.S. Embassy in Kenya.

In fact Ali Mohamed was an important al Qaeda agent who, as the 9/11 Commission was told, "trained most of al Qaeda's top leadership," including "persons who would later carry out the 1993 World Trade Center bombing." But the person telling the 9/11 Commission this, U.S. Attorney Patrick J. Fitzgerald, misrepresented Ali Mohamed's FBI relationship. He told the Commission that, "From 1994 until his arrest in 1998, [Mohamed] lived as an American citizen in California, applying for jobs as an FBI translator and working as a security guard for a defense contractor."

Ali Mohamed was not just an FBI job applicant. Unquestionably he was an FBI informant, from at least 1993 and maybe 1989. And almost certainly he was something more. A veteran of the CIA-trained bodyguards of Egyptian President Anwar Sadat, he was able, despite being on a State Department Watch List, to come to America around 1984, on what an FBI consultant has called "a visa program controlled by the CIA," and obtain a job, first as a security officer, then with U.S. Special Forces.

In 1988 he took a lengthy leave of absence from the U.S. Army and went to fight in Afghanistan, where he met with Ayman al-Zawahiri (later bin Laden's chief deputy in al Qaeda) and the "Arab Afghan" leadership. Despite this, he was able to receive an Honorable Discharge one year later, at which point he established close contact with bin Laden in Afghanistan.

Ali Mohamed clearly enjoyed U.S. protection: in 1993, when detained by the RCMP in Canada, a single phone call to the U.S. secured his release. This enabled him to play a role, in the same year, in planning the bombing of the U.S. Embassy in Kenya in 1998.[30]

Congress should determine the true relationship of the U.S. Government to Ali Mohamed, who was close to bin Laden and above all Zawahiri, who has been called the "main player" in 9/11. (Al-Zawahiri is often described as the more sophisticated mentor of the younger bin Laden.) In particular Congress should determine why Patrick Fitzgerald chose to mislead the American people about Mohamed's FBI status.

In short, the al Qaeda terror network accused of the 9/11 attacks was supported and expanded by U.S. intelligence programs and covert operations, both during and after the Soviet Afghan War. Congress should rethink their decision to grant still greater powers and budget to the agencies responsible for fostering this enemy in the first place.

Sane voices clamor from the Muslim world that the best answer to terrorism is not war but justice. We should listen to them. By using its energies to reduce the injustices tormenting Islam, the United States will do more to diminish terrorism than by creating any number of new directorates in Washington.

"Globalization" is Decimating the American Middle Class

EXCERPTS:

As Jobs Leave America's Shores.....

The New Face of Class War

By Paul Craig Roberts

The attacks on middle-class jobs are lending new meaning to the phrase "class war." The ladders of upward mobility are being dismantled. America, the land of opportunity, is giving way to ever deepening polarization between rich and poor.

The assault on jobs predates the Bush regime. However, the loss of middle-class jobs has become particularly intense in the 21st century, and, like other pressing problems, has been ignored by President Bush, who is focused on waging war in the Middle East and building a police state at home. The lives and careers that are being lost to the carnage of a gratuitous war in Iraq are paralleled by the economic destruction of careers, families, and communities in the U.S. Since the days of President Franklin D. Roosevelt in the 1930s, the U.S. government has sought to protect employment of its citizens. Bush has turned his back on this responsibility. He has given his support to the offshoring of American jobs that is eroding the living standards of Americans. It is another example of his betrayal of the public trust.

"Free trade" and "globalization" are the guises behind which class war is being conducted against the middle class by both political parties. Patrick J. Buchanan, a three-time contender for the presidential nomination, put it well when he wrote that NAFTA and the various so-called trade agreements were never trade deals. The agreements were enabling acts that enabled U.S. corporations to dump their American workers, avoid Social Security taxes, health care and pensions, and move their factories offshore to locations where labor is cheap.

Although a new development, offshoring is destroying entire industries, occupations and communities in the United States. The devastation of U.S. manufacturing employment was waved away with promises that a "new economy" based on high-tech knowledge jobs would take its place. Education and retraining were touted as the answer.

In testimony before the U.S.-China Commission, I explained that offshoring is the replacement of U.S. labor with foreign labor in U.S. production functions over a wide range of tradable goods and services. (Tradable goods and services are those that can be exported or that are competitive with imports. Nontradable goods and services are those that only have domestic markets and no import competition. For example, barbers and dentists offer nontradable services. Examples of nontradable goods are perishable, locally produced fruits and vegetables and specially fabricated parts of local machine shops.) As the production of most tradable goods and services can be moved offshore, there are no replacement occupations for which to train except in domestic "hands on" services such as barbers, manicurists, and hospital orderlies. No country benefits from trading its professional jobs, such as engineering, for domestic service jobs.

At a Brookings Institution conference in Washington, D.C., in January 2004, I predicted that if the pace of jobs outsourcing and occupational destruction continued, the U.S. would be a third world country in 20 years. Despite my regular updates on the poor performance of U.S. job growth in the 21st century, economists have insisted that offshoring is a manifestation of free trade and can only have positive benefits overall for Americans.

Reality has contradicted the glib economists. The new high-tech knowledge jobs are being outsourced abroad even faster than the old manufacturing jobs. Establishment economists are beginning to see the light. Writing in Foreign Affairs (March/ April 2006), Princeton economist and former Federal Reserve vice chairman Alan Blinder concludes that economists who insist that offshore outsourcing is merely a routine extension of international trade are overlooking a major transformation with significant consequences.

Blinder estimates that 42-56 million American service sector jobs are susceptible to offshore outsourcing. Whether all these jobs leave, U.S. salaries will be forced down by the willingness of foreigners to do the work for less.

American economists, some from incompetence and some from being bought and paid for, described globalization as a "win-win" development. It was supposed to work like this: The U.S. would lose market share in tradable manufactured goods and make up the job and economic loss with highly educated knowledge workers. The win for America would be lower-priced manufactured goods and a white-collar work force. The win for China would be manufacturing jobs that would bring economic development to that country.

It did not work out this way, as Morgan Stanley's Stephen Roach, formerly a cheerleader for globalization, recently admitted. It has become apparent that job creation and real wages in the developed economies are seriously lagging behind their historical norms as offshore outsourcing displaces the "new economy" jobs in "software programming, engineering, design, and the medical profession, as well as a broad array of professionals in the legal, accounting, actuarial, consulting, and financial services industries."

The real state of the U.S. job market is revealed by a Chicago Sun-Times report on January 26, 2006, that 25,000 people applied for 325 jobs at a new Chicago Wal-Mart.

According to the BLS payroll jobs data, over the past half-decade (January 2001 - January 2006, the data series available at time of writing) the U.S. economy created 1,050,000 net new private sector jobs and 1,009,000 net new government jobs for a total five-year figure of 2,059,000. That is seven million jobs short of keeping up with population growth, definitely a serious job shortfall.

The BLS payroll jobs data contradict the hype from business organizations, such as the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, that offshore outsourcing is good for America. Large corporations, which have individually dismissed thousands of their U.S. employees and replaced them with foreigners, claim that jobs outsourcing allows them to save money that can be used to hire more Americans.

The corporations and the business organizations are very successful in placing this disinformation in the media. The lie is repeated everywhere and has become a mantra among no-think economists and politicians. However, no sign of these jobs can be found in the payroll jobs data. But there is abundant evidence of the lost American jobs.

During the past five years (January 01 - January 06), the information sector of the U.S. economy lost 644,000 jobs, or 17.4 per cent of its work force. Computer systems design and related work lost 105,000 jobs, or 8.5 per cent of its work force. Clearly, jobs officering is not creating jobs in computers and information technology. Indeed, jobs officering is not even creating jobs in related fields.

U.S. manufacturing lost 2.9 million jobs, almost 17 per cent of the manufacturing work force. The wipeout is across the board. Not a single manufacturing payroll classification created a single new job.

The declines in some manufacturing sectors have more in common with a country undergoing saturation bombing during war than with a "supereconomy" that is "the envy of the world." In five years, communications equipment lost 42 per cent of its work force. Semiconductors and electronic components lost 37 per cent of its work force. The work force in computers and electronic products declined 30 per cent. Electrical equipment and appliances lost 25 per cent of its employees. The work force in motor vehicles and parts declined 12 per cent. Furniture and related products lost 17 per cent of its jobs. Apparel manufacturers lost almost half of the work force. Employment in textile mills declined 43 per cent. Paper and paper products lost one-fifth of its jobs. The work force in plastics and rubber products declined by 15 per cent.

Other forms of deception are widely practiced. For example, Matthew Spiegleman, a Conference Board economist, claims that manufacturing jobs are only slightly higher paid than domestic service jobs, so there is no meaningful loss in income to Americans from offshoring. He reaches this conclusion by comparing only hourly pay and leaving out the longer manufacturing workweek and the associated benefits, such as health care and pensions.

Occasionally, however, real information escapes the spin machine. In February 2006 the National Association of Manufacturers, one of offshoring's greatest boosters, released a report, "U.S. Manufacturing Innovation at Risk," by economists Joel Popkin and Kathryn Kobe. The economists find that U.S. industry's investment in research and development is not languishing after all. It just appears to be languishing, because it is rapidly being shifted overseas: "Funds provided for foreign-performed R&D have grown by almost 73 per cent between 1999 and 2003, with a 36 per cent increase in the number of firms funding foreign R&D."

U.S. industry is still investing in R&D after all; it is just not hiring Americans to do the research and development. U.S. manufacturers still make things, only less and less in America with American labor. U.S. manufacturers still hire engineers, only they are foreign ones, not American ones.

In other words, everything is fine for U.S. manufacturers. It is just their former American work force that is in the doldrums. As these Americans happen to be customers for U.S. manufacturers, U.S. brand names will gradually lose their U.S. market. U.S. household median income has fallen for the past five years. Consumer demand has been kept alive by consumers' spending their savings and home equity and going deeper into debt. It is not possible for debt to forever rise faster than income.

The United States is the first country in history to destroy the prospects and living standards of its labor force. It is amazing to watch freedom-loving libertarians and free-market economists serve as apologists for the dismantling of the ladders of upward mobility that made the America of old an opportunity society.

How the Government, Big Business, and Special Interest Groups Are Waging War on the American Dream and How to Fight Back by Lou Dobbs

Though a self-confessed "lifelong Republican and a strong believer in free enterprise," Dobbs's opinions have evolved away from mainline GOP and corporate dogma. Charging that the Clinton and Bush administrations have waged "class warfare" on the American middle class, he criticizes their free trade policies, which have eliminated manufacturing jobs in the U.S., either outright or by outsourcing them. He's scornful of a GOP that panders to its fundamentalist religious base with bills that focus on abortion, gay marriage and the Pledge of Allegiance while the huge federal deficits ("an estate tax on the middle class and their children") spiral out of control. He rails against the K Street lobbyists, like Jack Abramoff, and their friends in Congress; chastises the credit card and banking industries for engineering the new bankruptcy law to their own profits; and criticizes the press for its sloppy "he says, she says" journalism. But Dobbs risks slipping from populist to demagogue in his jeremiad against the estimated 11 million illegal immigrants in this country and his support for the vigilante Minuteman Project. Agree with him or not, Dobbs remains a refreshingly bold thinker who refuses to be intellectually pigeonholed.

Why, in 1993, did the newly elected Bill Clinton pass the North American Free Trade Agreement, a pro-business measure invented by his political adversaries and opposed by his allies in labor and the environment? The answer, according to Faux, is that Clinton was less devoted to his base than to his fellow elites, rewarding their donations to the Democratic Party with access to Mexico's cheap labor and lax environmental standards.....

"Globalization is a cover for American imperialism, but the beneficiaries are not the American people at the expense of foreigners but corporate executives at the expense of working-class and poor people wherever they may be. Jeff Faux offers a comprehensive and devastating analysis."

Another FBI Agent Blows the Whistle on 9-11

Wednesday, May 29, 2002

FBI Special Agent Robert G. Wright Jr. will hold a news conference Thursday in Washington to reveal FBI negligence and obstruction of counterterrorism investigations targeting Hamas and al-Qaeda.

Judicial Watch, the public interest group that investigates and prosecutes government corruption, said its co-counsel David Schippers would join Wright at the press conference.

"Special Agent Wright, of the FBI's Chicago Division, is the only agent in the history of the FBI to have used the civil forfeiture laws to seize over $1.4 million dollars in Hamas terrorist money in connection with a criminal investigation of terrorist money laundering operations here in the United States," Judicial Watch said.

Minneapolis FBI agent Coleen Rowley has corroborated Wright's experiences dealing with FBI headquarters and senior management, "who consistently delayed, down-played and soft-peddled the investigative efforts of counterterrorism agents in the field," the organization said.

The Refusal of the 9/11 Commission to Explore Quashed FBI Investigations Prior to 9/11 Tarnishes Hearings

By Bryan Sacks

[T]he nadir of the morning session came when commissioner James Thompson asked all of the panelists how best to combat the new type of stateless enemy Al-Qaeda represents. FBI special agent Mary Deborah Doran answered last. She had already warned the Commission in her introductory remarks that, as a "street agent," she was removed from the "policy and administrative decision-making processes" that determined the scope of the FBI's investigation of Al Qaeda, and thus could not speak to them (no one did that day, including Executive Assistant FBI Director John Pistole, seated to her right). Her answer to Thompson's question was: "I think what we need to do. . . at the FBI street-agent level, is to continue what we've always done, and that is to pursue all the information that we do get. . . to its logical end. . ."

Here, in classic doublespeak fashion, Doran gives an answer that is a non-answer. She had to be aware that several FBI "street-level" investigations into the activities of the 9/11 terrorists were stymied by higher-ups in the weeks prior to 9/11, each under strange circumstances, and well before the street-level agents felt like they had reached their "logical end." Consider the following cases, all drawn from mainstream news sources, summarized in David Ray Griffin's well-researched expose, "The New Pearl Harbor:"

1) Ken Williams of the Phoenix FBI office sent a now-famous July 10, 2001 memo to the counterterrorism division of the FBI suggesting that the organization institute a national program to keep tabs on suspicious flight-school students. This came just a few weeks after the CIA learned that Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the mastermind of the 9/11 plot and a well-known terrorist at that time who the CIA was monitoring, was recruiting jihadists to come to the US to take part in attacks here. Williams, who had previously been transferred to an unrelated arson case despite tracking the hijackers for more than a year, had been back on the case for about a month when he wrote the memo, which also warned of a possible "effort by Osama bin Laden to send students to the US to attend civil aviation universities and colleges" (Fortune, May 22, 2002). His suggestion for a national program was ignored before 9/11;

2) FBI agent Robert Wright of the Chicago field office, who had been investigating a suspected terrorist cell for three years, was informed in January 2001 that the case was being closed. This despite Wright's contention that his case was growing stronger. His investigation included individuals from the notorious Ptech, a software company which provided product for the White House, Congress, FBI, CIA, IRS, Army, Navy, and FAA and which was raided by federal agents in December 2002.

Three months before September 11, Wright wrote a stinging internal memo charging that the FBI was not interested in thwarting a terrorist attack, but rather "was merely gathering intelligence so they would know who to arrest when a terrorist attack occurred." (UPI, May 30, 2002, cited in Griffin, p. 83);

3) Legal officer Colleen Rowley worked in the FBI's Minneapolis field office when agents arrested Zacarias Moussaoui in August of 2001. The commission made repeated mention of the fact that Moussaoui, by that time, was considered a very dangerous person capable of crashing a plane into the World Trade Center. The Minneapolis felt so strongly about the need to detain him that a request was sent to FBI headquarters to search Moussaoui's laptop computer under the Federal Intelligence Surveillance Act.

Approximately 10,000 requests under FISA over the past 20 years had been made without a single request being turned down, but the Minneapolis agency's request never got out of the FBI. The request had been excised of the critical intelligence that made the case for Moussaoui's connection to Al Qaeda in Chechnya on its path to FBI headquarters. Excised of that justification, the request was never forwarded for FISA consideration, spurring Rowley to charge that the FBI was "sabotaging" the case, and another agent to charge that headquarters was "setting this up for failure." (Senate Intelligence Committee, October 17, 2002; Time, July 21 and July 27, 2002 and Sydney Morning Herald July 28, 2002, each cited in Griffin, p. 81);

4) On Aug 28, 2001 the New York FBI office requested opening a criminal investigation in soon-to-be hijacker Khalid Almihdhar based on evidence he had been involved in the USS Cole bombing. The request was turned down, on the basis that, as Griffin puts it, "Almihdhar could not be tied to the Cole investigation without the inclusion of sensitive intelligence information." This led one frustrated FBI agent to write in an email that "someday someone will die--and. . . the public will not understand why we were not more effective." (Congressional Intelligence Committee, cited in Griffin, p. 83). Perhaps Doran, a New York FBI agent herself, knew something about this? She was not asked directly.

What these examples make clear is that FBI "street agents" and translators don't have the power to follow their investigations to their logical ends when they are obstructed by their superiors. In light of these facts, Doran's breezy recommendation that the FBI street agents "keep doing what we've always done" is entirely inadequate, and inspires no confidence. Neither Thompson nor any other commissioner pressed for a better answer. And while the FBI's "unprecedented transformation" after 9/11 testified to by FBI Executive Assistant Director For Counterterrorism John Pistole on April 14 may sound impressive to some, it does not explain nor address the past obstruction of promising investigations. Factor in the erosion of civil liberties required for its execution, and the "unprecedented transformation" appears to be of dubious value.

There are several other aspects about the FBI's behavior pre- and post-9/11 that scream out for further investigation. One of the most bizarre cases still unfolding involves the targeting of former FBI translator Sibel Edmonds, who was fired by the agency shortly after reporting a number of complaints to her superiors. According to a June 7, 2004 story in The New Republic, those complaints included the charge that a fellow FBI translator, Can Dickerson, tried to recruit Edmonds into a foreign organization whose documents Dickerson had been translating and which had been under investigation by the FBI. Edmonds then filed a wrongful termination suit and took her grievance to Senators Charles Grassley and Patrick Leahy, as well as the television program "60 Minutes," which aired an interview with her in 2002.

But the FBI has since gone to extraordinary lengths to silence Edmonds. In May, the Bureau re-classified all of the information it presented to Sens. Grassley and Leahy, nearly two years after it had become public. It even violated its own rules for reclassification in doing so. The reclassification has had the effect of silencing Grassley and Leahy on the matter, too, who had been pressing the Bureau for a fuller account of the matter. Now they were limited to writing classified letters to the FBI.

Edmonds, meanwhile, has seen her wrongful termination suit delayed for two years and most recently was informed by Judge Reggie Walton on June 14 that her hearing was delayed once again (for the fourth time), with no date set for a rescheduling. The delays result from an effort from Attorney General John Ashcroft to invoke the State Secrets Privilege, which can quash lawsuits on the basis that their continuation would damage national security. Judge Walton is still waiting for the government to make its case for the invoking of the States Secrets Privilege. In the meantime, as the New Republic notes, while Edmonds herself is not gagged, she is not permitted to reference any of the now-classified information that could substantiate her claims.

At her June 14 press conference outside the E. Barrett Prettyman United States Courthouse in Washington, DC, Edmonds summarized her charges clearly, stating that for more than two years, "John Ashcroft has been relentlessly engaged in actions geared toward covering up my report and investigations into my allegations. His actions. . . include gagging the United States Congress, blocking court proceedings on my (wrongful termination suit) by invoking the State Secrets Privilege, quashing the subpoena for my deposition on information regarding 9/11, withholding documents requested under the Freedom Of Information Act and preventing the release of the Inspector General's report of its investigations into my report and allegations."

She threw down a gauntlet to all citizens, members of Congress and federal officials that so far have not spoken out, saying, "To become an American citizen, I took the citizenship oath. In taking this oath, I pledged I would support and defend the Constitution and laws of the United States and America against all enemies, foreign and domestic. Therefore, not only do I have the right to challenge John Ashcroft's anti-constitution(al) and un-American actions, but as an American citizen I am required to do so. So are you."

Edmonds did testify with the 9/11 commission behind closed doors, but a host of disturbing questions still remain before the commission:

- Why weren't any of the agents mentioned above called to testify in the commission's public hearings? What legitimate claim to a thorough investigation can be made without their public testimony?
- Were the FBI agents who saw their investigations stymied at least deposed in private sessions?
- Why was Robert Wright's investigation derailed, and why did the government move to block significant portions of his book in 2002, such that it remains unpublished to this day?
- Why was the information connecting Moussaoui's connection with rebels in Chechnya excised before it reached the FBI Deputy General?
- And why have lower-level agents been demoted and/or punished for doing their jobs while their superiors, who spiked, obstructed or otherwise compromised their promising investigations been rewarded?

In sum, the day's hearings played as a commercial for supporting the efforts of the country's intelligence agencies without additional public scrutiny of them. We've seen that show before, and we know how it ends. If the commission's report fails to adequately address Sibel Edmonds' charges, and fails to address the obstructed FBI investigations prior to 9/11, the unanswered questions which haunt the 9/11 Inquiry will grow louder and more insistent, and neither the 9/11 families nor the concerned citizens of this country will have the closure they deserve.

Multi-trillionaire

Chairman of J.P. Morgan Chase Bank

Chairman of the Council on Foreign Relations, 1970-85

Founder of the Trilateral Commission, 1973

Founder of the World Trade Center

"This present window of opportunity, during which a truly peaceful and interdependent world order might be built, will not be open for too long.... We are on the verge of a global transformation. All we need is the right major crisis and the nations will accept the New World Order."

David Rockefeller speaking at the Sept. 23, 1994 United Nations
Ambassadors' dinner

We are grateful to the Washington Post, the New York Times, Time Magazine and other great publications whose directors have attended our meetings and respected the promises of discretion for almost forty years.

It would have been impossible for us to develop our plan for the world if we had been subject to the bright lights of publicity during those years. But, the world is now more sophisticated and prepared to march towards a world-government.

The supranational sovereignty of an intellectual elite and world bankers is surely preferable to the national auto-determination practiced in past centuries."

David Rockefeller in an address to a Trilateral Commission meeting in June of 1991

The Trilateral Commission was founded in 1973 by David Rockefeller with Zbigniew Brzezinski as executive director, after Brzezinski published "Between Two Ages," which became the blueprint for the TC. Rockefeller read and appreciated Brzezinski's ideas, which included,

"Though Stalinism may have been a needless tragedy for both the Russian people and communism as an ideal, there is the intellectually tantalizing possibility that for the world at large it was, as we shall see, a blessing in disguise."

"Marxism represents a further vital and creative stage in the maturing of man's universal vision. Marxism is simultaneously a victory of the external man over the inner, passive man and a victory of reason over belief."

"Such a society would be dominated by an elite whose claim to political power would rest on allegedly superior scientific know-how. Unhindered by the restraints of traditional liberal values, this elite would not hesitate to achieve its political ends by the latest modern techniques for influencing public behavior and keeping society under close surveillance and control."

"The Soviet Union could have emerged as the standard-bearer of this century's most influential system of thought and as the social model for resolving the key dilemmas facing modern man."

And..... "[the] nation state as a fundamental unit of man's organized life has ceased to be the principal creative force: International banks and multinational corporations are acting and planning in terms that are far in advance of the political concepts of the nation-state."

The Council on Foreign Relations (CFR), which was incorporated on July 29, 1921, is the American counterpart to Britain's Royal Institute of International Affairs (RIIA). Both of these organizations came into being during the division of the spoils following World War I, through the efforts of the world's most powerful bankers, and have worked tirelessly in the years since to deconstruct national sovereignty throughout the world in favor of a single governing authority of their own design.

In 1954 their efforts were bolstered by the creation of the Bilderberger Group, an international consortium organized by His Royal Highness Prince Bernhard of the Netherlands -- an important figure in Royal Dutch Petroleum (Shell Oil) and the Societe General de Belgique, a huge conglomerate cartel with world-wide holdings. (The very first meeting took place in Oostbeek, Holland at the Hotel de Bilderberg -- hence the name.) The group's gatherings, which rarely occur more than once a year, are attended by leading political and financial figures from Europe and the United States.

[NOTE: In the June, 2006 meeting at the Brookestreet Hotel in Ottawa, David Rockefeller and Queen Beatrix walked in the front door, whereas Hillary Clinton was reported to have debarked from her limousine in an underground parking garage.]

The agendas of these meetings are always held secret, but the publicly stated goal of Prince Bernhard is the establishment of a world government.

The Trilateral Commission was formed in 1973.

Since the formation of the CFR, people affiliated with it have dominated the administrations (especially the State Departments) of U.S. Presidents of both political parties (Nixon's administration boasted 110 such individuals). Their goals are expressed quite openly in books and publications they issue -- perhaps because they understand that the mainstream press (which they oversee) will not discuss such issues, and that the vast majority of the American people are well conditioned to remain utterly disinterested in such publications. This despite the fact that the ugly details of how our painful future will play out -- details such as who among us will live and who will die as oil supplies are exhausted -- is being designed without our input.

The Council on Foreign Relations: A Self Description

Excerpts taken from its website

IT ALL STARTED as an inquiry, indeed, "The Inquiry." To the select few who knew, this was the name of a working fellowship of distinguished scholars, tasked to brief Woodrow Wilson about options for the postwar world once the kaiser and imperial Germany fell to defeat. Through the winter of 1917-18, this academic band gathered discreetly in a hideaway at 155th Street and Broadway in New York City, to assemble the data they thought necessary to make the world safe for democracy.

But ... a more discreet club of New York financiers and international lawyers organized in June 1918... It began with 108 members, ... "high-ranking officers of banking, manufacturing, trading and finance companies, together with many lawyers." Its purpose was to convene dinner meetings, to make contact with distinguished foreign visitors under conditions congenial to future commerce.

...

The scholars of the Inquiry ... saw an opportunity. The[y] ... could provide diplomatic experience, expertise, and high-level contacts but no funds. The men of law and banking, by contrast, could tap untold resources of finance but sorely needed an injection of intellectual substance, dynamism, and contacts—whether to promote business expansion, world peace, or, indeed, both. This was the synergy that produced the modern Council and promoted its unique utility for decades to come: academic and government expertise meeting practical business interests....

The CFR, Trilateral Commission and the Power of the International Banks

As described by other prominent "Insiders"

"The Trilateral Commission is intended to be the vehicle for multinational consolidation of the commercial and banking interests by seizing control of the political government of the United States. The Trilateral Commission represents a skillful, coordinated effort to seize control and consolidate the four centers of power political, monetary, intellectual and ecclesiastical. What the Trilateral Commission intends is to create a worldwide economic power superior to the political governments of the nationstates involved. As managers and creators of the system, they will rule the future."

U.S. Senator Barry Goldwater in his book: "With No Apologies,"

"The powers of financial capitalism had another far reaching aim, nothing less than to create a world system of financial control in private hands able to dominate the political system of each country and the economy of the world as a whole. This system was to be controlled in a feudalist fashion by the central banks of the world acting in concert, by secret agreements, arrived at in frequent private meetings and conferences. The apex of the system was the Bank for International Settlements in Basle, Switzerland, a private bank owned and controlled by the worlds' central banks which were themselves private corporations. The growth of financial capitalism made possible a centralization of world economic control and use of this power for the direct benefit of financiers and the indirect injury of all other economic groups."

Professor Carroll Quigley of Georgetown University, author of "Tragedy and Hope: A History of The World in Our Time." Highly esteemed by his former student, William Jefferson Blythe Clinton.

"The Council on Foreign Relations is "the establishment." Not only does it have influence and power in key decision-making positions at the highest levels of government to apply pressure from above, but it also announces and uses individuals and groups to bring pressure from below, to justify the high level decisions for converting the U.S. from a sovereign Constitutional Republic into a servile member state of a one-world dictatorship."

Former Congressman John Rarick 1971

www.btinternet.com/~meirionhughes/Pub/newworldorder.htm

"The new world order that will answer economic, military, and political problems urgently requires, I believe, that the United States take the leadership among all free peoples to make the underlying concepts and aspirations of national sovereignty truly meaningful through the federal approach."

Gov. Nelson Rockefeller of New York, in an article entitled "Rockefeller Bids Free Lands Unite: Calls at Harvard for Drive to Build New World Order" -- New York Times (February 1962)

"[T]he 'house of world order' will have to be built from the bottom up rather than from the top down. It will look like a great 'booming, buzzing confusion,' to use William James' famous description of reality, but an end run around national sovereignty, eroding it piece by piece, will accomplish much more than the old-fashioned frontal assault."

Richard N. Gardner of the CFR, in Foreign Affairs (April 1974)

"Further global progress is now possible only through a quest for universal consensus in the movement towards a new world order."

Soviet Premier Mikhail Gorbachev at the U. N. (December 1998)

"We believe we are creating the beginning of a new world order coming out of the collapse of the U.S.-Soviet antagonisms."

CFR Trustee and two-time US National Security Advisor Brent Scowcroft, quoted in the Washington Post (May 1991)

"We can see beyond the present shadows of war in the Middle East to a new world order where the strong work together to deter and stop aggression. "

Richard Gephardt, in the Wall Street Journal (September 1990)

"Today, America would be outraged if U.N. troops entered Los Angeles to restore order [referring to the 1991 LA Riot]. Tomorrow they will be grateful!

This is especially true if they were told that there were an outside threat from beyond, whether real or promulgated, that threatened our very existence. It is then that all peoples of the world will plead to deliver them from this evil. The one thing every man fears is the unknown.

When presented with this "scenario," individual rights will be willingly relinquished for the guarantee of their well-being granted to them by the World Government."

Dr. Henry Kissinger, Bilderberger Conference, Evians, France, 1991.

"For a long time I felt that FDR had developed many thoughts and ideas that were his own to benefit this country, the United States. But, he didn't.

Most of his thoughts, his political ammunition, as it were, were carefully manufactured for him in advance by the Council on Foreign Relations-One World Money group.

Brilliantly, with great gusto, like a fine piece of artillery, he exploded that prepared "ammunition" in the middle of an unsuspecting target, the American people, and thus paid off and returned his internationalist political support.

The UN is but a long-range, international banking apparatus clearly set up for financial and economic profit by a small group of powerful One-World revolutionaries, hungry for profit and power.

The depression was the calculated 'shearing' of the public by the World Money powers, triggered by the planned sudden shortage of supply of call money in the New York money market....

The One World Government leaders and their ever close bankers have now acquired full control of the money and credit machinery of the U.S. via the creation of the privately owned Federal Reserve Bank."

Curtis Dall, FDR's son-in-law as quoted in his book, "My Exploited Father-in-Law"

"We shall have world government whether or not you like it, by conquest or consent."

Council on Foreign Relations member James Warburg to The Senate Foreign Relations Committee on February 17th, 1950

Pronouncements Through the Years
By Members and Observers of the Ruling Class
Regarding Their Plans to Outlaw the Sovereignty of Nations
Under the Permanent Authority of a Single International Federation:

The New World Order

1951 -- July 31: The Chicago Tribune publishes an article, "OWI (office of war information) Propaganda Machine Linked to Rhodes (Rhodes Scholars) Men," stating: "Those who absorbed the Elmer Davis (Rhodes scholar and head of OWI), Office of War Information training have pushed the British concept of policing the world with American soldiers and economic aid and have fought for a world federation under which the United States would surrender its sovereignty."

1953 -- The Impact of Science on Society by Fabian Socialist Bertrand Russell is published in which he declares: "I think the subject which will be of most importance politically is mass psychology.... Various results will soon be arrived at: that the influence of home is obstructive.... although this science will be diligently studied, it will be rigidly confined to the governing class.

The populace will not be allowed to know how its convictions were generated.

When the technique has been perfected, every government that has been in charge of education for a generation will be able to control its subjects securely without the need of armies or policemen.... Educational propaganda, with government help, could achieve this result in a generation. There are, however, two powerful forces opposed to such a policy: one is religion; the other is nationalism.... A scientific world society cannot be stable unless there is a world government."

1962 -- A lecture [is] given by CFR member Nelson Rockefeller at Harvard University in which he says that there is "...a new and free order struggling to be born.... (There is a) fever of nationalism.... (but) the nation-state is becoming less and less competent to perform its international political tasks.... These are some of the reasons pressing us to lead vigorously toward the true building of a new world order.... (with) voluntary service.... Sooner perhaps than we may realize.... there will evolve the basis for a federal structure of the free world."

1968 -- "The Subtle and Leisurely Penetration," a reference report from the George Mason School of Correspondence, is published by Education Information, Inc., of Sacramento, CA. It mentions that the thirty-two Americans to be Rhodes Scholars this year have been selected, and then states: "The stated objectives of Cecil John Rhodes and his friend, Sir Andrew Carnegie, included the reduction of the United States to a colony of the New World Order."

1970 -- "Between Two Ages: America's Role in the Technetronic Era" by Zbigniew Brzezinski [referenced above] is published. He is a CFR member who will become the first director of the Trilateral Commission and President Carter's national security advisor. In this book he states:

"Marxism represents a further vital and creative stage in the maturing of man's universal vision..... Human beings become increasingly manipulable and malleable.... Today we are again witnessing the emergence of transnational elites.... whose ties cut across national boundaries.... The nation-state is gradually yielding its sovereignty.... Further progress will require greater American sacrifices. More intensive efforts to shape a new world monetary structure will have to be undertaken."

1973 -- August 10: The New York Times publishes "From a China Traveler" by David Rockefeller, who writes about Communist China: "One is impressed immediately by the sense of national harmony.... There is a very real and pervasive dedication to chairman Mao and Maoist principles. Whatever the price of the Chinese Revolution, it has obviously succeeded not only in producing more efficient and dedicated administration, but also in fostering high morale and community purpose. General social and economic progress is no less impressive.... The enormous social advances of China have benefited greatly from the singleness of ideology and purpose.... The social experiment in China under Chairman Mao's leadership is one of the most important and successful in history."

1974 -- Richard N. Gardner, writes in the April 1974 issue of Foreign Affairs, [an] Article entitled "The Hard Road to World Order:" [As referenced above] "In short, the "house of world order:" will have to be built from the bottom up rather than from the top down. It will look like a great "booming, buzzing confusion" but an end run around national sovereignty, eroding it piece by piece, will accomplish much more than the old-fashioned frontal assault."

1986 -- "The Wise Men" was co-authored by Rhodes Scholar, CFR member, and Time Magazine Editor, Walter Isaacson, who described how the six leaders who "shaped a new world order" were internationalists, and had a "common outlook." One of them, Chip Bohlen, was quoted as saying about socialism:: "Maybe that is the road we ought to go down." Also in the book one reads that Arthur Schlesinger, Jr. in 1965 wrote: "The New York financial and legal community was the heart of the American establishment.... its front organizations, the Rockefeller, Ford and Carnegie foundations and the Council on Foreign Relations."

1988 -- George Bush would run for the presidency of the United States in 1988, and on Feb 10, The Washington Post quoted David Rockefeller as remarking that: "He's (Bush) one of us.... If he were president, he would be in a better position than anyone else to pull together the people in the country who believe that we are in fact living in one world and have to act that way."

1990 -- Mikhail Gorbachev [is] quoted in [the] Washington Post [on] Feb 25 1990: ".... A new world order is taking shape so fast that governments as well as private citizens find it difficult just to absorb the gallop of events....."

1990 -- Mikhail Gorbachev speaking at Stanford University [is] quoted by Sentinel wire services [on] June 5 1990: "Saying the world should not debate who won the Cold War, Soviet President Mikhail S. Gorbachev called Monday for the United States and Soviet Union to be partners in building "a new world order"....

President Bush (I) quotes on [the] New World Order and [the] United Nations:

"Time and again in this century, the political map of the world was transformed. And in each instance, a new world order came about through the advent of a new tyrant or the outbreak of a bloody global war, or its end." Feb 28, 1990

[This statement is made six months before the first Gulf War, an action enabled by a direct lie from the Bush administration -- see below.]

"Out of these troubled times, our fifth objective--a new world order--can emerge..... We are now in sight of a United Nations that performs as envisioned by its founders." -- Sept 11, 1990

Bush delivers an address to Congress titled "Toward a New World Order," regarding the crisis in the Persian Gulf after Iraq invaded Kuwait in August. [Immediately before this action, Saddam Hussein was told by US Diplomat April Gillespie that the US would take no position on such issues as had arisen between the two countries.] Bush will follow with an October 1 address to the U.N., in which he will speak of the "collective strength of the world community expressed by the U.N.... a historic movement towards a new world order."

"I think what's at stake here is the new world order.... a reinvigorated United Nations." -- Jan 7, 1991

"(The Gulf crisis) has to do with a new world order. And that world order is only going to be enhanced if this newly activated peacekeeping function of the United nations proves to be effective." -- Jan 9, 1991

"When we are successful, and we will be, we have a real chance at this new world order, an order in which a credible United Nations can use its peacekeeping role to fulfill the promise and vision of the UN's founders." -- Jan 16 1991

1992 -- July 20: Time magazine publishes "The Birth of the Global Nation," by Strobe Talbott (Rhodes scholar roommate of Bill Clinton at Oxford University, CFR director, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace board of directors member, and Trilateralist from a wealthy Ohio investment banking family), in which he writes:

"All countries are basically social arrangements.... No matter how permanent or even sacred they may seem at any one time, in fact they are all artificial and temporary.... Perhaps national sovereignty wasn't such a great idea after all..... But it has taken the events in our own wondrous and terrible century to clinch the case for world government."

1992 -- August 26: The New York Times publishes "The World Needs an Army on Call" by U.S. Senator David Boren (Rhodes Scholar 1963, CFR member, and member of "Skull and Bones") in which he states: "In the aftermath of World War II, President Truman wanted to empower the United Nations to create a New World Order...."

Richard Gardner (CFR)proposes that forty to fifty member nations contribute to a rapid-deployment force of one hundred thousand volunteers that could train under common leadership.... It is time for us to create such a force.... The existence of such a force would go a long way toward making the "new world order" more than just a slogan."

1993 -- June 22. In case there is any doubt about whether President Clinton (CFR) supports world government, on this date he signs a letter to the World Federalist Association congratulating Strobe Talbott (CFR) on receiving (June 24) the WFA's first "Norman Cousins Global Governance Award." The WFA is a leading force for world federal government.

Clinton's letter states: "Norman Cousins worked for world peace and world government.... Strobe Talbott's lifetime achievements as a voice for global harmony have earned him this recognition.... He will be a worthy recipient of the Norman Cousins Global Governance Award. Best wishes.... for future success."

1993 -- July 18: CFR member and Trilateralist Henry Kissinger writes in The Los Angeles Times concerning NAFTA: "What Congress will have before it is not a conventional trade agreement but the architecture of a new international system.... a first step toward a new world order."

1993 -- September 9: Concerning whether U.S. troops should remain in Somalia as part of a U.N. operation, General Colin Powell, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, says that a pullout would be "devastating to our hopes for the new world order and our ability to participate in multinational organizations to deal with problems like this."

1993 -- W. Scott Thompson (Rhodes Scholar 1963-66) writes "Conflict and Conflict Resolution: On to the Twenty-First Century" for the federal United States Institute of Peace, of which he is a board member appointed by President Reagan in 1986. In this article, Thompson writes about "a positive factor: the greater reliance on (and opportunity for) the United Nations to resolve perennial conflicts.... In addition to a strengthened U.N., a New World Order requires understandings and divisions of labor among like-minded friends across the globe."

1994 -- The World Federalist Association will publish "The Genius of Federation: Why World Federation Is the Answer to Global Problems," which will state: "Let the U.N. establish new agencies such as an International Criminal Court... National sovereignty would be gradually eroded until it is no longer an issue. Eventually a world federation can be formally adopted with little resistance."

1994 -- May 3: President Clinton signs Presidential Decision Directive 25, which strengthens the U.N. and describes how American soldiers will serve under foreign commanders. PDD25 will only be released to top administration officials and a few member of Congress. The general public is refused access.

1994 -- The McAlvany Intelligence Advisor, March 1995, quotes Vladimir Zhirinovsky (Vice -Chairman of the Russian Duma and Member of the Council of Europe) on November 9 at a press conference at the U.N.: "There has long been a hidden agenda to merge America and Russia under the New World Order."

1995 -- Jan 27: Billionaire financier George Soros at the World Economic Forum at Davos, Switzerland, says the world needs a "new world order," and he further warns: "I am here to alert you that we are entering a period of world disorder."

1995 -- July/ August: In the CFR's Foreign Affairs, prominent CFR member Arthur Schlesinger, Jr. exclaims: "We are not going to achieve a new world order without paying for it in blood as well as in words and money."

1995 -- The report, "Our Global Neighborhood," by The Commission on Global Governance (partly funded by the U.N. Development Program and endorsed by the U.N. Secretary-General) is released, and states: "A new world order must be organized.... Global governance is the way we manage global affairs.... nations have to accept that in certain fields, sovereignty has to be exercised collectively.... We strongly endorse community initiatives to.... encourage the disarming of civilians...."

1996 -- "A Reporter's Life" by Walter Cronkite is published, in which he proclaims: "The proud nations someday will.... yield up their precious sovereignty."

1996 -- May 11: Journalist Joan Veon interviews David C. Korten, author of "When Corporations Rule the World" (1995) and former Ford Foundation project specialist in Manila. In this interview, Korten claims that:

"The World Trade Organization is creating a world government in which one organization which is totally unelected, wholly secretive.... with the power to virtually override and local or national laws if those in any way inconvenience global corporations.... It was a terrible shock (to those of us who supported Bill Clinton) when Clinton came in and GATT and NAFTA became the centerpieces of his policy.... And in a sense, there was almost a seamless transition from President Bush to President Clinton in that regard.... Our democracy has been rendered meaningless by big money. The truth is there are politicians (who) are owned lock, stock and barrel by the big money interests.... Our elections create, to some extent, a facade of choice."

1996 -- October 23: On "The Charlie Rose Show" on the Public Broadcasting System, Mikhail Gorbachev states: "We are part of the Cosmos. Cosmos is my God. Nature is my God.... The future society will be a totally new civilization which will synthesize the experience of Socialism and Capitalism...."

1998 -- May 5: The New York Times publishes "The New World Order" by A. M. Rosenthal, in which he writes:

"April 30 -- U.S. approves another $1 billion in aid to Indonesia as part of the international $40 billion economic bailout. President Suharto refuses to break up the multibillion-dollar monopolies controlled by himself, family and friends. He says no political reforms until 2003, at earliest. Police break up student protests.

May 1 -- Washington Times and A.P. say C.I.A. reports China has nuclear missiles targeted at U.S.

May 3 -- President Clinton's June visit to China will include welcome ceremonies at Tiananmen Square. Washington preparing to allow U.S. companies to sell nuclear reactors to China.

May 4 -- Human rights workers report continued oppression in China and Indonesia; more executions in China than in all the rest of the world.

The U.S., its democratic allies and major dictatorships are rapidly building a new world order -- not quite finished yet but already a central part of international life and values.

Its ideology, powers, rewards and punishments are supplanting those that prevailed internationally until 1994, when President Clinton joined the new order. If it continues, it will be the most important new international concept since the end of World War II.

The order was created without formal parliamentary approval by its sponsors, or any treaty. But every week, sometimes every day, the underlying tenets are revealed, in action. See above.

The following description of objectives and goals of the new order is so different from principles recently assumed in the West, though not always followed, that it may read as satire. It is not.

The fundamental change, demanded by the dictatorships and agreed to in practice by the democracies, is that the internal policies of persecution by the rulers, and the rights of the governed, are not a primary moral or economic consideration of the world.

The democracies, under these values, can protest some internal acts of the dictatorships -- torture and such. But they must do so quietly, not allowing these acts, or often even security interests, to damage the new overriding value of the democratic leaders.

That value is the trade and investment with the dictatorships that the democracies believe important to their national economies -- which are sometimes called jobs, but usually interpreted as corporate profit.

In exchange, dictatorships allow democracies to invest and trade in enterprises the capitalists consider profitable to their corporate strength, although not necessarily to their own employees or the national economic health of their countries.

If the dictatorships, or authoritarian governments as some are known more pleasantly, find their economies collapsing through the corruption generic to such societies, the International Monetary Fund and individual democracies rush to arrive with bailout.

The explanation given is that otherwise the dictatorships' economies would disintegrate, bringing revolution. Now, the people of the dictatorships may long for revolution. Obviously that cannot be allowed to overcome saving the dictatorship and thus rescuing the money invested by nationals of democracies.

Accepting these values, the events dated above become understandable, and even neatly logical.

The Indonesian dictator, for instance, was installed by the army 33 years ago and has been in power ever since. Now he needs scores of billions with which to overcome his own ineptitude and family corruption, and do the right thing by his foreign investors. Who can deny him?

The U.S. gets to sell strategic material to China, offering as an extra a visit by the U.S. President to honor the Communist leaders and expand their power and political life span.

Religious and political mavericks in the totalitarian partners of the new world order get prison, or death, often both.

The press of the democracies gets to write stories about the growth of order in the new order. Other citizens of the democracies get to say costs of imported goods are down, how nice.

Americans and Europeans may come to object for political or moral reasons, or because the new world order may after all cost them their jobs. But they will never be able to say they never knew; see above."

2001 - Gary Hart, at a televised meeting organized by the Council on Foreign Relations three days after 9/11, states: "There is a chance for the President of the United States to use this disaster to carry out ... a new world order."

The Patriot Act

The USA PATRIOT Act Was Planned Before 9/11
by Jennifer Van Bergen

Whether the Administration could have anticipated 9/11 or not, the proponents of the USAPA were waiting to go long before that day. Similar antiterrorism legislation was enacted in the 1996 Antiterrorism Act, which however did little to prevent the events of 9/11, and many provisions had either been declared unconstitutional or were about to be repealed when 9/11 occurred.

James X. Dempsey and David Cole state in their book, "Terrorism & the Constitution: Sacrificing Civil Liberties in the Name of National Security," that the most troubling provisions of the pre-USAPA anti-terrorism laws, enacted in 1996 and expanded now by the USAPA, "were developed long before the bombings that triggered their final enactment."

The US Media's Dirty Little Secret by Bill Douglas

As [Michael] Ruppert quickly noted, in one known [9/11] case, a large number of "put" options were placed through the Alex Brown or (AB Brown) Unit of Deutschebank. Ruppert recalled that AB Brown had been chaired until he became the Executive Director (No. 3) at the CIA in 1998, by A.B. "Buzzy" Krongard.

AB Brown and Deutschebank have a history of being connected with covert operations and money laundering. In fact had, they had just been investigated by Senator Levin's committee on Correspondent Banking and mentioned in Department of Justice investigations. So, it begs the question, if you were an Arab terrorist who wanted to cash in on your foreknowledge of the next days' attacks using United and American Airlines stock, would you go to a known CIA connected bank to do it? Especially, if you knew, as Ruppert had previously documented, that the CIA tracks all stock trades in real time? Probably not.

One $2.5 million trade, made through AB Brown by a late-comer went unclaimed after 9-11 when the markets were closed for four days. By that time alarms over the insider trades were sounding all over, even on CBS News. Most of the smarter crooks had absconded with their money by exercising their put options while the attacks were taking place through offshore accounts.

The head of AB Brown, Mayo Shattuck III, who is a close friend and associate of Krongard, resigned the day after 9-11-2001 without anyone except Ruppert connecting the dots. To this day the Bush Administration has not told us who made those insider trades or why the head of AB Brown resigned on 9-12-2001.

Calculated Machinations and Lies

How does one sit down to write about the deliberate circumvention of law in a nation of laws by the Chief Executive? Especially, when the actions taken by that executive ignore the lessons that were hard learned and codified into law for the express purpose of preventing the very actions taken?

The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978 (or FISA) provides the framework for how surveillance by covert agencies may or may not be done. The Bush Administration has put forth the argument that FISA had to be circumvented due to immediate need for surveillance of subjects in the aftermath of 9/11 due to urgent national security concerns. But this is a lie.

FISA provisions already provide for emergency surveillance measures. Under 36 USC 1805, the Attorney General may authorize emergency surveillance (including wiretapping and other regulated surveillance methods) for up to 72 hours, so long as application for approval by the FISA supervisory court is made before that time expires. The Administration already had all the emergency measures it needed to do surveillance without illegal encroachment on American civil liberties.

DEMOCRACIES DIE BEHIND CLOSED DOORS

So THAT'S Why Secrets Were Kept from Congress, Statutory Law Was Circumvented, and Journalists May Be Prosecuted

The administration thus is left with the argument that Article II empowers the President secretly to circumvent FISA's restrictions. But this begs the question: why not go through the statutory process outlined, indeed mandated, in Article I of the Constitution? The only real answer proffered by the administration (after they suggested that such a move would have been politically unviable and then backed away from that suggestion): the transparency of the legislative process, and of any resulting legislation, would have endangered national security.

Bush's Lie about the (Time-Is-Critical) Burdens of FISA by Eleanor Clift

The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978 established a special FISA secret court designed to act expeditiously. The executive branch can tap anybody's phone and not even get a warrant until 72 hours after the fact. The FISA court isn't picky; it's only turned down five requests out of 19,000 in its quarter-century existence. Bush publicly and proudly says he will continue to break the law. The Washington Post reported that one FISA court judge has resigned in apparent protest, and the others are asking why we have a secret court when it is ignored.

It Goes Beyond "Balancing" Liberty and Security 12-26-05 Post of Joseph Nye and Reaction

"..... I can even understand why President Bush would want to authorize NSA to intercept phone calls between the United States and Afghanistan. But what is inexplicable is why he decided to ignore the 1978 FISA law which set up a special court to authorize such acts in time of emergency. As Colin Powell recently stated, the president could easily have achieved his objective within the law. The FISA court has rarely turned down requests, and when an action is urgent, the executive can act and then turn to the court. And as former Senator Daschle has written, neither he nor others in Congress approved of by-passing the FISA court when the Administration raised the subject in 2001."

Dear Mr. Nye:

An issue and an observation with your post:

1. The issue is not just that George Bush broke an existing law, but that he stood in front of the American people and said that the laws do not apply to him. (Actually he said, as Commander in Chief, he could make up the laws he would follow.) This is not a responsible approach to a security threat. This is Tyranny.

Wiretapping of Americans:No One is Targeted If Everyone is Monitored

“This is especially imperative in light of the ongoing revelations of additional surveillance programs in violation of federal law. These revelations fly in the face of previous assurances that the NSA’s surveillance of Americans’ “communications” was “narrow” and did not include “domestic” calls between Americans. As a matter of law, FISA requires a court order before the conversations or communication records of people in the United States are targeted, regardless of whether the phone call is domestic or international. See 50 U.S.C. § 1801(f)(2) (providing statutory protections for targeted communications “to or from a person in the U.S.”). The Committee should reject any assertion that these protections are inapplicable if every American is monitored and thus no one is “targeted” or, in other words, no one has any legal protection. Such claims turn FISA and its obvious intent inside out.”

Illegal Wiretapping: Spooks React

A few current and former signals intelligence guys have been checking in since this NSA domestic spying story broke. Their reactions range between mildly creeped out and completely pissed off.

All of the sigint specialists emphasized repeatedly that keeping tabs on Americans is way beyond the bounds of what they ordinarily do -- no matter what the conspiracy crowd may think.

"It's drilled into you from minute one that you should not ever, ever, ever, under any fucking circumstances turn this massive apparatus on an American citizen," one source says. "You do a lot of weird shit. But at least you don't fuck with your own people."

...
TIA, of course, would be "Total Information Awareness," [the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency's] effort to find potential enemies of the state in the data trails of ordinary folks. The program was [partially] canceled a few years back. But a whole bunch of similar efforts continue throughout the government.

NSA and Bush's Illegal EavesdroppingEXCERPT: from the Blog: Schneir on Security

When President Bush directed the National Security Agency to secretly eavesdrop on American citizens, he transferred an authority previously under the purview of the Justice Department to the Defense Department and bypassed the very laws put in place to protect Americans against widespread government eavesdropping. The reason may have been to tap the NSA's capability for data-mining and widespread surveillance.

Illegal wiretapping of Americans is nothing new. In the 1950s and '60s, in a program called "Project Shamrock," the NSA intercepted every single telegram coming into or going out of the United States. It conducted eavesdropping without a warrant on behalf of the CIA and other agencies. Much of this became public during the 1975 Church Committee hearings and resulted in the now famous Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) of 1978.

The purpose of this law was to protect the American people by regulating government eavesdropping. Like many laws limiting the power of government, it relies on checks and balances: one branch of the government watching the other.

The fundamental issue here is security, but it's not the security most people think of. James Madison famously said: "If men were angels, no government would be necessary. If angels were to govern men, neither external nor internal controls on government would be necessary...."

Over 200 years ago, the framers of the U.S. Constitution established an ingenious security device against tyrannical government: they divided government power among three different bodies.

A carefully thought out system of checks and balances in the executive branch, the legislative branch, and the judicial branch, ensured that no single branch became too powerful.

After watching tyrannies rise and fall throughout Europe, this seemed like a prudent way to form a government. Courts monitor the actions of police. Congress passes laws that even the president must follow.

Since 9/11, the United States has seen an enormous power grab by the executive branch. It's time we brought back the security system that's protected us from government for over 200 years.

Constitution in Crisis: Domestic Surveillance and Executive Power

"Now, I want to be absolutely clear. What the President ordered in this case was a crime.

...
And we have to deal with that as citizens and, unfortunately, You have to deal with that as Members of Congress.

...
Now, Members that stay silent are making a choice. Very few Members have faced this type of test of Faith. But You are facing it now, and as Citizens and as Members, it's now up to us. We are called to account to the many benefits that we have gotten from this system.

We are called to account to do something, and not to remain silent."

Quakers and Other Domestic Terrorists

"... agents of the 902nd Military Intelligence Group from Fort Meade, MD ... infiltrated the Quaker Meeting House, and then filed a report designating us a CREDIBLE THREAT.

The president's agents DID NOT come to worship alongside us, to help us plan our educational program, or to protect us.

And it wasn't just us. Shortly after NBC aired its report, churches and other groups began sharing their experiences of infiltration and intimidation with us.

Saint Maurice's Catholic Church in Dania, the Unitarian Universalists, the Fort Lauderdale Friends, members of Pax Christi in West Palm Beach, environmental groups, and many others.

Agents rummaged through trash, attacked and snooped into email, hacked web sites, and listened in on phone conversations ... address books and activist meeting lists have disappeared."

Bush Grants Self Permission To Grant More Power To Self

WASHINGTON, DC—In a decisive 1–0 decision Monday, President Bush voted to grant the president the constitutional power to grant himself additional powers.

"As president, I strongly believe that my first duty as president is to support and serve the president," Bush said during a televised address from the East Room of the White House shortly after signing his executive order. "I promise the American people that I will not abuse this new power, unless it becomes necessary to grant myself the power to do so at a later time."

The Presidential Empowerment Act, which the president hand-drafted on his own Oval Office stationery and promptly signed into law, provides Bush with full authority to permit himself to authorize increased jurisdiction over the three branches of the federal government, provided that the president considers it in his best interest to do so.

"In a time of war, the president must have the power he needs to make the tough decisions, including, if need be, the decision to grant himself even more power," Bush said. "To do otherwise would be playing into the hands of our enemies."

9.4 His Honor: Judge James Robertson

A Federal Jurist Follows His Conscience

When you serve on a secret court that oversees spying, there's not much you can do when you think that the law has been broken or the Constitution has been violated. That's because you cannot discuss the confidentiality of the court that you participate in.

But you still can maintain your integrity by taking an action that all too few people have done when confronted with the illegal activities of the Busheviks: you can resign.

That is exactly what Judge James Robertson did, who -- until a few days ago -- served on the FISA, or Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, Court. According to the Washington Post, "Two associates familiar with his decision said yesterday that Robertson privately expressed deep concern that the warrantless surveillance program authorized by the president in 2001 was legally questionable and may have tainted the FISA court's work."

It was the late Chief Justice and ardent right winger, William Rehnquist, who appointed Robertson to the FISA Court. One anonymous source told the Washington Post, "What I've heard some of the [FISA] judges say is they feel they've participated in a Potemkin court."

We don't know much about Judge Robertson, who still serves on the federal bench in a regular capacity, but we do know he did the honorable thing in a silent act of protest.

Judge Quits FISA Court Over Bush's Spying on Americans

A federal judge has resigned from a special court to protest President Bush's secret authorization of a warrantless domestic spying program.

The action by U.S. District Judge James Robertson stemmed from deep concern that the surveillance program that Bush authorized was legally questionable and may have tainted the work of the court that Robertson resigned from, say two associates of the judge.

Judges on Surveillance Court To Be Briefed on Spy Program

By Carol D. Leonnig and Dafna Linzer
Washington Post Staff Writers
Thursday, December 22, 2005; A01

The presiding judge of a secret court that oversees government surveillance in espionage and terrorism cases is arranging a classified briefing for her fellow judges to address their concerns about the legality of President Bush's domestic spying program, according to several intelligence and government sources.

...

Such comments underscored the continuing questions among judges about the program, which most of them learned about when it was disclosed last week by the New York Times. On Monday, one of 10 FISA judges, federal Judge James Robertson, submitted his resignation -- in protest of the president's action, according to two sources familiar with his decision. He will maintain his position on the U.S. District Court here.

AT&T Sells Out the Constitutional Rights of its Customers

Former AT&T technician Mark Klein is the key witness in the Electronic Frontier Foundation's class-action lawsuit against the company, which alleges that AT&T illegally cooperated in an illegal National Security Agency domestic-surveillance program.

Excerpted from his Statement:

In 2003 AT&T built "secret rooms" hidden deep in the bowels of its central offices in various cities, housing computer gear for a government spy operation which taps into the company's popular WorldNet service and the entire internet. These installations enable the government to look at every individual message on the internet and analyze exactly what people are doing. Documents showing the hardwire installation in San Francisco suggest that there are similar locations being installed in numerous other cities.

The physical arrangement, the timing of its construction, the government-imposed secrecy surrounding it, and other factors all strongly suggest that its origins are rooted in the Defense Department's Total Information Awareness (TIA) program which brought forth vigorous protests from defenders of constitutionally protected civil liberties last year:

"As the director of the effort, Vice Adm. John M. Poindexter, has described the system in Pentagon documents and in speeches, it will provide intelligence analysts and law enforcement officials with instant access to information from internet mail and calling records to credit card and banking transactions and travel documents, without a search warrant."

The New York Times, 9 November 2002

To mollify critics, the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency (Darpa) spokesmen have repeatedly asserted that they are only conducting "research" using "artificial synthetic data" or information from "normal DOD intelligence channels" and hence there are "no U.S. citizen privacy implications" (Department of Defense, Office of the Inspector General report on TIA, December 12, 2003). They also changed the name of the program to "Terrorism Information Awareness" to make it more politically palatable.

But feeling the heat, Congress made a big show of allegedly cutting off funding for TIA in late 2003, and the political fallout resulted in Adm. Poindexter's abrupt resignation last August. However, the fine print reveals that Congress eliminated funding only for "the majority of the TIA components," allowing several "components" to continue (DOD, ibid). The essential hardware elements of a TIA-type spy program are being surreptitiously slipped into "real world" telecommunications offices.

In San Francisco the "secret room" is Room 641A at 611 Folsom Street, the site of a large SBC phone building, three floors of which are occupied by AT&T. High-speed fiber-optic circuits come in on the 8th floor and run down to the 7th floor where they connect to routers for AT&T's WorldNet service, part of the latter's vital "Common Backbone."

In order to snoop on these circuits, a special cabinet was installed and cabled to the "secret room" on the 6th floor to monitor the information going through the circuits. (The location code of the cabinet is 070177.04, which denotes the 7th floor, aisle 177 and bay 04.) The "secret room" itself is roughly 24-by-48 feet, containing perhaps a dozen cabinets including such equipment as Sun servers and two Juniper routers, plus an industrial-size air conditioner.

9.5 Cheney-Specter Bill S. 2453

Senators of Both Parties Urge Further Hearings on Bill

We are concerned by provisions in the newest version of your bill that suggest that the executive branch could conduct wiretaps and physical searches without the court orders currently required by FISA and that would amend FISA to authorize "program warrants."

In addition, we believe that Congress needs far more information about the newest section of your bill, which contains numerous complex amendments to FISA that appear to rewrite the law significantly.

http://www.rawstory.com/news/2006/Republican_Democratic_Senators_criticize_Specter_FISA_0906.html

Letter to Senator Specter from a Roster of Prominent Civil Liberties Groups

EXCERPT: The most recent substitute (numbered 6588) to S. 2453 and the amendment circulated late last week, would further erode checks and balances on electronic surveillance in the United States and seriously weaken the civil liberties of Americans. Rather than restoring the Constitutional requirements by ensuring individualized judicial warrants for and congressional oversight of government surveillance in the United States, the most recent version of your bill --

- ∅ makes compliance with the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, including mandatory judicial approval of each request for a wiretap or pen register relating to people in this country, optional;
- ∅ makes it even more difficult for Americans to obtain judicial review of extrajudicial surveillance activities by establishing a set of rules that make it very difficult to get a full and fair hearing on the merits:
- ∅ allows courts to dismiss challenges to electronic surveillance programs for any reason;
- ∅ requires courts, upon an affidavit from the Attorney General, to transfer cases challenging the legality of electronic surveillance or any “classified communications intelligence activity” to the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, where proceedings are secret and only the government is permitted to participate; and
- ∅ prohibits the FISC from disclosing any classified information to any parties unless disclosure is required by the Constitution, rather than when necessary to do so under appropriate protective orders to reach a fair decision; and
- ∅ authorizes electronic surveillance in violation of the Fourth Amendment’s requirements of probable cause and particularity and its prohibition against general warrants.

Your bill amends the exclusivity provision of FISA to allow the President to conduct electronic surveillance under Title 18, under FISA or “under the constitutional authority of the executive.” It thus makes compliance with FISA optional.

The bill allows, but does not require, the President to seek judicial review of a “surveillance program” lacking in particularity (not the one described by the President and the Attorney General since last December).

The exclusivity of procedures that require individualized judicial warrants is the heart of the protections FISA provides to secure Americans’ fundamental Fourth Amendment rights.

Endorsing the President’s claim of inherent authority to wiretap without any independent check will destroy FISA and undermine the effort to preserve Americans’ constitutional right to privacy in their communications.

9.6 Senator Frank Church:

The Abyss of Warrantless Wiretapping by John Nichols

Thirty years ago, on April 26, 1976, the United States Senate Select Committee to Study Governmental Operations with Respect to Intelligence Activities, delivered its final report detailing the lawlessness of U.S. intelligence agencies and the need for Congress to reassert the Constitutional system of checks and balances to order to rein in the cloak-and-dagger excesses of the executive branch of the federal government.

The committee, mercifully referred to by the last name of its chair, U.S. Senator Frank Church, D-Idaho, produced fourteen reports on the formation of U.S. intelligence agencies, the manner in which they had and were continuing to operate, and the abuses of law and of power -- up to and including murder -- committed by these agencies in Chile, the Congo, Cuba, Vietnam and other nations that experienced the attention of U.S. authorities in the Cold War era.

The committee also made 96 recommendations for how to do that. Some of those recommendations, such as the committee's call for creation of a permanent Senate Select Committee on Intelligence and for a ban on assassinations of foreign leaders, were implemented.

But, as the current controversy over President Bush's warrantless wiretapping program illustrates, the potential abuses about which the Church Committee warned were not entirely -- nor even adequately -- thwarted.

<http://www.commondreams.org/views06/0426-30.htm>

Senator Frank Church: The NSA Could Enable a Dictator to Impose Total Tyranny

Senator Frank Church chaired the Senate Hearings on the FBI's COINTELPRO operation, which spied upon & attempted to infiltrate, disrupt and discredit the peace movement, as well the Civil Rights agenda of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.

“That capability at any time could be turned around on the American people, and no American would have any privacy left, such is the capability to monitor everything: telephone conversations, telegrams, it doesn’t matter. There would be no place to hide.”

He added that if a dictator ever took over, the NSA “could enable [him] to impose total tyranny, and there would be no way to fight back.”

Tapped Out: Why Congress Won't Get Through to the NSA

By Patrick Radden Keefe

The Church Committee investigation originated much as the current inquiry has. But it was not so easily rebuffed. The committee got underway after Seymour Hersh's front-page New York Times story in December 1974 outlined a widespread CIA program to spy on civilian anti-war protesters during the Nixon years.

The House and Senate each established investigative committees. The Senate's was led by Frank Church, D-Idaho, who intended to run for president the following year and embraced the national exposure and prestige of leading the charge. Before weighing in on the legality of the operations, the committee wisely sought to determine what precisely Nixon's intelligence agencies had done.

Young congressional aides began knocking on doors around Washington, and in May 1975 the committee got a major break. It obtained a document known within the CIA as "the family jewels" -- a ledger compiled by then CIA Director William Colby of all the legally questionable activities conducted by U.S. intelligence in recent years.

It was quite a list: wiretapping journalists, administering LSD to a CIA scientist who later killed himself, attempting to assassinate Castro and other foreign leaders. It ran to 700 pages.

9.7 President Bush and the Abuse of Signing Statements

By Jonathan Weisman
Wednesday, June 28, 2006

A bipartisan group of senators and scholars denounced President Bush yesterday for using scores of "signing statements" to reserve the right to ignore or reinterpret provisions of measures that he has signed into law.

Bush's statements have challenged, for instance, a congressional ban on torture, a request for data on the administration of the USA Patriot Act and even a legislative demand for suggestions on the digital mapping of coastal resources.

The Senate Judiciary Committee's hearing marked the latest effort by Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and panel Democrats to reclaim authority that they say the president has usurped as he has expanded the power of the executive branch. It came on the same day Bush gave a speech pushing for a line-item veto that would allow him to strike spending and tax provisions from legislation without vetoing the bill.

Other presidents have used signing statements to clarify their interpretation of laws, but no president has used such statements instead of ever using the veto authority spelled out in the Constitution, said Harvard University law professor Charles J. Ogletree Jr., who is serving on a new American Bar Association task force examining Bush's signing statements. Bush has never used his veto power in his presidency.

"There is a sense that the president has taken the signing statements far beyond the customary purviews," Specter told the administration's representative, Michelle E. Boardman, deputy assistant attorney general in the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel. "There's a real issue here as to whether the president may, in effect, cherry-pick the provisions he likes and exclude the ones he doesn't like."

Democrats were more blunt, blasting such statements, which are estimated to number more than 750 on 110 laws -- more than all the statements issued by other presidents.

"I've never seen anything like it," said Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (Vt.), the committee's ranking Democrat, calling the practice "a grave threat to our constitutional system of checks and balances."

Bush's Signing Statements:

Lackluster reporting about this big story has left many critically important questions unanswered.

By Dan Froomkin
June 27, 2006

President Bush's unprecedented use of "signing statements" to quietly assert his right to ignore legislation passed by Congress -- including its ban on torture -- first came to light in January due to some aggressive reporting by Boston Globe reporter Charlie Savage.

In April, Savage reported his astonishing discovery that Bush has claimed the authority to disobey more than 750 [as of June 2006] laws in all since he took office:

Bush is the first president in modern history who has never vetoed a bill, giving Congress no chance to override his judgments. Instead, he has signed every bill that reached his desk, often inviting the legislation's sponsors to signing ceremonies at which he lavishes praise upon their work.

Then, after the media and the lawmakers have left the White House, Bush quietly files "signing statements" -- official documents in which a president lays out his legal interpretation of a bill for the federal bureaucracy to follow when implementing the new law. The statements are recorded in the federal register. . .

In his signing statements, Bush has repeatedly asserted that the Constitution gives him the right to ignore numerous sections of the bills -- sometimes including provisions that were the subject of negotiations with Congress in order to get lawmakers to pass the bill. He has appended such statements to more than one of every 10 bills he has signed.

Sign Here: Presidential signing statements are more than just executive branch lunacy

By Dahlia Lithwick

Posted Monday, Jan. 30, 2006, at 5:32 AM ET

There are two ways President Bush likes to wage war on your civil liberties: He either asks you to surrender your rights directly—as he does when he strengthens and broadens provisions of the Patriot Act. Or he simply hoovers up new powers and hopes you won't find out—as he did when he granted himself authority to order warrant-less wiretapping of American citizens.

The former category seems more benign, and it's tempting to lump Bush's affinity for "presidential signing statements" in that camp. It's tempting to believe that with these statements he is merely asking that the courts take his legal views into account. But President Bush never asks anything of the courts; he doesn't think he has to. His signing statements are not aimed at persuading the courts, but at reinforcing his claim that both courts and Congress are irrelevant.

9.8 The 109th Congress: The Worst Ever

How our national legislature has become a stable of thieves and perverts -- in five easy steps (See our picks for the 10 Worst Congressmen)

by Matt Taibbi

There is very little that sums up the record of the U.S. Congress in the Bush years better than a half-mad boy-addict put in charge of a federal commission on child exploitation. After all, if a hairy-necked, raincoat-clad freak like Rep. Mark Foley can get himself named co-chairman of the House Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children, one can only wonder: What the hell else is going on in the corridors of Capitol Hill these days?

"The 109th Congress is so bad that it makes you wonder if democracy is a failed experiment," says Jonathan Turley, a noted constitutional scholar and the Shapiro Professor of Public Interest Law at George Washington Law School. "I think that if the Framers went to Capitol Hill today, it would shake their confidence in the system they created. Congress has become an exercise of raw power with no principles -- and in that environment corruption has flourished.

The Republicans in Congress decided from the outset that their future would be inextricably tied to George Bush and his policies. It has become this sad session of members sitting down and drinking Kool-Aid delivered by Karl Rove. Congress became a mere extension of the White House."

The end result is a Congress that has hijacked the national treasury, frantically ceded power to the executive, and sold off the federal government in a private auction. It all happened before our very eyes. In case you missed it, here's how they did it -- in five easy steps:

109th Congress: Goodbye, Farewell and Don't Let the Door Hit You...

By Michael Winship, December 26, 2006.

With 19 members under federal investigation and a record-low number of days in session, let's hope our new Congress can do more than the old one did.

The 109th Congress is dead. Adjourned for good.

Hooray. Don't let the door bump your behinds on the way out.

These guys set new milestones for financial and moral hanky-panky, including 19 members under federal investigation and last Friday's release of the House ethics report on the Mark Foley page scandal.

The Washington Post quoted Republican Rep. Zach Wamp of Tennessee, a member who entered Congress as part of the "Contract with America" Class of 1994: "Our leadership and some of our members grew arrogant in their power, and with arrogance comes corruption." Senator John McCain added, "We came to change Washington, and Washington changed us."

The 109th broke by a week the record of the notorious 1948 "Do-Nothing" Congress, managing to convene for a mere 103 days from January 2005 to 5 a.m., last Saturday morning. That's a little more than four days a month.

Six Corporations Now Own the Media

The Big Six
October 19, 2006
By Lauren Horwitch

What if six male billionaires decided what 300 million people watched on TV, saw in movie theatres, heard on the radio, and read in every major newspaper?

...

Some would call it an Orwellian nightmare, but... U.S. citizens call it reality. More precisely, it's called media consolidation: the popular practice of international corporations monopolizing media outlets such as TV stations, movie studios, and newspapers.

The men at the helm of those corporations are, respectively:

Sumner Redstone (Viacom), Robert Iger (Disney),
Richard Parsons (Time Warner),
Jeffrey R. Immelt (General Electric),

What's Good for Big Media Is Bad News for Public

From Indianapolis Star, December 28, 2006
By Kevin Howley

With barely a whisper from the national press corps, the Federal Communication Commission is considering measures that would allow further consolidation of the U.S. media system. If the FCC approves the changes, you can expect more of the same from Big Media: formulaic entertainment programming, public relations that passes for journalism, and all the advertisements you can eat.

Established in 1934 to regulate the nation's airwaves and ensure that broadcasters serve "the public interest," the FCC has historically promoted localism, encouraged viewpoint diversity and limited monopoly ownership of broadcasting. These are the cornerstones of a democratic media system.

In recent years, however, the FCC has become a captive agency. Rather than working on behalf of the American people, the FCC now does the bidding of a handful of powerful media industries. The result: a corrupt policymaking process that has led to unprecedented concentration of media ownership — and enormous profits for corporate shareholders. But what's good for Big Media is bad news for the American people.

Consider what happened to radio 10 years ago. In the wake of the 1996 Telecommunications Act, a reform measure that reduced ownership limits of radio stations in local and national markets, the industry went into a merger-and-acquisition frenzy. Virtually overnight, radio was transformed from a vibrant, local medium for news, public affairs and cultural programming into a wasteland dominated by industry giants.

But radio is just the tip of the iceberg. Today, six companies — Viacom, Disney, Time Warner, General Electric, Bertelsmann, and News Corporation — own 90 percent of all U.S. media holdings. This means that a handful of corporations determine what most Americans read in daily newspapers, see in movie theaters, watch on broadcast and cable television, and hear over the airwaves.

Now, at the urging of Big Media, the FCC is considering additional rule changes that would further reduce or completely eliminate the remaining laws regulating how many media outlets a single company can own in a single market.

<http://www.freepress.net/news/20009>

Facts on Media in America: Did You Know?

A healthy democracy is dependent on the diversity of ideas and freedom of communication that supports an informed populace. The FCC's mandate is to protect the public interest in this process. After years of doing a decent job, the massive financial power of the biggest media companies have broken the system down.

Now.....

Disney owns ABC. It also owns 10 television stations, 50 radio stations, ESPN, A&E, the History Channel, Discover Magazine, Hyperion Publishing, Touchstone Pictures, and Miramax Film Corp.

Viacom owns CBS. It also owns 39 television stations, 184 radio stations, The Movie Channel, Black Entertainment Television, Nickelodeon, TV Land, MTV, VH1, Simon & Schuster Publishing, Scribner, and Paramount Pictures.

General Electric owns the NBC Television Network and Universal Studios. It also owns 13 television stations, CNBC, MSNBC, Telemundo and Bravo.

Time Warner owns Warner Bros. Studios and Warner Bros. Music. It also owns HBO, half of the CW (co-owned with Viacom), CNN, and AOL.

Bertelsmann owns Sony BMG Music Entertainment (50%), Columbia Records, Arista Records, Epic Records, J Records, Jive Records, Legacy Recordings, RCA Records, RCA Victor, Sony BMG Masterworks, Sony BMG Nashville and BMG Music Publishing.

It also owns Random House Publishing, Alfred A. Knopf Publishing, Anchor Books, Ballantine Books, Ballantine Reader's Circle, Del Rey, Del Rey /Lucas Books, Fawcett Publications, Ivy Books, One World Publishing, Wellspring, Broadway Publishing,, Doubleday Publishing (USA), Black Ink/Harlem Moon Publishing, Currency Business Books, Doubleday Graphic Novels, Doubleday Religion, Nan A. News Corp. owns Fox Broadcasting Company. It also owns 26 television stations, FX, Fox News Channel, TV Guide, the Weekly Standard, New York Post, DirecTV, the publisher HarperCollins, film production company Twentieth Century Fox and the social networking website MySpace.

Currently, the FCC could decide to relax media ownership rules even more, which would allow further consolidation and put decisions about what kinds of programming and news Americans receive in even fewer hands.

Since 1995, the number of companies owning commercial TV stations declined by 40 percent.

The Telecommunications Act of 1996 was, in part, meant to increase competition in the cable industry. The Act was heavily influenced by industry lobbyists and has had the opposite effect. Three media giants own all of the cable news networks. Comcast and AOL Time Warner serve 40 percent of cable households. Cable TV rates have jumped 40 percent since the Telecom Act of 1996.

The Telecommunications Act of 1996 lifted ownership limits for radio stations, leading to incredible consolidation of radio station ownership. One company alone, Clear Channel Inc., now owns nearly 1,200 radio stations across the country. Before the change, a company could not own more than 40 stations nationwide.

According to the US Supreme Court, the Constitutional basis for the FCC's mandate to protect the American people's right of access to diverse ideas -- utterly flaunted now -- reads as follows: "It is the purpose of the First Amendment to preserve an uninhibited marketplace of ideas in which truth will ultimately prevail, rather than to countenance monopolization of that market, whether it be by the Government itself or a private licensee. It is the right of the public to receive suitable access to social, political, esthetic, moral, and other ideas and experiences which is crucial here. That right may not constitutionally be abridged either by Congress or by the FCC."

Screwing the Public Welfare; Screwing the Reporters for Doing their Jobs -- But Keeping Monsanto Happy

It is important to elaborate upon the issue of media consolidation and its effect upon the diversity of information reaching a particular market.... If, for example, only one or two media conglomerates dominate in a single market, the question is not only that of whether they will present a diversity of opinions, but also of whether they are willing to present information that may be damaging to either their advertisers or to themselves. If it is in the best interests of the media conglomerates not to run a story or allow a particular opinion, but in the best interests of the public interest to run it, it arguably makes better business sense to opt for the former over the latter.

On the local end, reporters have often seen their stories refused or edited beyond recognition, in instances where they have unearthed potentially damaging information concerning either the media outlet's advertisers or its parent company. For example, in 1997, the Fox affiliate in Tampa, Florida fired two reporters and suppressed a story they had produced about one of the Fox network's major advertisers, Monsanto, concerning the health effects of Bovine Growth Hormone (BGH). Fox took action after Monsanto threatened to sue over the story.

9.9 The Loss of Habeas Corpus

EXCERPT: Amy Goodman of Democracy Now Interviews Michael Ratner, president of the Center for Constitutional Rights:

MICHAEL RATNER:For some reason, for some peculiar reason, nobody is really covering this in the media. Yes, they're covering the McCain debate over waterboarding and torture and somewhat on the military commissions, but not really the denial of the abolishment of the fundamental writ.....

AMY GOODMAN: Now, again, maybe part of the reason we don't hear much about this is a lack of understanding of writ of habeas corpus. I mean, it's not even in English. Explain, Michael.

MICHAEL RATNER: Well, it actually comes initially out of the Magna Carta in 1215. And it had to do with when the king just believed he could pick up people anywhere in the world, throw them into a dungeon, never give them a court hearing, and you'd never hear from them again, essentially disappear them. Out of a long struggle for peoples' rights, the writ of habeas corpus emerged. Then, when we wrote our Constitution in the United States, it was considered the fundamental right essentially against a police state and can only be suspended in cases of rebellion or things like that.

And what it really says is that if a king or the president picks me up anywhere in the world, that I have a right to go into court and say, "What are your reasons for detaining me?" It doesn't say you have to be freed. But it says you have to come up -- government -- come up with a legal reason for detaining me. In other words, it takes detentions, disappearances and puts them into the light of a courtroom, where the government has to justify the detention.

The Torture King and Loss of Habeas Corpus

September 27, 2006
by Zen Garcia

Bush has stated over and over, "We do not torture detainees" and yet when Senator McCain, a once held prisoner of war, dissented against the White House position on the treatment of detainees and together with the Senate passed a law outlawing the torture of detainees; Bush issued a 'signing statement' -- an official document in which a president lays out interpretation of a new law -- in which he reserved the right to ignore Congressional demands outlawing the torture of prisoners.

Another report based on information from Pentagon and other official US sources, released by Human Rights First in October 2005 cites similar conclusions in that over 100 prisoners have died while in US custody in Iraq and Afghanistan since August 2002. Out of 98 deaths, at least 34 were suspected or confirmed homicides "caused by intentional or reckless behavior." Human Rights First representative Deborah Pearlstein told Newsnight she was "extremely comfortable" that the information was reliable while UK MP Bob Marshall-Andrews told the Press Association that "If it is indeed systemic, then the responsibility for it must go right to the top, and that would apply to both British and American governments."

A spokesman for Amnesty International UK called for an investigation into how the deaths occurred while in US custody and said, "Deaths in custody during the war on terror are a real matter of concern to us and we want to see the US and its allies allowing a full independent and impartial investigation into these deaths, as well as mounting incidents of alleged torture and other mistreatment."

Some methods used by the CIA and military interrogators include using a scalpel to make numerous cuts on the penis of Benyam Mohammed, who was arrested at Karachi airport on April 10 2002, and flown by a US government plane to a prison in Morocco. Other techniques include forceful beatings and even stomping which resulted in the paralysis of Sami Al-Laithi, a result of his detention at the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay. Al-Laithi is now confined to a wheelchair with two broken vertebrae. Images released from the Abu Ghraib scandal show the forceful rape, sodomy of Iraqi men, women, and children and include depictions of electrical wires attached to the genitalia of detainees. There were also images of dogs being used to attack detainees. Would it shock the American people to know that John C. Yoo, a Justice Department attorney who helped devise the Bush regime's doctrine of torture, condones even the torture of terrorists children to extract information from their terrorist parents.

We know through Seymour Hersh's work that the policy of torturing and sodomizing terrorist children had in fact been implemented because the Pentagon has videotapes of boys being sodomized at Abu Ghraib to extract information from their parents. "[There's] a massive amount of criminal wrongdoing that was covered up at the highest command out there, and higher. Basically what happened is that those women who were arrested with young boys/ children in cases that have been recorded. The boys were sodomized with the cameras rolling. The worst about all of them is the soundtrack of the boys shrieking.... They are in total terror it's going to come out."

Manuals used by the U.S. Army's School of the Americas between 1982 and 1991 condoned executions, beatings and many other human rights abuses. John Yoo admits that he regards the sexual torture of children to be a legal and justifiable tactic, if authorized by the president. Louise Arbour, the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, on December 7, 2005 declared: "The absolute ban on torture, a cornerstone of the international human rights edifice, is under attack. The principle we once believed to be unassailable-the inherent right to physical integrity and dignity of the person-is becoming a casualty of the so-called war on terror."

...
The writ of habeas corpus guarantees a prisoners right to know the charges against them in a court of law without being held in indefinite confinement just because someone wants them detained. Without it Presidents and Kings have historically been able to lock people up, essentially throwing away the key, and disappearing them by allowing them to rot in jail. The writ of habeas corpus stems from the Magna Carta of 1215 and was so important for protecting peoples rights that when our forefathers wrote our Constitution in the United States, it became a foundation point for our own Bill of Rights. Having the writ of habeas corpus suspended for terror suspects, can also endanger American citizens as the Patriot Act defines 'domestic terrorists' as anyone that challenges the policies of government administration especially anti-war demonstrators.

Keith Olbermann: 'The president has now succeeded where no one has before'

COMMENTARY

Updated: 10:35 a.m. PT Oct 11, 2006

On "Countdown" Keith Olbermann examined the Military Commission's Act of 2006 and what it does to something called habeas corpus.

EXCERPT: The president has now succeeded where no one has before. He's managed to kill the writ of habeas corpus. Tonight, a special investigation, how that, in turn, kills nothing less than your Bill of Rights. Because the Mark Foley story began to break on the night of September 28, exploding the following day, many people may not have noticed the bill passed by the Senate that night.

Congress passed the Military Commission's Act to give Mr. Bush the power to deal effectively with America's enemies—those who seek to harm the country. He has been very clear on who he thinks that is.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GEORGE W. BUSH, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: For people to leak that program and for a newspaper to publish it does great harm to the United States of America.

That fact that we're discussing this program is helping the enemy.

Liberty and Habeas Corpus (II)

Justice Scalia, Unusually Joined by Justice Stevens

The long reach of habeas corpus was reaffirmed by the U.S. Supreme Court in Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, in 2004, when it ruled that U.S. citizens detained in Guantanamo Bay, a U.S. military base on long-term lease from Cuba, were on U.S. territory and therefore have a right to plea to a U.S. federal court for habeas corpus and thereby enforce certain minimal liberty rights under the Due Process Clause. The companion case, Rasul v. Bush, declared that aliens (non-citizens) held at an overseas U.S. military base also have this right.

However, recently passed legislation, the Military Commissions Act, has suspended habeas corpus protection for all aliens, even the tens of millions of aliens visiting or residing inside the United States proper. It also jeopardizes many of the legal protections U.S. citizens have against arbitrary detainment once we have invoked habeas corpus.

In Hamdi Justice Scalia, unusually joined by Justice Stevens, quoted William Blackstone's 18th century legal treatise, parts of which had also been quoted by Alexander Hamilton in Federalist #84:

"Of great importance to the public is the preservation of this personal liberty: for if once it were left in the power of any, the highest, magistrate to imprison arbitrarily whomever he or his officers thought proper ... there would soon be an end of all other rights and immunities. ... To bereave a man of life, or by violence to confiscate his estate, without accusation or trial, would be so gross and notorious an act of despotism, as must at once convey the alarm of tyranny throughout the whole kingdom. But confinement of the person, by secretly hurrying him to gaol, where his sufferings are unknown or forgotten; is a less public, a less striking, and therefore a more dangerous engine of arbitrary government. ...

Without habeas corpus severe political oppression and deprivation of liberty through the practice of "disappearing" becomes all too easy.

Digging Up the "Disappeared" in Guatemala

By N.C. Aizenman
Washington Post Foreign Service
Thursday, September 28, 2006

EXCERPT: NEBAJ, Guatemala -- A decade after the conclusion of the long civil war that ravaged this Central American nation, Guatemalans are literally trying to dig up their past.

Spurred by a surge of requests from victims' families this year, dozens of forensic anthropologists have been fanning out across the countryside to search for remains of the 200,000 people -- most of them Mayan Indian civilians -- who were killed or abducted during the 36-year conflict.

Many were massacred by military forces and dumped into mass graves. Others were buried hurriedly in unmarked, secret locations by relatives anxious to avoid rampaging troops.

About 40,000 victims simply disappeared after being seized by government operatives.

Nearly every day brings another grisly discovery: skulls of toddlers executed with gunshots to the head; corpses of young men whose necks are still looped with the garrotes used to strangle them.

Nearly every week brings another funeral packed with weeping relatives: once-youthful widows now wrinkled and gray, children long since grown to adulthood.

The CIA & Guatemala's "Disappeared"

by Allan Nairn

The Nation, April 17, 1995

(c) 1995 The Nation Co., L.P.

EXCERPT: The U.S. government has systematic links to Guatemalan Army death squad operations that go far beyond the disclosures that have recently shaken official Washington....

North American C.I.A. operatives work inside a Guatemalan Army unit that maintains a network of torture centers and has killed thousands of Guatemalan civilians. The G-2, headquartered on the fourth floor of the Guatemalan National Palace, has, since at least the 1960s, been advised, trained, armed and equipped by U.S. undercover agents. Working out of the U.S. Embassy and living in safehouses and hotels, these agents work through an elite group of Guatemalan officers who are secretly paid by the C.I.A. and who have been implicated personally in numerous political crimes and assassinations.

9.10 Zbigniew Brzezinski on Democracy

"Democracy is inimical to imperial mobilization."

In his 1997 book The Grand Chessboard, Brzezinski lays out the scheme in unvarnished terms.

"To put it in a terminology that harkens back to the more brutal age of ancient empires, the three grand imperatives of imperial geostrategy are to prevent collusion and maintain security dependence among the vassals, to keep tributaries pliant and protected, and to keep the barbarians from coming together."

.....

In a correlative article on oil imperialism, we saw that a major part of the Military Industrial Complex's overall world dominance strategy is:

- * First, they sell armaments to a regime (for example, Panama, Iraq, Yugoslavia/Kosovo, Afghan/Pakistan/Taliban Mujaheddin, Saudi Arabia).
- * Then, they demonize the regime to which they sold the armaments and declare war on it (e.g. Panama invasion, Gulf War, UN Kosovo war, Afghanistan war, war with Iraq).
- * After the war, they station permanent military bases in the country and use the military bases to control the energy resources in the surrounding countries (think Iran and Saudi Arabia).
- * They impose the current U.S. foreign policy doctrine called "full-spectrum dominance:" the U.S. must control military, economic and political developments everywhere.

9.11 Josef Goebbels: Hitler's propaganda Minister

The Control of a Population Through the Repetition of a Fear-Inducing Lie

"If you tell a lie big enough and keep repeating it, people will eventually come to believe it. The lie can be maintained only for such time as the State can shield the people from the political, economic and/or military consequences of the lie. It thus becomes vitally important for the State to use all of its powers to repress dissent, for the truth is the mortal enemy of the lie, and thus by extension, the truth is the greatest enemy of the State."

Josef Goebbels, German
Propaganda Minister, 1933-1945

"What good fortune for those in power that the people do not think."
Adolf Hitler

"Through clever and constant application of propaganda people can be made to see paradise as hell, and also the other way around, to consider the most wretched sort of life as paradise."

Adolf Hitler, Mein Kampf, 1923

"Behind the ostensible government sits enthroned an invisible government owing no allegiance and acknowledging no responsibility to the people. To destroy this invisible government, to befoul the unholy alliance between corrupt business and corrupt politics is the first task of the statesmanship of the day."

Theodore Roosevelt, April 19, 1906

"Once a government resorts to terror against its own population to get what it wants, it must keep using terror against its own population to get what it wants. A government that terrorizes its own people can never stop. If such a government ever lets the fear subside and rational thought return to the populace, that government is finished."

Michael Rivero

The CIA is not now nor has it ever been a central intelligence agency. It is the covert action arm of the President's foreign policy advisers. In that capacity it overthrows or supports foreign governments while reporting "intelligence" justifying those activities. It shapes its intelligence, even in such critical areas as Soviet nuclear weapons capability, to support presidential policy. Disinformation is a large part of its covert action responsibility, and the American people are the primary target of its lies.

When Lying Pays Off: The Fabrications of the Neo-Cons

by Wayne Madsen
CounterPunch
May 09, 2003

America's manipulative neo-conservatives, who support unending aggression against any country that does not succumb to United States political, economic, and military control and who, themselves, seized power in Washington through electoral malfeasance, are taking a page from Nazi Germany's leaders in their quest for world domination. It is no coincidence that the neo-cons are worried about comparisons between their policies and those of Hitler. Ed Gernon, the Canadian executive producer of the upcoming CBS miniseries, "Hitler: The Rise of Evil," was fired when he suggested similarities between the methods used by both Hitler and Bush to wipe away civil liberties by playing on popular fear. The Nazi-like campaign against Gernon was launched by the New York Post and TV Guide, both owned by proto-fascist Rupert Murdoch's News Corporation.

After being caught lying about Iraq's weapons of mass destruction to prove their flimsy case that Iraq was a world class threat, the neo-cons now are planting fabricated documents in the rubble of Iraqi intelligence and secret police facilities. Through a media laundering process, "discovered" documents are handed over to right-wing outlets owned by such slash and burn media moguls as Murdoch, Conrad Black, and Sun Myung Moon.

We are now being fed information that captured Iraqi intelligence documents "prove" that France assisted escaping members of Saddam Hussein's government by handing them French passports in Syria. This follows repeated allegations that other "documents" proved French (and Russian and German) intelligence cooperation with Iraq's intelligence service before the war. Syria has been accused of accepting Iraq's phony weapons of mass destruction. Iran is accused of helping Al Qaeda (its most bitter enemy).

Hitler used false evidence and phony rhetoric to justify his invasions of Danzig, Austria, Czechoslovakia, and Poland. American ambassadors in New Zealand, Norway, Turkey, Greece, Canada, Mexico, Barbados, Jamaica, Brazil, Belgium, Chile, and Luxembourg have acted like Nazi German Foreign Minister Joachim Von Ribbentrop's bellicose ambassadors in bullying nations that failed to support the U.S. war on Iraq. France is being faced with being kicked out of NATO military planning meetings, Germany with a loss of U.S. military bases, Belgium with the loss of NATO's headquarters, and Canada, Chile, and Mexico with trade sanctions.

There are lies, damned lies. Ahmad Chalabi, the leader of the Iraqi National Congress, stooge of the neo-cons, and a convicted bank embezzler is now aiming his wrath at Jordan. Chalabi, who bilked the American taxpayer out of millions of dollars from State Department and CIA budgets in order to fight his self-styled struggle against Saddam from the restaurants of London's Mayfair District and the clothiers of Savile Row, now claims that recently "found" documents implicate Jordan's Royal Family in Saddam's spider's web.

Of course, it was a Jordanian court that found Chalabi guilty of stealing $300 million from the country's Petra Bank and which sentenced him to over 20 years at hard labor. It is surprising that it took this Gollum-like sycophantic creature so long to accuse the Jordanians of being in bed with Saddam. Of course, Chalabi will not admit that while he was a math professor at the American University of Beirut during the 1970s, he served as an agent for the Shah of Iran's feared SAVAK secret police. So much for Chalabi's "democratic" credentials and his support for using Iraq as a base for the United States to attack Iran and install the son of the Shah upon a resurrected Peacock Throne.

In the End -- Cheney and Rumsfeld Got Neo-Conned

Report: United States, Fearing Blackmail, Raids Chalabi’s Offices

The Pentagon has begun forcing some of its employees to undergo lie detector tests in an attempt to find out who leaked highly classified information to Iraqi exile leader Ahmed Chalabi. Chalabi has been accused of sharing secret information with Iran about U.S. war plans in Iraq and tipping Iran off to the fact that the U.S. had broken Iran's top-secret intelligence code which allowed the U.S. to easily spy on Iran's intelligence services. Chalabi has denied the charges. Newsweek is reporting Chalabi may have also attempted to blackmail U.S. officials by collecting and maintaining files of potentially damaging information on U.S. officials. Some officials said that when Chalabi's offices were raided last month, American officials had hoped to find Chalabi's cache of information he had gathered on Americans.

DVD: American Blackout

Directed By Ian Inaba

Five months before the 2000 election, Florida Governor Jeb Bush and his Secretary of State Katherine Harris (who was also the Florida Chairwoman of the Bush/Cheney Campaign) contracted with a Republican dominated corporation by the name of ChoicePoint/DBT to generate a “Felon List” designed to quietly purge thousands of citizens from the state’s voter rolls.

By specifying an “80%” accuracy rate, Bush and Harris ensured that the list would include tens of thousands of names belonging to non-felons whose names resembled those of actual past felons, thereby disenfranchising massive numbers of innocent citizens, most of whom just happened to be black. When ChoicePoint, warned the state that such a result was sure to follow its unexact criteria, they were told to proceed as instructed.

Choicepoint was paid $4 million for its work. The deal marked the first time in American history that the legitimacy of a state’s voter rolls were placed in the hands of a private corporation. In the aftermath, Choicepoint would admit to improperly identifying over 90,000 “suspected felons.”

Ian Inaba's scathing documentary on this criminal corruption and the related attack on black voters in Ohio in 2004 is framed against the courage and heroism of the remarkable Cynthia McKinney. To watch this Congresswoman call out Donald Rumsfeld to his face while all around her, her fellow legislators shrink in their high-backed chairs is the stuff of great American drama.

To Order:

<http://www.americanblackout.com/>

Florida Disenfranchised Tens of Thousands of African American Voters in 2000

What made the 'Florida Central Voter File' remarkable is that Florida is the only state that pays a private company to purge the voter file of ineligible voters, in effect allowing a private company to make the administrative decision of who is not eligible to vote.

...

There was an open bid for the job, which was assigned to DBT Online, despite the fact that its bid was the highest-priced. The state gave the job to DBT for a first year fee of $2,317,800. (Greg Palast, The Best Democracy Money Can Buy, 2nd edition. p. 50)

In 1998 the state signed an agreement with DBT for $4 million..... DBT Online later merged into ChoicePoint, of Atlanta.

At first, Florida specified only exact matches on names, birthdates and genders to identify voters as felons. However, state records reveal a memo dated March 1999 from Emmett "Bucky" Mitchell, a lawyer for the state elections office who was supervising the felon purge, asking DBT to loosen its criteria for acceptable matches. When DBT representatives warned Mitchell that this would yield a large proportion of false positives (mismatches), Mitchell's reply was that it would be up to each county elections supervisor to deal with the problem.....

In February 2000, in a phone conversation with the BBC's London studios, ChoicePoint vice-president James Lee said that the state "wanted there to be more names than were actually verified as being a convicted felon".....

On 17 April 2001, James Lee testified, before the McKinney panel, that the state had given DBT the directive to add to the purge list people who matched at least 90% of a last name. DBT objected, knowing that this would produce a huge number of false positives (non-felons).....

Lee went on saying that the state then ordered DBT to shift to an even lower threshold of 80% match, allowing also names to be reversed (thus a person named Thomas Clarence could be taken to be the same as Clarence Thomas). Besides this, middle initials were skipped, Jr. and Sr. suffixes dropped, and some nicknames and aliases were added to puff up the list.

"DBT told state officials," testified Lee, "that the rules for creating the [purge] list would mean a significant number of people who were not deceased, not registered in more than one county, or not a felon, would be included on the list. DBT made suggestions to reduce the numbers of eligible voters included on the list." According to Lee, to this suggestion the state told the company, "Forget about it".

Florida has re-edited its felon list five times since 1998 to correct errors.

The first list DBT Online provided to the Division of Elections in April 2000 contained the names of 181,157 persons. Approximately 65,776 of those included on the first list were identified as felons.

In May 2000, DBT discovered that approximately 8,000 names were erroneously placed on the exclusion list, mostly those of former Texas prisoners who were included on a DBT list that turned out never to have been convicted of more than a misdemeanor.

Later in the month, DBT provided a revised list to the Division of Elections (DOE) containing a total of 173,127 persons. Of those included on the "corrected list", 57,746 were identified as felons.

Examples:

Thomas Cooper, Date of Birth September 5, 1973; crime: unknown; conviction date, Jan. 30, 2007

Johnny Jackson Jr., Date of Birth 1970; crime: none ("mistaken" for John Fitzgerald Jackson who was still in his jail cell in Texas)

Wallace McDonald, Date of Birth, 1928; crime: fell asleep on a bus-stop bench in 1959

Reverend Willie Dixon, convicted in the 1970s at the latest; note: received full executive clemency.

Randall J. Higginbotham, Date of Birth August 28, 1960; crimes: none ("mistaken" for Sean David Higginbotham, born June 16, 1971)

Reverend Willy D. Whiting Jr., crimes: a speeding ticket from 1990 ("confused" with Willy J. Whiting-- they have birthdays 2 days apart)

The list even allowed "matches" between Edward and Edwin, and even Edwina, ignoring middle names and initials and skipping Jr. and Sr. suffixes.

According to the Palm Beach Post, among other problems with the list, although blacks accounted for 88% of those removed from the rolls, they made up only about 11% of Florida's voters.

Voter demographics authority David Bositis, a senior research associate at the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies in Washington, DC, reviewed The Nation's findings and concluded that the purge-and-block program was "a patently obvious technique to discriminate against black voters."

The Unreported Story of How They Fixed the Vote in Florida

From the book: The Best Democracy Money Can Buy (Penguin 2003)
by Greg Palast

EXCERPT:

There's Thomas Cooper, who's crime is still in the future.

And then Johnny Jackson Jr., on the purge list because his name partially matched that of a man convicted in Texas, John Fitzgerald Jackson (no "Jr."). Johnny Jr.'s never been to Texas, and his mama swears to me he never had the middle name Fitzgerald. Neither is there any evidence that John Fitzgerald Jackson, the felon, ever left Texas -- or ever left his jail cell. There are 638 John and Johnny Jacksons (and permutations thereof) in the Florida phone book. How did the state know they had the right Johnny? They didn't; and it looks like they didn't want to know. Using the address history database, as the state was promised, would have saved Jackson, a Black man, his right to vote.

Then there's Wallace McDonald, age sixty-four. Wallace tells me how in 1959 he fell asleep on a bus-stop bench and was busted. Even for a Black man in then-segregated Florida, that was a misdemeanor, not a felony. He never lost his right to vote; and the state agrees he was wrongly "scrubbed." Had DBT checked the databases, as promised, they would not have named Wallace.

Willie Dixon is on the list, too. The Reverend Dixon was convicted decades ago, and has received full executive clemency. That would have been an easy one to catch if the state had checked and verified the clemency records as per the contract.

Read down the list and mismatches jump out at you. Note they have taken voting rights away from Randall Higginbotham, age forty-one, because of the crimes of Sean Higginbotham, age thirty. The list is lousy with suspicious matches: pairing voter David Russell Butler Jr. of Florida to convict David Butler of Ohio. No question why David R. registered with his full name and appended the Junior. There are sixty-six other David Butlers listed in the Florida phone book and they must get one another's mail all the time. It is disturbingly improbable that they purged the right Butler. That should have been a no-brainer to correct.

The wrong Butlers, Smiths and Jacksons remained on the list because of DBT's "matching logic" and "matching criteria." Credit card companies can require thirty-five matches for verification before they will issue you plastic. The State of Florida was content with a partial match of four: names (the first four letters were good enough), date of birth, gender and race. Not even the address or state mattered in the mad dash to maximize the number of citizens stripped of their civil rights.

Rather than add matching criteria to verify the list, the state told DBT to remove criteria. For example, Messrs. Butler and Jackson so carefully added "Jr." to their official names to avoid such confusion. Tough luck. I found an internal mail in Roberts's office, dated June 14, 2000, in which clerks fretted about what they called "tweaked" data, allowing "matches" between Edward and Edwin (and Edwina!); deliberately ignoring middle names and initials; and skipping the "Jr." and "Sr." suffixes.

I met with a Willie D. Whiting of Tallahassee. The Reverend Whiting confessed he had a speeding ticket a decade ago, but doubted that should cost him his right to vote. But there he was: on the purge list, matched with Willie J. Whiting -- no "Jr." -- whose birthday was two days different from Willie D.'s.

Our experts looked at the paltry number of match criteria and were horrified. One, Mark Hull, told me the state and ChoicePoint could have chosen criteria that would have brought down the number of "false positives" to less than a fragment of 1 percent. He said it made him ill to learn what the company had agreed to do. These revelations were especially upsetting to him; he had been the senior programmer for CDB Infotek, a ChoicePoint company.

I turned back to the question of Florida hiring DBT for $2.3 million, booting [another] company charging $5,700. When questioned, George Bruder, ChoicePoint DBT's senior vice president, said, "a little birdie" told him to enter that astonishing bid. What else did the little birdie tell him?

What happened to the 1,200 databases, the millions and millions of records that DBT used in its Carl Saganesque sales pitch to the state? In fact, the state paid for this vital cross-check -- or at least DBT's bid said that for their two-million-dollar fee, they would use artificial intelligence for "cross-referencing linked databases.... simultaneously searching hundred of data sources, conducting millions of data comparisons, compiling related data for matching and integration."

In all, they had four billion records to check against. Under "Offer and Bid" it read:

"DBT will process total combined records from:

"8,250,000 Criminal Conviction Records
69,000,000 Florida Property Records
62,000,000 National Change of Address Records
12,590,470 Florida Driver License Records. . . ."

And so on. The phone calls, the massive data crunching, it all justified the big payoff to DBT and scared away competitors who could not match DBT's database firepower. DBT's offer promised "273,318,667 total records to be processed." But they didn't do it.

Once the contract was nailed, it seems a little birdie in the state told DBT not to bother with all that expensive computing work. In the state files, on the DBT bid, I found a handwritten notation, "don't need," next to the listing of verification databases (the 62 million address histories, etc.), though this work was included in the price.

Each pass would have cut the list by thousands, thereby letting thousands more Democrats vote. So when the state said, "Don't need," the underlying motive was, "Don't want."

"Wanted More Names Than We Can Verify....."

DBT's "expertise" in obtaining data justified their hiring. But it was a con. Janet Mudrow, the state's liaison with DBT, confessed to me that DBT merely downloaded lists from eleven states that make the data available publicly, such as Texas. Any high school kid with a Mac and a credit card could have grabbed the names off the Internet. And that was okay with Florida, even though eight of those states do not take away an ex-felon's voting rights, and therefore should not have been used at all.

Yet Mudrow, in Harris's office, says the state neither demanded reimbursement nor sought any penalty as permitted under the contract. In fact, the state awarded DBT another contract renewal, bringing total fees to over $4 million.

Why didn't the state complain, sue, or withhold payment? Following my first reports, when the stats hit the fan, ChoicePoint DBT agreed to a one-year extension of their contract without charge. But why didn't the watchdog bark?

One can only conclude that Harris's office paid an awful lot of money for either (a) failed, incomplete, incompetent, costly, disastrous work that stripped innocent citizens of their rights, or (b) services performed exactly as planned.

How could ChoicePoint, such an expert outfit, do such a horrendous job, without complaint from their client? You'd think their client, the state, ordered them to get it wrong. They did. Just before we went on air in February 2000, ChoicePoint vice president James Lee called us at the BBC's London studios with the first hint that the state of Florida instructed the company to give them the names of innocents. The state, he said, "wanted there to be more names than were actually verified as being a convicted felon."

...
"DBT told state officials," testified Lee, "that the rules for creating the [purge] list would mean a significant number of people who were not deceased, not registered in more than one county or not a felon would be included on the list. Likewise, DBT made suggestions to reduce the numbers of eligible voters included on the list."

Correct the list? Remove those "not a felon"? The state, says DBT, told the company, Forget about it.

Hunting the Black Voter -- the June 9 Letter

...
In November, ChoicePoint's PR men jumped up and down insisting in calls to me that "race was not part of the search criteria." The company repeated this denial in press releases after they were sued by the NAACP for participating in a racist conspiracy against citizens' civil rights. DBT complained to my producers and to federal investigators: Race was not a search criterion, period!

Then, I obtained a letter dated June 9, 2000, signed by ChoicePoint DBT's Vice President Bruder written to all county elections supervisors explaining their method: "The information used for the matching process included first, middle, and last name; date of birth; race; and gender; but not Social Security Number."

They had not lied to me. Read closely. They used race as a match criterion, not a search criterion. The company used this confusion between "match" and "search" criteria to try to pull the BBC off the track. They tried to slide the race question by the U.S. Civil Rights Commission. However, on the morning of February 16, the day after our broadcast, I faxed to the commission the June 9 letter. Later that day, the commission questioned Bruder.

COMMISSION: Was race or party affiliation matching criterion in compiling that list?

BRUDER: [under oath] No. . . .

COMMISSION: [June 9 letter read into record.] Did you write this letter? It has your signature on it.

BRUDER: Can I see it, please?

COMMISSION: So, you misinformed the Florida supervisors of elections that race would be used as a matching criterion?

BRUDER: Yes.

Wise answer, Mr. Bruder. Misleading elections officials is not a crime; perjury would be. He pleaded confusion. So if race was not a match criterion, how did Black people get matched to felons? I was perplexed by this until I looked again at the decoded scrub sheets: There were columns for felon race and voter race. How could DBT deny that? ...

However, DBT had simply identified race for every real felon, and the secretary of state provided the race of the voters. It was left to the county supervisors to finish the Jim Crow operation: They would accept racial matches as "proof" that the right person was named. Therefore, a Black felon named Willie Whiting wiped out the registration of an innocent Willie Whiting (Black) but not the rights of an innocent Will Whiting (white).

Florida Quietly Admits 2000 Election Fraud

By The Associated Press

April 26, 2002 | Filed at 10:17 p.m. ET

MIAMI (AP) -- A federal judge has approved a settlement between Leon County and civil rights groups that sued over widespread voting problems in the 2000 presidential election in Florida.

The state and six other counties remain in the case brought by the NAACP and four other groups who sued in a dispute that grew out of the long-uncertain results of Florida's vote for president.

...

State lawmakers changed election laws in response to complaints after the 2000 election, but critics said the changes didn't go far enough.

...

Many voters said their votes didn't count or they were turned away from polls due to mistakes on voter lists, busy telephone lines at election headquarters, punch-card voting machine foul-ups and other problems.

Statewide, the largest numbers of voting problems were found in precincts with high proportions of black and elderly voters.

Under the settlement, both sides will work to restore voters who were wrongly removed from voters lists in the 2000 election. Many law-abiding voters across the state said their names were dropped because they were mistakenly pegged as ex-cons, who generally aren't allowed to vote in Florida.

The county also agreed to improve communication and training for staffers who work on election day.

Leon County includes the state capital of Tallahassee.

"The first principle of republicanism is that the "lex majoris partis" is the fundamental law of every society of individuals of equal rights; to consider the will of the society enounced by the majority of a single vote as sacred as if unanimous is the first of all lessons in importance, yet the last which is thoroughly learnt."

Those who count the votes decide everything."

VIDEO: Votergate

An excellent video exposing major problems with the U.S. elections process is the information-packed documentary Votergate. This fast-moving film shows serious improprieties of concern to both political parties in the United States which threaten the very base of our democracy.

NOTE:

After the 2000 Florida Presidential Election Debacle, the state quietly "settled" class action lawsuits filed on behalf of the tens of thousands of outraged African American voters who had been disenfranchised, and Congressional hearings were convened in Washington to ensure that such a travesty could not be repeated. The Help America Vote Act (HAVA) was the outcome. Among the authors of the bill was Representative Bob Ney, a Republican out of Ohio. Ney steered appropriations for the new "remedies" into the hands of four companies that manufactured Electronic Voting Systems.

What was generally unreported at the time was that each of these companies, which were paid three billion dollars amongst them to “fix” the problem, had been founded and were owned by active, long-standing, and particularly “far right” supporters of the Republican Party. Two of the owners were brothers. One went so far as to publicly “guarantee” a George Bush victory in Ohio, where the man in charge of counting the vote, Secretary of State Kenneth Blackwell, was not only the Chairman of Bush’s Campaign, but a stockowner in Diebold Electronic Systems, the company that won the contract to “do” the state’s vote, as well.

The Electronic Voting Machines, it turns out, have destroyed the credibility of the process they were supposedly installed to save. The companies that created them have designed them to be almost majestically easy to hack, in an equally breathtaking number of ways. Back doors, generic passcodes posted on the internet, Wi-Fi drive by -- we can barely count the ways. The machines repeatedly malfunction, are suddenly in short supply or cease to function (curiously often in more urban precincts) and therefore require a steady flow of “swapping,” “tinkering” and “tweakage” by representatives of the companies that supplied them. And the beauty of it is -- the proprietary software that runs the machines leaves no trace of any changes that have been made to the count, and there is not a single shred of paper, anywhere in the voting process, which might be used to instigate a recount -- or an investigation.

Think no mischief has ensued? Mischief that has led to tragedy all across the globe?

If you remain a patriot, regardless of whether you consider yourself a Republican or a Democrat -- or neither -- you would do well to read the following articles, and use them as a springboard to getting seriously involved.

If, on the other hand, you’ve always found elections to be more a tiresome duty than a privilege, these articles will help to ease your conscience if you decide to sit the next few out, and let the people in the “know” decide things for you. For the truth is -- given these new modern improvements, and their total control by highly partisan, privatized interests, many of the agents of which have shown no compunction whatsoever to be bound by the concept of “honor” -- your vote does not matter.

Diebold, Electronic Voting and the Vast Right-Wing Conspiracy by Bob Fittrakis

A joint study by the California and Massachusetts Institutes of Technology following the 2000 election determined that between 1.5 and 2 million votes were not counted due to confusing paper ballots or faulty equipment. The federal government’s solution to the problem was to pass the Help America Vote Act (HAVA) of 2002.

One of the law’s stated goals was “Replacement of punch card and lever voting machines.” The new voting machines would be high-tech touch screen computers, but if there’s no paper trail, how do you know if there’s been a computer glitch? How can the results be trusted? And how do you recount to see if the actual votes match the computer’s tally?

Bev Harris, author of Black Box Voting: Ballot Tampering in the 21st Century, argues that without a paper trail, these machines are open to massive voter fraud. Diebold has already placed some 50,000 machines in 37 states and their track record is causing Harris, Johns Hopkins University professors and others great concern.

Johns Hopkins researchers at the Information Security Institute issued a report declaring that Diebold's electronic voting software contained "stunning flaws." The researchers concluded that vote totals could be altered at the voting machines and by remote access. Diebold vigorously refuted the Johns Hopkins report, claiming the researchers came to "a multitude of false conclusions."

Perhaps to settle the issue, someone illegally hacked into the Diebold Election Systems website in March 2003 and stole internal documents from the company and posted them online. Diebold went to court to stop, according to court records, the "wholesale reproduction" of some 13,000 pages of company material.

The Associated Press reported in November 2003 that: "Computer programmers, ISPs and students at [at] least 20 universities, including the University of California, Berkeley, and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology received cease and desist letters" from Diebold. A group of Swarthmore College students launched an "electronic civil disobedience" campaign to keep the hacked documents permanently posted on the Internet.

Harris writes that the hacked documents expose how the mainstream media reversed their call projecting Al Gore as winner of Florida after someone "subtracted 16,022 votes from Al Gore, and in still some undefined way, added 4000 erroneous votes to George W. Bush." Hours later, the votes were returned. One memo from Lana Hires of Global Election Systems, now Diebold, reads: "I need some answers! Our department is being audited by the County. I have been waiting for someone to give me an explanation as to why Precinct 216 gave Al Gore a minus 16,022 [votes] when it was uploaded." Another hacked internal memo, written by Talbot Iredale, Senior VP of Research and Development for Diebold Election Systems, documents "unauthorized" replacement votes in Volusia County.

Harris also uncovered a revealing 87-page CBS news report and noted, "According to CBS documents, the erroneous 20,000 votes in Volusia was directly responsible to calling the election for Bush." The first person to call the election for Bush was Fox election analyst John Ellis, who had the advantage of conferring with his prominent cousins George W. Bush and Florida Governor Jeb Bush.

Incestuous relationships

Increasingly, investigative writers seeking an explanation have looked to Diebold's history for clues. The electronic voting industry is dominated by only a few corporations – Diebold, Election Systems & Software (ES&S) and Sequoia. Diebold and ES&S combined count an estimated 80% of U.S. black box electronic votes.

In the early 1980s, brothers Bob and Todd Urosevich founded ES&S's originator, Data Mark. The brothers Urosevich obtained financing from the far-Right Ahmanson family in 1984, which purchased a 68% ownership stake, according to the Omaha World Herald. After brothers William and Robert Ahmanson infused Data Mark with new capital, the name was changed to American Information Systems (AIS). California newspapers have long documented the Ahmanson family's ties to right-wing evangelical Christian and Republican circles.

In 2001, the Los Angeles Times reported, ". . . primarily funded by evangelical Christians – particularly the wealthy Ahmanson family of Irvine – the [Discovery] institute's $1-million annual program has produced 25 books, a stream of conferences and more than 100 fellowships for doctoral and postdoctoral research." The chief philanthropists of the Discovery Institute, that pushes creationist science and education in California, are Howard and Roberta Ahmanson.

According to Group Watch, in the 1980s Howard F. Ahmanson, Jr. was a member of the highly secretive far-Right Council for National Policy, an organization that included Lieutenant Colonel Oliver North, Major General John K. Singlaub and other Iran-Contra scandal notables, as well as former Klan members like Richard Shoff. Ahmanson, heir to a savings and loan fortune, is little reported on in the mainstream U.S. press. But, English papers like The Independent are a bit more forthcoming on Ahmanson's politics.

"On the right, figures such as Richard Mellon Scaife and Howard Ahmanson have given hundreds of millions of dollars over several decades to political projects both high (setting up the Heritage Foundation think-tank, the driving engine of the Reagan presidency) and low (bankrolling investigations into President Clinton's sexual indiscretions and the suicide of the White House insider Vincent Foster)," wrote The Independent last November.

The Sunday Mail described an individual as, ". . . a fundamentalist Christian more in the mould of U.S. multi-millionaire Howard Ahmanson, Jr., who uses his fortune to promote so-called traditional family values . . . by waving fortunes under their noses, Ahmanson has the ability to cajole candidates into backing his right-wing Christian agenda.

Ahmanson is also a chief contributor to the Chalcedon Institute that supports the Christian reconstruction movement. The movement's philosophy advocates, among other things, "mandating the death penalty for homosexuals and drunkards."

The Ahmanson family sold their shares in American Information Systems to the McCarthy Group and the World Herald Company, Inc. Republican Senator Chuck Hagel disclosed in public documents that he was the Chairman of American Information Systems and claimed between a $1 to 5 million investment in the McCarthy Group.

In 1997, American Information Systems purchased Business Records Corp. (BRC), formerly Texas-based election company Cronus Industries, to become ES&S. One of the BRC owners was Carolyn Hunt of the right-wing Hunt oil family, which supplied much of the original money for the Council on National Policy.

In 1996, Hagel became the first elected Republican Nebraska senator in 24 years when he did surprisingly well in an election where the votes were verified by the company he served as chairman and maintained a financial investment. In both the 1996 and 2002 elections, Hagel's ES&S counted an estimated 80% of his winning votes. Due to the contracting out of services, confidentiality agreements between the State of Nebraska and the company kept this matter out of the public eye. Hagel's first election victory was described as a "stunning upset" by one Nebraska newspaper.

Hagel's official biography states, "Prior to his election to the U.S. Senate, Hagel worked in the private sector as the President of McCarthy and Company, an investment banking firm based in Omaha, Nebraska and served as Chairman of the Board of American Information Systems." During the first Bush presidency, Hagel served as Deputy Director and Chief Operating Officer of the 1990 Economic Summit of Industrialized Nations (G-7 Summit).

Bob Urosevich was the Programmer and CEO at AIS, before being replaced by Hagel. Bob now heads Diebold Election Systems and his brother Todd is a top executive at ES&S. Bob created Diebold's original electronic voting machine software. Thus, the brothers Urosevich, originally funded by the far Right, figure in the counting of approximately 80% of electronic voting in the United States.

Like Ohio, the State of Maryland was disturbed by the potential for massive electronic voter fraud. The voters of that state were reassured when the state hired SAIC to monitor Diebold's system. SAIC's former CEO is Admiral Bill Owens. Owens served as a military aide to both Vice President Dick Cheney and former Defense Secretary Frank Carlucci, who now works with George H.W. Bush at the controversial Carlyle Group. Robert Gates, former CIA Director and close friend of the Bush family, also served on the SAIC Board.

Diebold's track record

Wherever Diebold and ES&S go, irregularities and historic Republican upsets follow. Alastair Thompson, writing for scoop.co of New Zealand, explored whether or not the 2002 U.S. mid-term elections were "fixed by electronic voting machines supplied by Republican-affiliated companies." The scoop investigation concluded that: "The state where the biggest upset occurred, Georgia, is also the state that ran its election with the most electronic voting machines." Those machines were supplied by Diebold.

Wired News reported that "... a former worker in Diebold's Georgia warehouse says the company installed patches on its machine before the state's 2002 gubernatorial election that were never certified by independent testing authorities or cleared with Georgia election officials." Questions were raised in Texas when three Republican candidates in Comal County each received exactly the same number of votes - 18,181.

Following the 2003 California election, an audit of the company revealed that Diebold Election Systems voting machines installed uncertified software in all 17 counties using its equipment.

Former CIA Station Chief John Stockwell writes that one of the favorite tactics of the CIA during the Reagan-Bush administration in the 1980s was to control countries by manipulating the election process. "CIA apologists leap up and say, 'Well, most of these things are not so bloody.' And that's true. You're giving politicians some money so he'll throw his party in this direction or that one, or make false speeches on your behalf, or something like that. It may be non-violent, but it's still illegal intervention in other country's affairs, raising the question of whether or not we're going to have a world in which laws, rules of behavior are respected," Stockwell wrote. Documents illustrate that the Reagan and Bush administration supported computer manipulation in both Noriega's rise to power in Panama and in Marcos' attempt to retain power in the Philippines. Many of the Reagan administration's staunchest supporters were members of the Council on National Policy.

Bald-Faced Lies About Black Box Voting Machines

By Bev Harris

If they can't tell us the truth about simple things like "does it connect to modems," can we really be confident that they are protecting our vote?

CNBC asked Diebold CEO Wally O'Dell this question on election day, Nov. 5, 2002: "How tamper proof are these voting machines? That seems to be a concern of some who feel that it only takes one person, one hacker who can screw up an entire election. How valid is that criticism Mr. O'Dell?"

"Well, there's always risks," replied O'Dell, "but, you know, these things are not connected to the Internet. They're individual precinct by precinct, location by location. They're double checked before they're sent out. We think the technology is fabulous and very bulletproof. (Come back here after reading "rob-georgia," ask him to repeat this.)

"The GEMS computers are not connected to any communication system, including the Internet, and contain no software other than the Windows operating system and the Global Election Management System object code," wrote Dr. Brit Williams on Apr. 23, 2003. He is the official voting machine certifier for the state of Georgia, and a key member of the panel that chooses national Independent Testing Labs for voting machines.

Lies.

Not connected to any communication system are they, Dr. Williams? I spoke with James Rellinger, the technician who installed all 159 GEMS host computers in Georgia.

Harris: "I understand that you worked for Diebold Election Systems in Georgia. Can you tell me what you did?"

Rellinger: "They contracted us here in Georgia to basically follow a recipe book and we ran down and built these things."

Harris: "By 'build these things' -- I think of build, like a hammer and a screwdriver -- What do you mean by build, what were you building?"

Rellinger: "Oh, that's a good point. There were 159 of these servers that went out. All we did was run through a series of tests to make sure they could log on and communicate and make sure everything jived with the touch screen.

"When you say build they were actually just a Dell server and we added some hardware to it for instance CD burners, a tape came in them already, but we'd add things to make them modem capable.

"When you say build a server it's not physically assembling a hardware. We added a component or two to make it do what we needed to do, modems, we load the Windows 2000, put the software in then we test it against their touch-screen machines."

Let's look at just how big a whopper Dr. Williams told when he said they aren't connected to anything: Sandy Baxter, Elections Supervisor for San Juan County, Washington, also says she had modems and Internet capability:

"I think it was about 1999 we bought a new server. They gave us recommendations for servers, like Dell. They had Dell ship them to McKinney, Texas and they loaded the systems on and various modems, digiboards and stuff... The server can handle multiple PCs, but I only have one at this time, so my PC is also my server... I have two modems. I have a modem that is for going out and it is not connected to the GEMS system. So I can go to the web. I have what's called a digiboard on my server that allows multiple modem connections. I have a second modem on the GEMS system but its only for the AccuVote systems. My precincts modem me the results on that. The second modem is the only one that goes to my GEMS system. It doesn't have the capability to go in and out. I just plug it in when I use it."

The User Manuals are filled with references to modems, ports, uploading, downloading, TCP/IP protocols, transmissions, and ways to use "JResults" to upload to the web continuously on election night.

Technical specifications, including manufacturer's components lists, show that not only are there modems, but wireless communications.

All right, so they lied to us about modem hook-ups. Shall we let this cloud our trust in everything else they are telling us?

Consider this:

Diebold's official spokesman, Joseph Richardson assures us that the open ftp site was inactive. In interviews with Salon.com and the Baltimore City Paper, he said the site was old and the files were out of date. Was this the truth?

Not at all. The site was taken down on Jan. 29, 2003. The most recent file on the ftp site is dated Jan. 23, 2003. How much information was in the files? See for yourself by visiting the download site at the top of this article.

Michael Barnes, of the elections division with the Georgia Secretary of State's office, said "That ftp site did not affect us in any way shape or form because we did not do any file transferring from it."

Let's have Dr. Brit Williams weigh in. In Feb. 2003, he said "I'm not familiar with that site." On April 23, he wrote a letter that was a bit more precise:

"Apparently, there was an FTP site that Diebold employees used to store and transfer versions of the system that were under development. The contents, or even existence, of the 'rob georgia' folder has not been established. However, for the sake of this discussion, we will assume that the FTP site existed...

This would have had absolutely no effect on the election system as implemented in Georgia. The State does not obtain its election system code from an FTP site or even from Diebold."

Dr. Williams went on to outline an elaborate scheme whereby he claimed that the program files are obtained solely from ITAs (Independent Testing Labs).

What about the Secretary of State? A memo by Chris Riggall, spokesperson for Georgia Secretary of State Cathy Cox, stated that last minute "patches" were installed on all 22,000 voting machines in Georgia. Dr. Williams admitted to me that they were never examined -- not by a testing lab, not by him, not by anyone outside of Diebold. Suddenly, no one could get their stories straight on the patches either.

The patch was from Microsoft and it was for Windows, said the Secretary of State's office. But wait -- Dr. Williams says it came directly from the ITA. What does Diebold say? Diebold says they have no indication there ever was a patch.

We're going to meet one of the guys who actually installed that patch in a minute, but first let us observe the art of evasion from Diebold's Joe Richardson:

Harris: "Did you say, when interviewed by Salon.com, in reference to whether patches were put on the machines in Georgia, "We have analyzed that situation and have no indication of that happening at all."

Richardson: "Well, that is what I said at the time, however, we have continued to investigate the matter and ... (very, very long pause) Yes that is what I said to Salon.com."

Harris: "Do you stand by that now?"

Richardson: "We have continued to look into the matter."

Harris: "As you have continued to investigate this, do you have any new information as to whether patches were put on in Georgia?"

Richardson: "No."

Harris: "Has anyone thought to just call them up and ask? The Secretary of State's office?"

Richardson: "I can't say."

Harris: "What was the rob-georgia file? Who is responsible for it?"

[NOTE: Please see following item, on Viet Nam War Hero Max Cleland's stunning 2002 defeat in Georgia.]

Richardson: "I'm not privy to that information."

Harris: "Who would be able to answer that question?"

Richardson: "I can't tell you. I can look into it."

Harris: "Yes, could you do that please? In two publications, you are quoted as saying that the information on the open FTP site was old and out of date. Yet, I can tell you the most recent file on it was dated January 16, 2003. Did you do any checking to see whether the site had been used recently when you made that statement?" (A more recent file, dated Jan. 23, was later discovered.)

Richardson: "The site had already been taken down."

Harris: "Surely Diebold has access to its own site?"

Richardson: "I'm saying I didn't have access."

Harris: "Did you ask anybody?"

Richardson: (sound of shuffling papers) "Our ongoing investigation has found no merit to the insinuations of security breaches in our election solutions."

Harris: "So if there were up to 20,000 files including hardware, software specs, testing protocols, source code, you do not feel that is a security breach?" (more files have since been discovered inside a mammoth zipped directory, bringing the estimated total up to nearly 40,000 files)

Richardson: "Our ongoing investigation has found no merit to the insinuations of security breaches in our election solutions."

And now, Dr. Brit Williams on the Georgia patch:

Harris: "What was the security around the creation of the cards used to implement the patch?"

Williams: "That's a real good question. Like I say, we were in the heat of the election. Some of the things we did, we probably compromised security a little bit -- Let me emphasize we've gone back since the election and done extensive testing on all this." Dr. Williams latest 180 degree reversal (This link leads you to a forum discussing files from the ftp site, which contains several absurd statements from Dr. Williams).

And now, Michael Barnes on the Georgia patch:

Barnes: "Wyle said it did not affect the certification elements. So it did not need to be certified." (At the above-referenced link, you can also find information from a Freedom of Information Act request, in which officials admitted they did not have any certifying documents on the patch).

Harris: "Where's the written report from Wyle on that? Can I have a copy?"

Barnes: "I'd have to look for it I don't know if there was ever a written report by Wyle. It might have been by phone."

MAX CLELAND and "rob-georgia:"

Many observers have identified the 2002 election in Georgia as the RNC's TEST RUN for the 2004 Presidential Hijacking.

It was the first time Diebold Machines were used to count the vote.

Last minute software patches were illegally installed by Diebold in thousands of them -- without the authorization of the state -- and for the first time in history a national candidate (a War Hero, no less) suffered an

to lose the election by roughly the margin of his lead in the voter polls.

"In Georgia, Democratic incumbent and war-hero Max Cleland was defeated by Saxby Chambliss, who'd avoided service in Vietnam with a "medical deferment" but ran his campaign on the theme that he was more patriotic than Cleland. While many in Georgia expected a big win by Cleland, the computerized voting machines said that Chambliss had won.

The BBC summed up Georgia voters' reaction in a 6 November 2002 headline: "GEORGIA UPSET STUNS DEMOCRATS." The BBC echoed the confusion of many Georgia voters when they wrote, "Mr. Cleland -- an army veteran who lost three limbs in a grenade explosion during the Vietnam War -- had long been considered 'untouchable' on questions of defense and national security."

<http://www.commondreams.org/views03/0131-01.htm>

"It looks like the new Rolling Stone due out tomorrow will have a doozy of an article by RFK, Jr. which will look into whether the 2006 election can be hacked. Based on a few blurbs that were "sneak previewed" by Raw Story it looks like there is an even bigger story in that article -- an admission by a Diebold consultant that machine software was altered.... on the day of the election.

If anyone remembers the 2002 election in Georgia, that is the one where Max Cleland's five to six point lead was erased overnight to a seven point loss, leading to a miraculous win by Saxby Chambliss, which even describes his come from behind win as "stunning and historical" in his Senate website.

And while many indicated that this was due at least in part to an infamous advertisement that compared Cleland (a war hero) to Osama Bin Laden, there was always a cloud hanging over this election as this was the first year of the Diebold machines in Georgia, and it just not passing the "smell test."

HAVA (Help America Vote Act) and How it Backfired

Republican Congressman Bob Ney's Starring (and Lucrative) Role

There's been a great deal of speculation over the last several days, particularly in the light of Jack Abramoff's recent guilty pleas, concerning the connection of Congressman Bob Ney (R-OH) to Election Fraud in Ohio, vis a vis his stewardship and authoring of the Help America Vote Act (HAVA) back in 2001 and 2002. The heavy-handed tactics he has taken since, in order to keep the flawed act from being changed in any way over the years, along with going to great lengths to keep the nation's eyes off of massive electile dysfunction in Ohio and elsewhere since 2004, may finally get the attention it all properly deserves.

[NOTE: It got hardly any attention at all.]

...
His direct connection to the HAVA Election Reform bill passed in the wake of the 2000 Florida Election Debacle, and his various extraordinary efforts to specifically block amendments to the bill and to smokescreen attempted investigations into his home state's conduct during the 2004 Election Debacle, has been less widely reported. Until now.

While Common Cause quietly reported in December of 2004 that Diebold — the much-beleagured-of-late American Voting Machine company — paid as much as $275,000 to Abramoff's firm, Greenberg Traurig for lobbying work, The BRAD BLOG has now found additional details that begin to shed new light on Ney's personal connections to Diebold lobbyists.

Such personal connections include those with Ney's former chief of staff turned lobbyist, David DiStefano, who has been working on behalf of Diebold, Inc. and at least one other Voting Machine Company as a registered lobbyist in the House going back to at least 2001. One of DiStefano's online bios crows about his having "an insider's edge to hard-to-reach political officials." That "insider's edge" has proven to have been a very worthwhile investment for the Voting Machine Companies who'd purchased access into Ney's political office.

Congressional lobbying records reveal that Diebold, Inc. has paid at least $180,000 to DiStefano and eventually his partner, Roy C. Coffee, to lobby for the "Help America Vote Act" and other "Election Reform Issues" in Congress since 2003. Another Electronic Voting Machine Company, AccuPoll, Inc., also paid DiStefano some $70,000 to lobby for HAVA on their behalf in 2002, although that relationship was apparently terminated once the legislation was passed by Congress.

Ney was one of the original authors and lead co-sponsors of HAVA, and a fierce defender of both the act and the effort to keep further legislation from moving forward in Congress that would mandate Voter Verified Paper Ballots for electronic voting machines made by Diebold and other e-voting vendors.

In 2004, prior to the Presidential Election, Ney went so far as to send a "Dear Colleague" letter signed along with the other HAVA co-sponsors, to members of congress urging them not to amend the original legislation. He argued at the time that paper records on such machines would somehow disenfranchise disabled voters, who had been cleverly afforded a special provision in the bill which mandated at least one disabled-accessable device in every voting precinct in the country. That device, of course, would be a paperless touch-screen electronic voting machine, like the ones made by Diebold, which, legislators, vendors and lobbyists would later proffer, were required to meet provisions of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA).

Ney had also personally gone out of his way to keep Rep. Rush Holt's (D-NJ) "Voter Confidence and Increased Accessibility Act" (HR 550), which would mandate paper records for all votes cast, from ever seeing the light of day in the House Administration Committee. That, despite Holt's bill having now nearly 160 bi-partisan co-sponsors. Ney has succeeded brilliantly at squashing Holt's bill, first proposed as HR 2239 back in 2003, as it continues to both gain co-sponsors and gather dust as the powerful Republican committee chair still refuses to allow it even to be brought up for hearings.

In addition to the "Dear Colleague" letter that Ney wrote (signed by him and his co-sponsors of the HAVA legislation) in 2004, asking members of congress not to amend the act to require paper trails, Ney has made every effort to ensure that the myriad reports of massive voter disenfranchisement and electoral irregularities that occurred in Ohio remain little more than "conspiracy theory," as far as both the Mainstream Media and the majority of the American electorate perceive the matters.

He, and others who have lobbied hard on behalf of Diebold have continued to misleadingly forward the idea that what occurred in 2004, and subsequently in 2005 — where some 44 out of 88 counties in Ohio went electronic for the first time — is no cause for alarm. It's all little more than the imaginary ruminations of Democratic-party John Kerry supporters, according to such folks.

That, despite the fact that it has been the Green and Libertarian parties who have, by and large, waged the most aggressive attempt to have votes counted in Ohio, along with the extraordinarily well-documented reports of chicanery exposed nationally throughout various local media. More information in that regard will likely surface via the still-pending lawsuit on all of this brought by the League of Women Voters in Ohio.

Add that to the "staggeringly impossible" results of the 2005 Election ... there which were stunning, to say the least, and the shamefully under-reported story of the non-partisan Governmental Accountability Office's (GAO) damning report on HAVA and its gross failures released last September.

All told, it would seem that Ney and the Voting Machine Companies like Diebold have had every reason to squash whatever reporting they could on these matters, and so far, they've gotten the job largely done. At least in the mainstream outlets...

The Leading Architect of HAVA Goes to Prison

Ex-Ohio Representative Ney Sentenced to Thirty Months

WASHINGTON - Former Rep. Bob Ney was sentenced Friday to 2 1/2 years in federal prison for trading political favors for gifts and campaign donations from lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Ney, the first congressman ensnared in the lobbying scandal, pleaded guilty in October to conspiracy and making false statements. He admitted being corrupted by golf trips, tickets, meals and campaign donations from Abramoff.

"You violated a host of laws that you as a congressman are sworn to enforce and uphold," said U.S. District Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle, who recommended that Ney serve his time at a federal prison in Morgantown, W.Va.

The Corruption of the 2004 Presidential Election

by Robert F. Kennedy Jr.

Republicans prevented more than 350,000 voters in Ohio from casting ballots or having their votes counted -- enough to have put John Kerry in the White House.

Like many Americans, I spent the evening of the 2004 election watching the returns on television and wondering how the exit polls, which predicted an overwhelming victory for John Kerry, had gotten it so wrong. By midnight, the official tallies showed a decisive lead for George Bush -- and the next day, lacking enough legal evidence to contest the results, Kerry conceded. Republicans derided anyone who expressed doubts about Bush's victory as nut cases in "tin foil hats," while the national media, with few exceptions, did little to question the validity of the election. The Washington Post immediately dismissed allegations of fraud as "conspiracy theories," and The New York Times declared that "there is no evidence of vote theft or errors on a large scale."

But despite the media blackout, indications continued to emerge that something deeply troubling had taken place in 2004. Nearly half of the 6 million American voters living abroad never received their ballots -- or received them too late to vote -- after the Pentagon unaccountably shut down a state-of-the-art Web site used to file overseas registrations.

A consulting firm called Sproul & Associates, which was hired by the Republican National Committee to register voters in six battleground states, was discovered shredding Democratic registrations.

In New Mexico, which was decided by 5,988 votes, malfunctioning machines mysteriously failed to properly register a presidential vote on more than 20,000 ballots. Nationwide, according to the federal commission charged with implementing election reforms, as many as 1 million ballots were spoiled by faulty voting equipment -- roughly one for every 100 cast.

But what is most anomalous about the irregularities in 2004 was their decidedly partisan bent: Almost without exception they hurt John Kerry and benefited George Bush. After carefully examining the evidence, I've become convinced that the president's party mounted a massive, coordinated campaign to subvert the will of the people in 2004. Across the country, Republican election officials and party stalwarts employed a wide range of illegal and unethical tactics to fix the election. A review of the available data reveals that in Ohio alone, at least 357,000 voters, the overwhelming majority of them Democratic, were prevented from casting ballots or did not have their votes counted in 2004 -- more than enough to shift the results of an election decided by 118,601 votes. [See Ohio's Missing Votes: <http://www.rollingstone.com/photos/gallery/10467024/>].

In what may be the single most astounding fact from the election, one in every four Ohio citizens who registered to vote in 2004 showed up at the polls only to discover that they were not listed on the rolls, thanks to GOP efforts to stem the unprecedented flood of Democrats eager to cast ballots. And that doesn't even take into account the troubling evidence of outright fraud, which indicates that upwards of 80,000 votes for Kerry were counted instead for Bush. That alone is a swing of more than 160,000 votes -- enough to have put John Kerry in the White House.

Electronic Voting Machines Pose a Grave Threat to Democracy

EXCERPT: Repeated studies have shown that touch-screen machines, which provide voters with no paper record of their ballots, are highly susceptible to tampering. According to a report by the Government Accountability Office, the leading federal watchdog agency, the machines are "eminently hackable." It takes only a few minutes to open the machines and insert a PC card containing malicious code that will switch votes from one candidate to another.

In a demonstration conducted last year before the Board of Elections in Leon County, Florida, computer security expert Herbert Thompson cracked into an electronic machine in under sixty seconds, altering the internal code and changing the vote count.

"Every board of election has staff members with the technological ability to fix the election," says Ion Sancho, supervisor of the election board in Leon County. "Even one corrupt staffer can throw an election. Without paper records, it could happen under my nose and there is no way I'd find out about it."

Avi Rubin, a computer-science professor at Johns Hopkins University who has received $7.5 million from the National Science Foundation to study security for electronic voting, says it doesn't take a corrupt official to rig a federal election. "With electronic machines, you can commit wholesale fraud with a single alteration of software," he says. "There are a million little tricks you can build into the software that allow you to do whatever you want. I could do it for you right now on software I have."

Undue Influence After the Florida fiasco in 2000, Diebold saw an opportunity. To persuade Rep. Bob Ney to promote its machines in a package of election reforms he was drafting called the Help America Vote Act, the company hired two lobbyists with close ties to the Ohio congressman. Diebold paid at least $180,000 to David DiStefano, Ney's former chief of staff. And it shelled out as much as $275,000 to the lobbying firm of the best-connected man on Capitol Hill: Jack Abramoff.

Abramoff has now been convicted of bribing Ney -- but Americans will be paying for the results of Diebold's influence for years. As part of the Help America Vote Act, every precinct in America is now required to install at least one machine accessible to disabled voters -- a mandate that has already fueled the spread of touch-screen technology and cost taxpayers almost $3 billion. "These vendors have a Halliburton-like hold on the Republican leadership," says Rep. John Conyers.

Diebold's influence extends to Ohio, where top Republicans have pushed hard to install the company's machines. Matt Damschroder, the chair of the Franklin County Board of Elections, was fined a month's pay last year for accepting a $10,000 check from Diebold made out to the county GOP in 2004, on the same day the board accepted bids for new voter-registration software. Once he was caught, Damschroder ratted out his friend, Secretary of State Kenneth Blackwell, telling authorities that a Diebold consultant boasted of funneling $50,000 to Blackwell's "political interests."

Blackwell and Diebold deny the transactions ever took place. But in April of last year, after engaging in secret negotiations with the company, Blackwell emerged with the triumphant announcement that he'd reached a deal to equip Ohio with Diebold machines at a cut-rate price. He didn't bother to mention that he had just bought nearly $10,000 in Diebold stock -- a "mistake" he now blames on his financial manager. He also neglected to reveal that as part of the deal -- as revealed in a company e-mail to Blackwell -- Diebold insisted he use his influence as secretary of state in a way that would guarantee the company a state monopoly. Blackwell complied by setting such an early cutoff date for counties to select their new machines that other manufacturers would be unable to get their equipment certified in time.

2004: The Mother of All Vote Frauds

November 1, 2004 -- When would-be-voters were asked whether the nation was headed in the right direction, about 52-55% people have replied negatively. Under this scenario, the leadership change is all but assured. Mr. Bush and his campaign team may project an optimistic outlook as they spoke before the media tonight, but I feel that while Bush's number is hovering around 47-48%, which is the same number for Kerry, it does not bode well for the Republican candidate.

Incumbents never make surges from their last horse race number.

Examples:

1956: Eisenhower's final horse race projection 59.5%, his actual vote total 57.8%

1964: Johnson's final projection 64%, his actual share of the vote 61.3%

1972: Nixon's final projection 62%, his actual vote total 61.8%

1976: Ford's final horse race projection 49%, his % share of the vote 48.1%.

In 1980, Carter's final projection 44%, his real % of the vote 41%.

In 1984, Reagan final projection tally 59%, his real share of the popular vote 59.2%.

In 1996, Clinton's final horse race number 52%, his actual share of the vote 49.2%.

The alleged miracle comeback of incumbent Harry Truman can not be included in this study because Gallup issued it's "final" result 2 weeks before the election.

On November 2, 2004 President Bush defied both public opinion and history to win the election: 51 - 48.

How was this done? Simple...

Vote suppression/voter intimidation and deception. Shortages of voting locations and ballot forms. Foreign monitors barred from polls. Unmatched exit polls/actual results -- actual results always skewed to Republicans. Masses of e-Voting "glitches." Computers lost votes. Presidential votes miscast on e-Voting machines throughout the US. More recorded votes than voters.

Republicans gained 128.45% in Florida counties using optical scan voting machines while Democrats lost 21% -- some districts showed gains of over 400% while one, Liberty County, gained over 700% for Republicans. Warren County officials locked down the county administration building on election night and blocked anyone from observing the vote count as the nation awaited Ohio's returns. Bush had 'incredible' vote tallies. 7% turnout reported in Cleveland precinct. In Cuyahoga County different towns had the exact same number of "extra" votes. And on, and on....

Voter Fraud in Florida and Ohio:

Kerry Won the Election by at Least 1.7 Million Votes

Brad Menfil is not my real name. I work for the RNC. I fear reprisals if I'm found out.

The truth about this election is this: Florida and Ohio had to go for Bush in order for him to "win" the election. In reality he lost both states. In fact, he did not even win the popular vote. He lost the national popular vote by at least 1,750,000. This shows you the scale of the fraud.

The exit polls were not wrong. Kerry was the clear winner, but victory was snatched from him.

Florida first. The 200,000+ margin of victory for Bush made this state uncontestable. Everybody assumes that even with some fraud, Kerry could never have made up the difference in a recount. But Kerry actually won by about 750,000 votes. The numbers were changed by a computer program (in both electronic and scan-tron voting systems) called "KerryLite." "KerryLite" of course is not actual name of the program. The actual name is 11-5-18-18 etc. For additional encryption, the numbers were jumbled but I'm not sure in which order. The numbers replace the letters of the alphabet. For example, K is the eleventh letter of the alphabet.

So the if-then statement goes something like this: "if total true Kerry > total true Bush, Bush x 1.04 x (.04 is a random number) (total true Kerry), total true Bush".
The second part of the equation takes the total number of votes cast and subtracts the new Bush total, subtracts the third party totals and leaves the rest for Kerry.

Sometimes the program would also reduce third party votes and award them to Bush. And even where Bush legitimately won, he was still awarded additional votes. The big Democratic counties (Broward for example) went to Kerry because it had to appear that everything was on the up and up. It's interesting to see this unfold.

Does anybody wonder why the Republican counties were mostly counted after the Democratic counties? You should wonder, and also know that this was no accident. The Bush team had to make up the votes as the night went on.

In Ohio, computer voting fraud, vote tossing and voter suppression were the main methods. Vote tossing was simply the removal of Kerry votes and some third party votes. In some areas, the Bush vs. Kerry votes were absurd. Nine to one, eight to two.

Voter suppression took the form of making voters stand in four hour long lines. This of course took place in Democratic areas. The simplest thing to do was to have too few voting machines. Sometimes that's all it takes. People eventually lose patience and leave without casting a vote.

In other states such as New Mexico, Nevada, Iowa and New Hampshire, Kerry's leads evaporated very quickly once the polls were shut down. Kerry only won New Hampshire, but barely. As it turned out, the lead was 6% for Kerry in that state and not enough fraudulent activity took place to flip the state to Bush.

So this will all come out and be known to everyone. Nothing this massive can be kept a secret. You're already beginning to see these "irregularities" and the whisper will become a roar.

<http://www.yuricareport.com/2004%20Election%20Fraud/VoterFraudInFloridaOhioKerryWon.html>

Sometimes the Evidence of Fraud Actually "Stinks"

There was something odd about the poll tapes.

A "poll tape" is the phrase used to describe a printout from an optical scan voting machine made the evening of an election, after the machine has read all the ballots and crunched the numbers on its internal computer. It shows the total results of the election in that location. The printout is signed by the polling officials present in that precinct/location, and then submitted to the county elections office as the official record of how the people in that particular precinct had voted. (Usually each location has only one single optical scanner/reader, and thus produces only one poll tape.)

Bev Harris of www.blackboxvoting.org, the erstwhile investigator of electronic voting machines, along with people from Florida Fair Elections, showed up at Florida's Volusia County Elections Office on the afternoon of Tuesday, November 16, 2004, and asked to see, under a public records request, each of the poll tapes for the 100+ optical scanners in the precincts in that county.

The elections workers -- having been notified in advance of her request -- handed her a set of printouts, oddly dated November 15 and lacking signatures.

Bev pointed out that the printouts given her were not the original poll tapes and had no signatures, and thus were not what she'd requested. Obliging, they told her that the originals were held in another location, the Elections Office's Warehouse, and that since it was the end of the day they should meet Bev the following morning to show them to her.

Bev showed up bright and early the morning of Wednesday the 17th -- well before the scheduled meeting -- and discovered three of the elections officials in the Elections Warehouse standing over a table covered with what looked like poll tapes. When they saw Bev and her friends, Bev told me in a telephone interview less than an hour later, "They immediately shoved us out and slammed the door."

In a way, that was a blessing, because it led to the stinking evidence.

"On the porch was a garbage bag," Bev said, "and so I looked in it and, and lo and behold, there were public record tapes."

Thrown away. Discarded. Waiting to be hauled off.

"It was technically stinking, in fact," Bev added, "because what they had done was to have thrown some of their polling tapes, which are the official records of the election, into the garbage. These were the ones signed by the poll workers. These are something we had done an official public records request for."

When they compared the discarded, signed, original tapes with the recent printouts submitted to the state and used to tabulate the Florida election winners, Harris says a disturbing pattern emerged.

"The difference was hundreds of votes in each of the different places we examined," said Bev, "and most of those were in minority areas."

When I asked Bev if the errors they were finding in precinct after precinct were random, as one would expect from technical, clerical, or computer errors, she became uncomfortable.

"You have to understand that we are non-partisan," she said. "We're not trying to change the outcome of an election, just to find out if there was any voting fraud."

That said, Bev added: "The pattern was very clear. The anomalies favored George W. Bush. Every single time."

Proof of Ohio Election Fraud Exposed

The Rigged "Recount"

EXCERPT: On December 13, my staff met with Ms. Eaton who explained to them that last Friday, December 10, Michael Barbian, Jr., a representative of Triad GSI unilaterally sought and obtained access to the voting machinery and records in Hocking County, Ohio, modified the computer tabulator, learned which precinct was planned to be the subject of the initial test recount and made further alterations based on that information, and advised the election officials how to manipulate the machinery so that the preliminary hand recount matched the machine count. Ms. Eaton first relayed this information to Green Party representatives, and then completed, signed and notarized an affidavit describing this course of events, a copy of which is attached.

The Triad official sought access to the voting machinery based on the apparent pretext that he wanted to review some "legal questions" the officials might receive as part of the recount process. At several times during this visit, Mr. Barbian telephoned into Triad's offices to obtain programming information relating to the machinery and the precinct in question. I have subsequently learned that Triad officials have been, or are in the process of intervening in several other counties in Ohio - Greene and Monroe, and perhaps others (see attached).

Convicted Ohio Elections Workers Ask for New Trial

by Kathleen Wynne
2-5-07

BREAKING -- CLEVELAND, OHIO: I've just been informed by the prosecuting attorney's office that defense counsel for convicted Cuyahoga County election workers Jacqui Maiden and Kathleen Dreamer filed a joint motion for a new trial. Maiden and Dreamer were convicted of rigging the Cuyahoga County presidential recount in 2004.

Defense counsel also reportedly filed a motion for a continuance of the sentencing to be moved from February 26th to March 13th (an interesting defense strategy).

In addition: Attorneys for Maiden and Dreamer have also asked that they not be immediately terminated from their positions, as required by Ohio law when they were found guilty of a felony, but to remain on the payroll until sentencing. Judge Peter Corrigan has not ruled yet on either motion.

9.15 Exit Polls Reveal Massive Electoral Fraud

On the evening of the vote, reporters at each of the major networks were briefed by pollsters at 7:54 p.m. Kerry, they were informed, had an insurmountable lead and would win by a rout: at least 309 electoral votes to Bush's 174, with fifty-five too close to call. In London, Prime Minister Tony Blair went to bed contemplating his relationship with President-elect Kerry.

As the last polling stations closed on the West Coast, exit polls showed Kerry ahead in ten of eleven battleground states -- including commanding leads in Ohio and Florida -- and winning by a million and a half votes nationally. The exit polls even showed Kerry breathing down Bush's neck in supposed GOP strongholds Virginia and North Carolina. Against these numbers, the statistical likelihood of Bush winning was less than one in 450,000. "Either the exit polls, by and large, are completely wrong," a Fox News analyst declared, "or George Bush loses."

But as the evening progressed, official tallies began to show implausible disparities -- as much as 9.5 percent -- with the exit polls. In ten of the eleven battleground states, the tallied margins departed from what the polls had predicted.

In every case, the shift favored Bush.

Based on exit polls, CNN had predicted Kerry defeating Bush in Ohio by a margin of 4.2 percentage points. Instead, election results showed Bush winning the state by 2.5 percent. Bush also tallied 6.5 percent more than the polls had predicted in Pennsylvania, and 4.9 percent more in Florida.

According to Steven F. Freeman, a visiting scholar at the University of Pennsylvania who specializes in research methodology, the odds against all three of those shifts occurring in concert are one in 660,000. "As much as we can say in sound science that something is impossible," he says, "it is impossible that the discrepancies between predicted and actual vote count in the three critical battleground states of the 2004 election could have been due to chance or random error." (See The Tale of the Exit Polls)

Puzzled by the discrepancies, Freeman laboriously examined the raw polling data released by Edison/Mitofsky in January 2005. "I'm not even political -- I despise the Democrats," he says. "I'm a survey expert. I got into this because I was mystified about how the exit polls could have been so wrong." In his forthcoming book, Was the 2004 Presidential Election Stolen? Exit Polls, Election Fraud, and the Official Count, Freeman lays out a statistical analysis of the polls that is deeply troubling.

In its official postmortem report issued two months after the election, Edison/Mitofsky was unable to identify any flaw in its methodology -- so the pollsters, in essence, invented one for the electorate. According to Mitofsky, Bush partisans were simply disinclined to talk to exit pollsters on November 2nd -- displaying a heretofore unknown and undocumented aversion that skewed the polls in Kerry's favor by a margin of 6.5 percent nationwide.

Industry peers didn't buy it. John Zogby, one of the nation's leading pollsters, told me that Mitofsky's "reluctant responder" hypothesis is "preposterous." Even Mitofsky, in his official report, underscored the hollowness of his theory: "It is difficult to pinpoint precisely the reasons that, in general, Kerry voters were more likely to participate in the exit polls than Bush voters."

Now, thanks to careful examination of Mitofsky's own data by Freeman and a team of eight researchers, we can say conclusively that the theory is dead wrong.

In fact it was Democrats, not Republicans, who were more disinclined to answer pollsters' questions on Election Day.

In Bush strongholds, Freeman and the other researchers found that fifty-six percent of voters completed the exit survey -- compared to only fifty-three percent in Kerry strongholds. "The data presented to support the claim not only fails to substantiate it," observes Freeman, "but actually contradicts it."

A Look at the graphs:

In States using Paper Ballots, the Final Vote Tallies very closely matched the Exit Poll Totals.

In States using Electronic Ballots, there was a large divergence between the Final Vote Tallies and the Exit Poll Totals -- all of which, amazingly -- favored George Bush.

Complete US Exit Poll Data Confirms Net Suspicions

But Bush "won" Florida by 5% (52% to 47%), a "red flag" discrepancy from the exit poll, however the poll is weighted by gender.

Here's a fun fact: to get the exit poll results to equal the tabulated outcome, you'd have to sample all men, that's right: 100% men and 0% women, just like the good ol' days before they passed that blasted 19th Amendment.

A Corrupted Election

Despite what you may have heard, the election night exit polls were right
By Steve Freeman and Josh Mitteldorf

Recall the Election Day exit polls that suggested John Kerry had won a convincing victory? The media readily dismissed those polls and little has been heard about them since.

Many Americans, however, were suspicious.

Although President Bush prevailed by 3 million votes in the official, tallied vote count, exit polls had projected a margin of victory of 5 million votes for Kerry. This unexplained 8 million vote discrepancy between the election night exit polls and the official count should raise a Chinese May Day of red flags.

Exit polls are highly accurate. They remove most of the sources of potential polling error by identifying actual voters and asking them immediately afterward who they had voted for.

The reliability of exit polls is so generally accepted that the Bush administration helped pay for them during recent elections in Georgia, Belarus and Ukraine.

Testifying before the House Committee on International Relations Dec. 7, John Tefft, deputy assistant secretary of state for European and Eurasian affairs, explained that the Bush administration funded exit polls because they were one of the "ways that would help to expose large-scale fraud."

Tefft pointed to the discrepancy between exit polls and the official vote count to argue that the Nov. 22 Ukraine election was stolen.

... [In] light of the charges that the 2000 election was not legitimate, the Bush/Cheney campaign would have wanted to prevail in the popular vote. If fraud was afoot, it would make sense that the president's men would steal votes in their strongholds, where the likelihood of detection is small. Lo and behold, the report provides data that strongly bolster this theory.

In those precincts that went at least 80 percent for Bush, the average within-precinct-error (WPE) was a whopping 10.0 -- the numerical difference between the exit poll predictions and the official count. That means that in Bush strongholds, Kerry, on average, received only about two-thirds of the votes that exit polls predicted. In contrast, in Kerry strongholds, exit polls matched the official count almost exactly (an average WPE of 0.3).

9.16 Voter News Service Goes Out of Business

Suspicion Surrounds Voter News Service

by Lynn Landes 1/20/03

It doesn't add up. Why is Voter News Service (VNS) really going out of business? That's only one of many questions that dog VNS, a private consortium of the major news organizations that allegedly projected election night winners using exit polls. VNS is owned by ABC News, The Associated Press, CBS News, CNN, Fox News, and NBC News. But VNS has always conducted its operations in a highly secretive manner.

I want to know why VNS sent surveys to counties asking them for information about the kinds of voting machines the counties used? Why should VNS care? What do voting machines have to do with exit poll projections? The voting machine industry is completely dominated by Republicans. Many people believe that the major news networks are also dominated by Republican ownership.

Is there a connection between VNS closing its doors, the increased use of computerized voting machines, and the growing disparity between pre-election polling predictions and election results -- a disparity that appears to heavily favor Republican candidates? Are we witnessing election fraud on a massive scale and is VNS involved?

One reason VNS is shutting down could NOT be, as VNS spokespeople continue to claim, that they screwed up the 2000 election exit polling in Florida. Any comprehensive review of the Florida vote count proves that VNS's projection was correct... Gore would have won Florida handily had it not been for uncounted "over-votes," the notorious butterfly ballot, and the illegal removal of 91,000 names of mostly black and Democratic registered voters from the rolls by a Texas firm hired by Jeb Bush's Secretary of State.

2004 Election An Historical First:

Statistically Impossible Last Second "Tweaks" to the Exit Polls

by Michael Keefer

A 'president' who takes office through fraud and usurpation can make no legitimate claim to exercise the stolen power of his office.

Find out what really happened.

EXCERPTS: George W. Bush was hailed the winner on November 2, with 51 percent of the vote to John Kerry's 48 percent. But there are good reasons to be skeptical of the official vote tallies. The last wave of national exit polls published on the evening of November 2 -- polls which appear to have been duly weighted to correct for sampling imbalances -- showed Kerry, not Bush, leading by 51 to 48 percent (see 'Mystery Pollster').

A divergence of 6 percent between weighted exit polls and the official numbers is a strong indicator of electoral fraud.

At the decisive point, moreover, the divergence between the exit poll results and the vote tally was wider still (see S. Freeman [21 Nov. 2004]). Prior to the election, political analysts identified Florida, Ohio, and Pennsylvania as the three key swing states: the candidate who carried these states, or a majority of them, would win the election.

Bush won Florida, with 52.1 percent of the vote to Kerry's 47.1 percent. (This tally, by the way, diverges by 4.9 percent in Bush's favour from the state exit poll, which gave Bush a paper-thin 0.1 percent lead.) Kerry won Pennsylvania, with 50.8 percent of the vote to Bush's 48.6 percent. (Here again the vote tally differs in Bush's favour from the exit poll results—this time by 6.5 percent.)

That left Ohio as the deciding state, the one on which the national election results depended. George W. Bush won Ohio, according to the official vote tally, with 51 percent of the vote to John Kerry's 48.5 percent. The divergence in this case between the vote tally and the exit poll, which showed Kerry as winning by 52.1 percent to Bush's 47.9 percent, is fully 6.7 percent.

Is it possible that these three divergences in Bush's favour between exit polls and vote tallies could have occurred by chance? I wouldn't bet on it. Dr. Steven Freeman of the University of Pennsylvania's Center for Organizational Dynamics has calculated that the odds against these statistical anomalies occurring by chance are 662,000 to 1 (S. Freeman [21 Nov. 2004]).

Mainstream media assessments of the integrity of the 2004 U.S. presidential election have tended to focus on particular and local problems—computer errors or 'glitches' for the most part—that came to light on the day of the election or shortly afterwards. Naturally enough, the fact that these problems were noticed, and in some cases corrected, works if anything to enhance public confidence in the integrity of the electoral system.

The stance of the mainstream media is inadequate in at least two respects. First, some of the 'problems' were not mere accidents, but open and flagrant violations of democratic principles. Prominent among these was the election-night 'lockdown' of the Warren County, Ohio administrative building, on wholly spurious grounds of a 'terrorist threat': as a result, the public, the press, and the local legal counsel for the Kerry-Edwards campaign were prevented from witnessing the vote count (see Solvig & Horn, and Olbermann [8 Nov. 2004]).

This maneuver generated widespread outrage: Warren County's Republicans may perhaps have 'misoverestimated' the degree to which previous conveniently timed 'terror alerts' and Osama bin Laden's late-October Jack-in-the-Box act had tamed the electorate.

But more importantly, while 'problems' and 'glitches' have commonly been covered by the corporate media as local issues, they can be recognized as belonging to a larger pattern.

As James Paterson's compelling analysis of The Theft of the 2004 US Election makes clear, Republican intentions were evident well before the election. And as Joseph Cannon has remarked, "An individual problem can be dismissed as a glitch. But when error after error after error favors Bush and not a single 'accident' favors Kerry, we've left glitch-land."

There is widespread evidence, which goes well beyond any mere accumulation of local problems, that "glitch-land" is indeed far behind us. The landscape to which the 2004 U.S. presidential election belongs includes the murky swamps of Tammany Hall-style election-fixing -- and the still more sinister morasses of 'Jim Crow' as well.

It has been reported that Republican-controlled counties in Ohio and elsewhere sought to reduce the African-American vote by deliberately curtailing the numbers of polling stations and voting machines in working-class precincts: large numbers of would-be voters were effectively disenfranchised by line-ups that were many hours long (see Fitakis [7, 16, 22 Nov. 2004]).

The Republican Party's purging of African Americans from voters' lists gained the 2000 election for George W. Bush (see Conyers [21 Aug. 2001]); as informed observers had anticipated (Palast [1 Nov. 2004], King & Palast), this shameful illegality was repeated in 2004 on a wider scale.

Large-scale polling-station challenges were used to further slow the voting, and to turn the new provisional ballots into a mechanism for effectively disenfranchising minority voters. In the swing state of Ohio this year, it appears that fully 155,000 voters -- most of them African-Americans -- were obliged as a result of polling-station challenges to cast provisional ballots (see Palast [12 Nov. 2004], Solnit).

Although it is becoming clear that the great majority of these citizens were legally entitled to vote (see Williams), the likelihood that their votes will be fairly counted, or that Ohio's Republican Secretary of State Ken Blackwell will permit them to be included in the official tally, remains slender. The effect of this Jim Crow mechanism appears to be compounded by racially-biased judgments of ballot spoilage. As Greg Palast reports, 54 percent of all ballots judged 'spoiled' in the 2000 election in Florida were cast by African-American voters, and similarly scandalous percentages are expected in key states this time round.

Nor have African Americans been the sole victims of these tactics: it appears that in New Mexico, where Hispanics' ballots are five times more likely to be laid aside as 'spoiled' than those of white voters, 13,000 Hispanics were effectively disenfranchised by means of provisional ballots (Palast [12 Nov. 2004]). Bush won New Mexico by less than half that number of votes.

But it is the co-presence of other forms of corruption, in addition to all these, that establishes the difference between an election dirtied by illegalities, and one that was not merely soiled and distorted by fraud but actually stolen. The evidence presented within the texts listed here suggests with gathering strength that the Karl Rovian maneuvers alluded to above were supplemented on November 2, 2004 by less conspicuous -- and yet decisive -- manipulations of the machines that recorded and tabulated the votes.

How precisely this apparent manipulation may have been carried out in different jurisdictions—by rigging machines in advance to mis-record or delete votes, by configuring proprietary software so as to allow 'back-door' access for unrestrained vote-tampering, or by hacking into the notoriously insecure vote-tabulation systems -- remains as yet undetermined. However, the evidence has been coming to light with surprising rapidity.

As observers and analysts noted at once, troubling discrepancies were apparent between the exit poll results published by CNN on the evening of November 2 and the official vote tallies (see DeHart, Dodge, S. Freeman, Otter, and Simon). No less disturbing, as I observed in my article on the subject, is the fact that the exit poll data was systematically tampered with early on November 3 to make the figures conform to the vote tallies.

At 1:41 a.m. EST on November 3, for example, the Ohio exit poll was altered: Kerry, who had previously been shown as leading Bush by 4 percent in that state, was now represented in the revised exit poll as trailing him by 2.5 percent. And yet the number of respondents in the poll had increased from 1,963 to only 2,020. An additional 57 respondents—a 2.8 percent increase—had somehow produced a 6.5 percent swing from Kerry to Bush. At 1:01 a.m. EST on November 3, the Florida exit poll was likewise altered: Kerry, who had previously been shown in a near dead heat with Bush, now trailed him by 4 percent. In this case, the number of respondents rose only from 2,846 to 2,862. A mere 16 respondents—0.55 percent of the total—produced a 4 percent swing to Bush.

9.17 US Allies Agree: Election 'Did Not Meet Democratic Standards'

An international election observer mission - from the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, the European Parliament, the NATO Parliamentary Assembly and the Council of Europe - released a preliminary report on Monday declaring that the election did not meet democratic standards.

The observers' findings were seconded by Republican Senator Richard G. Lugar of Indiana, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Citing the disturbing fact that official results diverged sharply from a range of surveys of voters at polling places, Lugar said, "A concerted and forceful program of election-day fraud and abuse was enacted with either the leadership or cooperation of governmental authorities."

Other prominent Western observers were unsparing in their criticism of the state's conduct of the election.

"Fundamental flaws in Ukraine's presidential election process subverted its legitimacy," the National Democratic Institute for International Affairs, sponsored by the Democratic Party in the United States, declared in its preliminary report. The institute, cited "systematic intimidation, overt manipulation and blatant fraud" that were "designed to achieve a specific outcome irrespective of the will of the people."

-- New York Times

This reporter was unable to reach Senator Lugar regarding the inconsistency of official election results and exit polls in the USA; the intimidation of minority voters in Florida and Ohio; nor the failure to count two million ballots cast, half by African-American voters, in America's first post-democratic election held earlier this month.

Eastern bloc observers noted that balloting in Ohio, New Mexico and Florida did not meet Ukrainian standards, but applauded America's attempt to restore democratic institutions after the overthrow of elected government in 2000.

Truth and Consequences in Ukraine

by Katrina vanden Heuvel

On the hypocrisy meter: Consider how the Ukrainian protesters' charges of election fraud have been treated so seriously by Bush and his team, while they dismiss such charges when they are raised here at home. And how exactly does the Bush Administration--which has said that it cannot accept the results of the Ukrainian presidential election as legitimate "because it does not meet international standards"--explain why those international standards don't apply to the US? What right does this Administration have to lecture Ukraine when Bush came to office in a non-violent coup d'etat in 2000, and when numerous reports document that the 2004 election was marred by GOP voter suppression and intimidation tactics, flawed voting equipment and unexplained discrepancies between exit polls and official results in key swing states?

It was even US funding that organized and paid for key exit polls; those gave the opposition candidate Viktor Yushenko an 11-point lead and set the stage for charges of vote fraud.

No Paper Trail Left Behind: the Theft of the 2004 Presidential Election

By Dennis Loo, Ph.D.
Cal Poly Pomona
ddloo@csupomona.edu

"Alice laughed: "There's no use trying," she said; "one can't believe impossible things." "I daresay you haven't had much practice," said the Queen. "When I was younger, I always did it for half an hour a day. Why, sometimes I've believed as many as six impossible things before breakfast." (Through the Looking Glass)

In order to believe that George Bush won the November 2, 2004 presidential election, you must also believe all of the following extremely improbable or outright impossible things.

- 1) A big turnout and a highly energized and motivated electorate favored the GOP instead of the Democrats for the first time in history.
- 2) Even though first-time voters, lapsed voters (those who didn't vote in 2000), and undecideds went for John Kerry by big margins, and Bush lost people who voted for him in the cliffhanger 2000 election, Bush still received a 3.4 million vote surplus nationally.
- 3) The fact that Bush far exceeded the 85% of registered Florida Republicans' votes that he got in 2000, receiving in 2004 more than 100% of the registered Republican votes in 24 out of 67 Florida counties, more than 200% of registered Republicans in 10 counties, over 300% of registered Republicans in 4 counties, more than 400% of Registered Republicans in 4 counties, and over 700% in one county. This could only be explained by a massive crossover vote in these specific counties by registered Democrats and/or Independents. Bush's share of crossover votes by registered Democrats in Florida, however, did not actually increase over 2000 and he lost ground among registered Independents, dropping 15 points. Floridians were just so enthused about Bush and Cheney that they somehow managed to overrule basic math.
- 4) The fact that Bush got more votes than registered voters, and the fact that by stark contrast participation rates in many Democratic strongholds in Ohio and Florida fell to as low as less than 8%, do not indicate a rigged election.
- 5) Bush won re-election despite approval ratings below 50% -- the first time in history this has happened. Harry Truman has been cited as having also done this, but Truman's polling numbers were trailing so much behind his challenger, Thomas Dewey, pollsters stopped surveying two weeks before the 1948 elections, thus missing the late surge of support for Truman. Unlike Truman, Bush's support was clearly eroding on the eve of the election.
- 6) Harris' and Zogby's last-minute polling indicating a Kerry victory was wrong (even though Harris and Zogby were exactly on the mark in their 2000 election final polls).
- 7) The "challenger rule" -- an incumbent's final results won't be better than his final polling -- was wrong.

8) On election day the early-day voters picked up by early exit polls (showing Kerry with a wide lead) were heavily Democratic instead of the traditional pattern of early voters being mainly Republican.

9) The fact that Bush "won" Ohio by 51-48%, but this was not matched by the court-supervised hand count of the 147,400 absentee and provisional ballots in which Kerry received 54.46% of the vote doesn't cast any suspicion upon the official tally.

10) Florida computer programmer Clinton Curtis (a life-long registered Republican) must be lying when he said in a sworn affidavit that his employers at Yang Enterprises, Inc. (YEI) and Tom Feeney (general counsel and lobbyist for YEI, GOP state legislator and Jeb Bush's 1994 running mate for Florida Lt. Governor) asked him in 2000 to create a computer program to undetectably alter vote totals. Curtis, under the initial impression that he was creating this software in order to forestall possible fraud, handed over the program to his employer Mrs. Li Woan Yang, and was told: "You don't understand, in order to get the contract we have to hide the manipulation in the source code. This program is needed to control the vote in south Florida." (Boldface in original).

11) Diebold CEO Walden O'Dell's declaration in a August 14, 2003 letter to GOP fundraisers that he was "committed to helping Ohio to deliver its electoral votes to the president next year" and the fact that Diebold is one of the three major suppliers of the electronic voting machines in Ohio and nationally, didn't result in any fraud by Diebold.

12) There was no fraud in Warren County, Ohio where they admitted counting the votes in secret before bringing them out in public to count, citing an unidentified FBI agent's warning of a terrorist incident as the rationale, a report that the FBI denies ever making.

13) CNN reported at 9 p.m. EST on election evening that Kerry was leading by 3 points in the national exit polls based on well over 13,000 respondents. Several hours later at 1:36 a.m. CNN reported that the exit polls, now based on a few hundred more - 13,531 respondents - were showing Bush leading by 2 points, a 5-point swing. In other words, a swing of 5 percentage points from a tiny increase in the number of respondents somehow occurred despite it being mathematically impossible.

DID YOU CATCH THAT?

AT 9 PM,

Kerry had a 3 point lead among 15,000 voters =

A lead of 390 votes.

Four and half hours later,

Bush had a 2 point lead among 15,531 voters =

A lead of 270 votes.

In other words;

The last 531 voters sampled obviously preferred Bush --

They voted for him 660 times.

[CNN, as any FOX commentator will tell you -- is hopelessly "liberal" in its bias. The network is obviously not too "fair and balanced" math-wise either. This is grade school stuff. But not to get all worked up over it. These numbers don't refer to anything important. That unpleasant sound at the edge of Wolf Blitzer's piercing commentary is only the death rattle of American democracy.]

14) Exit polls in the November 2004 Ukrainian presidential elections, paid for in part by the Bush administration, were right, but exit polls in the U.S., where exit polling was invented, were very wrong.

15) The National Election Pool's exit polls were so far off that since their inception twenty years ago, they have never been this wrong, more wrong than statistical probability indicates is possible.

16) In every single instance where exit polls were wrong the discrepancy favored Bush, even though statistical probability tells us that any survey errors should show up in both directions. Half a century of polling and centuries of mathematics must be wrong.

9.18 The Plans to Steal the 2008 Election

Introduction to this Reference Section:

The 2008 election is yet to be decided as this is written. That unknown outcome aside, there can be no doubt that our electoral process -- which seeks to accurately measure the collective will of the people -- is now broken. If we do not stand up for it, and demand that the process be repaired, the middle and working classes in the United States will no doubt see their current difficulties deepen with a vengeance. And quickly.

It is perhaps a hopeful sign that the corruption of this most sacred practice of democratic government is finally being discussed more openly. Such discussion is profoundly overdue, for the epidemic of suppression and criminality which has thus far characterized Electoral Politics in 21st Century America is a quickly evolving phenomenon -- and it is threatening to become the norm.

It is a Class Targeted Exercise, which very effectively attacks and diminishes the political power of people at the lower end of the socio-economic ladder. The core values of what America is supposed to be about are grossly violated -- and the quality of life for millions of people diminished forever -- as a result.

The techniques employed are breathtakingly diverse.

They include wrongful obstacles to registration; the purposeful under-allocation of voting machines in targeted precincts; various modes of intimidation just prior to elections; the distribution of disinformation regarding polling places and dates; a high rate of "spoiled" ballots due to older, poorly functioning equipment in poorer neighborhoods; the untraceable "flipping," "adding," or "disappearing" of votes in areas enjoying the latest electronic voting technology; absentee ballots simply thrown away; and impossible-to-predict blitzes of "challenges" in certain locations which may lead -- at best -- to the issuance of a slew of "provisional ballots," which are highly likely to go uncounted, and which will cause delays and ever-lengthening lines in the precincts involved -- a sure-fire way to lower the number of votes.

"Caging lists" which target specific groups of voters -- a felony crime -- has been widespread since 2000. Mail marked "Do Not Forward" has been sent in massive quantities to voters living in downscale counties. Any letter that is returned results in its recipient being dropped from the voting rolls. Many times the victim's first knowledge of this stripping of rights occurs on Election Day. No such letters are sent to affluent neighborhoods -- hence their return rate among the "well to do" is.....

Links to documents circulated between the Republican National Committee and its state level affiliates pertaining to the generation of these targeted voter lists are included in this section. The RNC's past crimes in this area have left it operating under a series of "Cease and Desist" orders since 1981, in response to the "caging" fueled theft of the New Jersey governorship that first delivered 9/11 Commission Chairman Thomas Keane to prominence.

Nevertheless -- despite every agreement made in the years since -- the documents included here reveal Republican operatives describing these recent caging lists as a "goldmine." Distribution of the criminal technique from its secret Ohio test-runs outward to other "swing states" is recommended. Elsewhere, a cautionary note is sounded, lest such activity leave "fingerprints" traceable to the GOP.

For 2008, the voter suppression process tilted toward the widespread imposition of new Voter ID requirements which are vastly more difficult to fulfill among voters of lesser means. This particular brand of disenfranchisement -- a modern poll tax for people who have never before had reason to purchase a passport, for instance -- was enabled by a nationwide campaign of accusations of rampant "Voter Fraud" which was vigorously mounted by members of the Bush Administration and the Republican establishment.

Such "Voter Fraud" -- as it has been described by these operatives and dutifully reported in the national media -- is a preposterous myth. But the suppression of votes among the poor which this myth has now accomplished is very real.

To realize this unconscionable goal, the Bush administration saw fit to attack the impeccably constructed and long revered Foundation of Impartiality upon which the United States Department of Justice once stood.

The "performance" related firings of eight United States Attorneys in December of 2006 was the tip-off that brought this historical obscenity to light, and eventually cost Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez his job. In this section I have included interviews with three of these dismissed US Attorneys -- David Becker, David Iglesias, and Bud Cummins.

All of these men are life-long Republicans -- as are several of the other voices in this section. They were loyal servants of the US Constitution and defenders of the Rule of Law who were dismissed -- their reputations smeared -- because they refused to violate their Oaths of Office by uncovering and prosecuting legitimate vote fraud cases that did not exist. These men provide, in these pages, first-hand accounts of their betrayal.

Near the end of the section, you will find Justin Levitt's comprehensive study of this mythical specter: "The Truth About Voter Fraud," which he conducted under the auspices of the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University School of Law. This exhaustive report mirrors the testimony of the legions of officials and academics in America who have looked at the legitimacy of the new Voter ID Laws -- as a solution to this "problem" -- with an honest, non-partisan eye. Mr. Levitt and his team actually investigated the specific accusations that have been lodged or implied -- claim by claim -- and came to a very clear and persuasive conclusion regarding the ominous wave of voter fraud crime: It doesn't exist.

Though much has been made of the abuses of such progressive, grass-root Voter Registration organizations as the ACORN group -- several of whose "paid by the name" employees have been convicted of filing registrations which were not legitimate -- it remains largely unreported that virtually none of these false registrations actually resulted in anyone voting.

A couple of the Mr. Levitt's more telling conclusions are worth noting here:

It is statistically "more likely that an individual will be struck by lightning than that he will impersonate another voter at the polls."

This simple fact is understood effortlessly when one contemplates the observation that "fraud by individual voters is a singularly foolish and ineffective way to attempt to win an election.

Each act of voter fraud in connection with a federal election risks five years in prison and a $10,000 fine, in addition to any state penalties.

In return, it yields at most one incremental vote.

That single extra vote is simply not worth the price."

On the other hand, it's estimated that the number of voters knocked off the voting rolls by the tough new ID Requirements born of this "Voter Fraud Crime Wave" -- will number in the millions.

Vote Caging Preparations in Ohio

The National Voter Registration Act prohibits any state from purging names from the voting rolls within 90 days of an election. The law doesn't, however, preclude mass partisan challenges on or shortly before Election Day -- known as voter caging -- based on the same returned envelopes from state-sponsored mailers like the ones in Ohio and others going out across the country.

A challenged voter will likely cast a provisional ballot, which often requires voters to return to election divisions to prove their identity and address. Nearly a third of all 1.6 million provisional ballots cast in 2004 were thrown out.

A short take on the relationship between claims of “Voter Fraud” and the Disenfranchisement of Legitimate Voters.

The Republican War on Voting

US News and World Report

Using the Department of Justice, friendly governors, and its usual propaganda outlets, the GOP has propagated the myth of voter fraud to purge the rolls of non-Republicans.

How U.S. Attorneys Were Used to Spread Voter-Fraud Fears

Long before it fired eight U.S. attorneys for political reasons, the Bush administration had politicized their jobs by making them push a favorite GOP talking point.

Vote Suppression and the "Gonzales Eight Scandal"

by J. Gerald Hebert

Mr. Hebert served in the Department of Justice from 1973-1994 in many supervisory capacities, including Acting Chief, Deputy Chief, and Special Litigation Counsel in the Voting Section of the Civil Rights Division.

"The reason Tim Griffin had to be slipped into the US Attorney's Office in Arkansas as an "Interim" appointment -- using powers granted the President by The Patriot Act -- was that Griffin had played a role "in massive Republican projects in Florida and elsewhere by which Republicans challenged tens of thousands of absentee votes." According to the 8/24/06 email, "[c]oincidentally, many of those challenged votes were in black precincts."

The Link: GOP Purging Prosecutors -- and Voters

"... [T]oday's stories in the New York Times, the Washington Post and the LA Times reveal more than a White House determined to enforce loyalty to President Bush and entrench partisan Republican hatchet men throughout the DOJ's ranks. Simply put, the Bush White House planned to systematically drive down the turnout of Democrats and independents at the ballot box through an unaccountable campaign against "voter fraud."

Firings Had Genesis in White House

per the Washington Post

The aide in charge of the dismissals --[Attorney General Gonzalez'] chief of staff, D. Kyle Sampson -- resigned yesterday, officials said, after acknowledging that he did not tell key Justice officials about the extent of his communications with the White House, leading them to provide incomplete information to Congress.

White House Said to Prompt Firing of Prosecutors per the New York Times

"We would like to execute this on Thursday, Dec. 7," Mr. Sampson wrote. Because some United States attorneys were still in Washington attending a conference, he planned to postpone telling them they were being fired. He wrote, "We want to wait until they are back home and dispersed to reduce chatter."

INTERVIEW: David Becker, Former Senior Attorney, US Department of Justice

Though Race-Based Voter Caging is a Felony Crime, the lists of voters targeted for wrongful removal from the voting rolls and/or publicly confronted without warning when they arrive to vote continues to be generated. Letters are sent, marked "Do Not Forward." If the letters are returned, their recipients are "caged." This outcome is especially likely when the mail is sent -- in August -- to college students at the schools they attend from September to June. Or to homeless shelters. Or to Black and Hispanic soldiers at the military bases where they were trained -- even though they are now stationed in Iraq or Afghanistan. Their absentee ballots are simply thrown away when received -- and the soldiers are never told.

Internal emails to and from the Republican National Committee reveal the details and scope of the operation.

In one, an official calls the returned letters, "a goldmine." In another, officials discuss doing the same thing in other battleground states, including, Nevada, Florida, Pennsylvania, and New Mexico.

IGLESIAS: I was aware that the Justice Department was interested in having U.S. attorneys investigate and prosecute voter fraud going back to 2002. In New Mexico, I wasn't really aware of that being a potential large scale issue until the summer of 2004. So I set up a taskforce in September 2004 to investigate. I made it state, local and federal law enforcement, and I had made sure that the FBI was involved, and that the Justice Department, public integrity section in Washington was involved. I made sure that there were both Democrat and Republican officials as part of this voter fraud effort because I wanted to allay the fears of New Mexicans that this was some kind of partisan witch hunt.

NOW: And did you find prosecutable cases?

IGLESIAS: No. We looked at well over 100 cases ... Upon reviewing the evidence and looking at the FBI reports, and actually talking to the FBI agent in charge of this, I concluded, as did the public integrity section at main Justice [Department] and at the local FBI office, that we didn't have any prosecutable cases.

CUMMINS: “[Y]ou're dealing with a group of people with my seven colleagues, that—everybody that knew them, that watched them, that worked with them—knew that they were particularly good United States Attorneys. And they were serving the President loyally, if for no other reason because they were making him look good for putting them there. And they don't deserve to be slandered in this way. ... Now he can defend those decisions to Congress however he wants, but he can't make things up. And that's what's happened here.”

League of Women Voters Stymied in Registration Campaign

It hasn't been getting much attention, but some states are putting new restrictions on your right to vote, all in the name of preventing voter fraud. Critics say these new state laws on voter registration and voter identification threaten to -- here's the word of the day -- threaten to disenfranchise hundreds of thousands of voters, among them the elderly, poor and minorities. And what's the Justice Department doing about it?

Vote Caging and the Attorney General: A Short History

by J. Gerald Hebert and Brian Dupre

“Conspiracies to stop African-Americans from exercising their constitutional right to vote aren't new – and neither is vote caging. The Republican National Committee has been under a federal consent decree not to engage in the practice since getting caught in the 1981 gubernatorial election in New Jersey. Despite the injunction, which remains in effect, vote caging schemes continue to be used as an integral part of an ongoing campaign to suppress minority voting rights.

To bring these schemes to an end will require vigorous prosecution by the United States Department of Justice. But the Department's priorities have shifted over the years, with the Bush-Ashcroft-Gonzales Justice Department not only ignoring vote caging schemes, but actively working to give them a boost in the courts.”

THE TRUTH ABOUT VOTER FRAUD

by Justin Levitt

Brennan Center for Justice at New York University School of Law

By inflating the perceived prevalence of fraud by voters, policy-makers find it easier to justify restrictions on those voters that are not warranted by the real facts.

Among its other work on the subject, the Brennan Center for Justice has developed a methodology for reviewing allegations of voter fraud, and continues to collect analyses of noted allegations at www.truthaboutfraud.org.

This paper distills the results of that work, compiling for the first time the recurring methodological flaws that continue to spawn allegations of widespread voter fraud where it does not exist.

Mr. Palast catalogues the Massive Dumping of Voters in the Swing States in preparation of the 2008 election

In swing-state Colorado, the Republican Secretary of State conducted the biggest purge of voters in history, dumping a fifth of all registrations. Guess their color.

In swing-state Florida, the state is refusing to accept about 85,000 new registrations from voter drives – overwhelming Black voters.

In swing state New Mexico, HALF of the Democrats of Mora, a dirt poor and overwhelmingly Hispanic county, found their registrations disappeared this year, courtesy of a Republican voting contractor.

In swing states Ohio and Nevada, new federal law is knocking out tens of thousands of voters who lost their homes to foreclosure.

Nationwide Voter Purges

CBS Has Noticed, Why Hasn't Obama or the DNC?

9-30-2008

Tonight's CBS Evening News finally covered what may well be the November Surprise that we've been trying to warn about for months here at The BRAD BLOG: Massive voter roll purges being done in secret, with little or no oversight, and often under federal Justice Department cover, in states and counties around the country.

And the Democrats, who likely have the most to lose via such secret purges, are doing little or nothing about it.

The CBS story.....

<http://www.cbsnews.com/stories/2008/09/30/eveningnews/main4490682.shtml>

..... starts with an elderly New Jersey voter who was suddenly removed from the voting rolls after thirty years, for apparently no reason whatsoever, before launching into findings from a new non-partisan Brennan Center for Justice study on "Voter Purges."

We've yet to read this Brennan report [See summary reprinted below] but the brief coverage from tonight's Evening News notes 10,000 voters purged in Mississippi, 21,000 in Louisiana and "to top it off, another new study discovered 19 states are ignoring federal law (the National Voter Registration Act), banning systematic purges within 90 days of a federal election."

Among those 19, are a number of battleground states. The report lists: Alabama, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Hawaii, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Maryland, Massachusetts, Nebraska, Nevada, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, Oklahoma, Rhode Island, Texas and Washington, as places where massive purges have recently taken place.

CBS ends by noting that their New Jersey voter has now been restored to the rolls, but they warn, "come Election Day, don't count on thousands of others being as fortunate"...

CBS' coverage doesn't even note that many states have now contracted the same private companies who did such a crappy job on their voting machines (companies like Diebold, ES&S and Sequoia) to manage, with the same lack of oversight, entire newly computerized state voting rolls. Names will be dropping from rolls this year by error or by evil...

This likely November Surprise may be just one of many. There is so much front-end voter suppression going on, at this point, it has all but obscured the massive problems that will occur with voting machines around the country when they break down, denying voters the ability to even cast a vote, much less have it counted accurately or verifiably. In Pennsylvania, for example, where almost the entire state votes on unverifiable touch-screen voting machines, the Democrats in charge of the state have recently declared that paper ballots needn't be given to voters until all voting machines in a particular precinct break down. Why isn't Obama and the DNC raising holy hell about that?

So CBS News has noticed. Where the hell are the Democrats, and why aren't they raising holy hell about all of this stuff everywhere. Instead, all we get when we inquire is the same old John Kerry / DNC line, "We'll have thousands of lawyers on call on Election Day, should anything go wrong, blah, blah, blah."

In the meantime, the Republicans are out with phony "reports" and lawsuits damned near every day --- and not just on Fox "News" --- declaring "evidence" of completely non-existent "voter fraud" by "Democrats". Yet, in the meantime, the Dems continue to bring a knife to a gunfight, and, as we've noted many times of late (most recently here and here) seem to have no clue that they are in a War on Democracy being waged by their GOP opponents.

Once again we urge you --- even if you've voted in a recent primary election --- to check to make sure you are still registered! Here is a very handy link to do exactly that!

Voter Purging Allegations Arise as November Election Nears

As the November elections near, more allegations of voter purging are cropping up. Michigan, a closely watched swing state in the presidential election, has been a hotbed of voter purging issues in recent weeks. Florida, another swing state, also finds itself in the midst of voter purging issues. Nonprofit organizations, individual citizens, and political parties have recently filed lawsuits alleging that voters are being unlawfully removed from the eligible voter pools.

The United States Student Association Foundation, the American Civil Liberties Union Fund of Michigan, and the American Civil Liberties Union of Michigan filed suit on Sept. 17 against the Michigan Secretary of State, the Michigan Director of Elections, and the City Clerk for the City of Ypsilanti to prevent the state from implementing two voter removal programs.

According to an ACLU press release, one of the voter removal programs "immediately cancels the voter registrations of Michigan voters who obtain driver's licenses in other states instead of issuing the appropriate confirmation of registration notices," and it fails to follow voter removal procedures mandated by the National Voter Registration Act.

The other voter removal program "requires local clerks to nullify the registrations of newly-registered voters whenever their original voter identification cards are returned by the post office as undeliverable."

There are also allegations in Michigan that Republican leaders may try to take advantage of a recent spate of foreclosures to challenge voters at polling places. According to the Michigan Messenger, James Carabelli, chairman of the Republican Party in Macomb County, MI, is "planning to use a list of foreclosed homes to block people from voting in the upcoming election as part of the state GOP's effort to challenge some voters on Election Day."

The Michigan Messenger alleges that Carabelli told them, "We will have a list of foreclosed homes and will make sure people aren't voting from those addresses." Carabelli and Michigan Republican officials have denied the claims.

In Florida, the "No-Match, No-Vote" law is causing voting rights advocates to fear that thousands of voters will be disenfranchised. Under Florida's "No-Match, No-Vote" law, individuals who have registered to vote and who display valid ID at the polls may still have their votes invalidated. On Sept. 8, Florida's Secretary of State decided to enforce the controversial law.

The "No-Match, No-Vote" law requires that a person's driver's license number or Social Security number be verified before they are registered to vote. According to an article on AlterNet, "State officials admitted in a recent challenge to the law, Florida NAACP v. Browning, that typographical errors by election workers are responsible for most of the failures."

The same article states that the law "previously blocked more than 16,000 eligible Florida citizens from registering to vote, through no fault of their own, and could disenfranchise tens of thousands more voters in November."

According to voting rights advocates, many voters will not realize that there is a problem with their voter registration until they show up to vote and are forced to cast provisional ballots.

Florida voters must show photo ID at the polls to cast the provisional ballot. After casting the ballot, they must send a photocopy of their driver's license or Social Security card to election officials within 48 hours of the election or their votes will not count.

Army Reservist Included in Montana GOP Voter Purge Effort

by James Sample
October 3, 2008

Former Montana State Representative Kevin Furey, a First Lieutenant in the Army Reserves, is presently in New Jersey preparing to return to Iraq. The reward for his service? Try disenfranchisement. At least that's what it could be if an error-laden effort by the Montana Republican Party to purge the voter rolls were to go forward.

As is too often the case with targeted, partisan efforts to challenge voters and get them purged from the rolls, an effort by the Montana Republican Party this week ostensibly aimed at voter fraud appears to be, in the words of Matt Singer of the non-partisan Forward Montana, actually little more than an effort to "suppress the vote, targeting counties with large Indian, student, and low-income populations."

Today, Lieutenant Furey released the following statement:

It is ironic that at the same time I am about to return to Iraq to help build a democracy that my own right to vote is being challenged at home for partisan purposes. These challenges are a blatant and offensive attempt to suppress the rights of voters.

Earlier this week, the state GOP sent letters to seven counties in the Big Sky state, challenging the eligibility of some 6,000 voters, including 3,400 voters in Missoula County, which includes one of the state's two universities.

Ian Marquand, of Montana's News Station reports that state Democratic Party officials are "reviewing legal options and might try to halt the challenges of some 6,000 voters in seven counties" but that "time is running out since county election officials have [only] until Monday to mail notification letters to affected voters."

Meanwhile, this independent audit of Montana's 2006 elections (previously released by Montana Secretary of State Brad Johnson) showed, in Singer's words "absolutely no evidence of voter fraud."

The Brennan Center's report debunking the voter fraud myth -- and so-called "cures" that often lead to substantial, and sometimes intentional, disenfranchisement of eligible voters -- is available at Truth About Fraud.

And this week, the Brennan Center released a groundbreaking new report, "Voter Purges" which was featured in this report on Tuesday's CBS Evening News with Katie Couric, and which is one of the first examinations of the practices of purging voters from the rolls. In addition to detailing severe problems of transparency and accuracy, the report includes recommendations to reduce the occurrence of erroneous purges and protect eligible voters from erroneous purges.

On GOP Plans and Denials to Challenge Foreclosed Voters

by J. Gerald Hebert

September 29, 2008

The "lose your house, lose your vote" stories out of two battleground states, Michigan and Ohio continue to occupy space in the media and various blogs. The story just won't go away. A federal lawsuit over the plan is pending in Michigan and the U.S. Department of Justice is reviewing the matter. As I reviewed the stories about this issue and have started to gather additional information about some questionable mailings to voters in other states, I was reminded of my days at the Justice Department when we would investigate claims of voter intimidation and voter suppression. Investigations of vote caging and vote suppression schemes usually started out with an admission of some specific practice, followed by a denial of any such plan, followed by a decision to retain legal counsel. Vote Caging Preparations in Ohio

Friday 05 September 2008

How many voter-registration mass mailers are "returned to sender" in the run-up to Election Day may determine how many Ohio residents are eligible to vote.

Ohio election officials are sending out a mass mailer stamped "do not forward" to all registered voters today (Sept. 5) with an absentee ballot application and other important notices for Nov. 4.

What's important here is not so much what's going out as what's being returned to sender.

Unbeknownst to the would-be recipients, the same mailer -- just 60 days before the election -- has the potential to determine their eligibility to vote, challenged not by election officials but by partisan opposition.

A similar mailer in March netted nondeliverable mail from almost 600,000 registered voters in just five Ohio counties who could now have their ballots thrown out for voting under the wrong address.

The National Voter Registration Act prohibits any state from purging names from the voting rolls within 90 days of an election.

The law doesn't, however, preclude mass partisan challenges on or shortly before Election Day -- known as voter caging -- based on the same returned envelopes from state-sponsored mailers like the ones in Ohio and others going out across the country.

In 2004, the year the national election hinged on results from Ohio, the Ohio Republican Party challenged 35,000 voters based on returned mail from the GOP's own friendly reminder notices. From 2004 to 2006, Republicans challenged 77,000 voters this way nationwide. A consent decree issued in 1982 and amended in 1987 enjoins the GOP from instituting "ballot security programs" that focus on minority voters.

No evidence so far suggests Republicans -- vote caging is essentially a GOP sport -- have mounted a caging campaign this year. Yet, in July, Franklin County Election Director and County GOP Chairman Doug Preisse told reporters he didn't rule out challenges before November, particularly because of increased home foreclosures, which would make failures to change address on voter registration records more common.

A challenged voter will likely cast a provisional ballot, which often requires voters to return to election divisions to prove their identity and address. Nearly a third of all 1.6 million provisional ballots cast in 2004 were thrown out.

Voting-rights groups don't oppose voter-roll housekeeping, but they cite the federal law as evidence that executing it so close to the actual election isn't fair.

The fraud that voter caging purportedly roots out is relatively rare, although vote solicitors working for the liberal group ACORN, the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now, in 2004 and again this year were accused of submitting false registration forms. Ohio is one of five states where ACORN employees have been investigated and, in some instances, jailed over submitting false voter registration forms.

Unrelated to ACORN, the Web site GOP.com cites two voting-fraud court cases in Ohio, both focused on individuals casting a second ballot intentionally.

On Nov. 1, 2004, voter-rights groups reacted and challenged the partisan caging in Ohio all the way to the U.S. Supreme Court in just two days but lost in a final-hour appeal. This year, they want to be as proactive as possible, said Donita Judge, Ohio staff attorney for the nonprofit Advancement Project.

"A single returned piece of mail is not a reliable basis for challenging the right to vote," Judge said. "Mail may be returned for many reasons, including errors in the database from which the mailing is derived, errors in the mailing labels, failure to include an apartment number or poor matching criteria."

Since 2005, Ohio state law has required a non-forwarded mailer 60 days before each federal election. The suspicious part about the law, Judge said, is that it's set to expire after the November election.

But it's not all about throwing votes out. Another aspect of Ohio's reformed election law is that it opens a window between Sept. 30 and Oct. 6 when voters can register one minute and cast a ballot the next.

That's generally seen as a benefit for Democrats this year since the new registrations refer mainly to 400,000 or so resident college students in Ohio. Obama holds a 2-to-1 lead over McCain among 18- to 34-year-olds, according to a Washington Post-ABC News poll released last month.

Following a statewide mailer similar to the one going out today, before the Ohio primary in March, the Advancement Project obtained the lists of returned notices through simple public records requests. The organization requested records from five urban Ohio counties -- Cuyahoga, Franklin, Hamilton, Lucas and Summit.

The total came to 600,000 names out of 3 million voters, amounting to 19.7 percent of all registered voters.

Sally Krisel, director of the Hamilton County Board of Elections, said the high percentage was misleading because the mailer in her county included those on the inactive voter roll. Considering only active registered voters, the county received about 5 percent returned in March, she said.

Inactive voters, tagged for possible removal, are given two years to cast a ballot before they can be removed from the rolls. None of the returned, 60-day notices are used for that purpose, Krisel said.

"We have not purged anybody this year," she said. "In big counties, we're often carrying a lot of inactive voters."

In Franklin County, the March mailer went to all registered voters as well. Out of 780,000, more than 150,000 notices were returned. Those voters are now excluded from receiving another notice this week, said Ben Piscitelli, spokesman for the Franklin County Board of Elections. The only public records request for the list so far came from the Obama campaign, Piscitelli said.

Meanwhile, the sweeping Ohio election law loosens the rules around challenging voters. It also strips much of the ability of voters to know they are being challenged and defend their right to vote before an election judge.

Fraudulent Absentee Ballots Mailed from the GOP:

Another Scam in the Creation of Voter Caging Lists

per Voting Matters
9-14-08

From state after state come reports of massive mailings by the McCain campaign of absentee ballot requests that contain confusing, misleading or simply wrong information. Is the McCain campaign merely incompetent? Or is it engaged in a massive effort to create a database of voters to challenge at the polls? Is the McCain campaign orchestrating a voter caging campaign on a grand scale?

Given the track record of the GOP in Florida in 2000 there is no reason to give McCain and the Republicans the benefit of the doubt this time around.

Greg Palast has provided extensive documentation of their success in denying the right to vote to thousands of legitimate voters. Go to www.gregpalast.com and read all about it if you have any doubts. So let's assume that the mailings of absentee ballot requests to voters in swing states who did not request them is simply a new weapon in the Republican voter suppression arsenal.

How widespread is this? So far reports have come in from VA, OH, CO, NC, PA, FL, NM, WI, OR, CA and MN. Here's a sampling of the info available so far.

Virginia: The McCAIN Campaign has mailed hundreds of thousands of fraudulent ABSENTEE BALLOT request form to voters.

The intent was obviously to prevent those voters from being registered on election day....

We are getting phone calls and emails showing the same occurrences in all "toss-up" states ... PA, FL, OH, CO, NM, MN ...

If anyone finds these forms, please mail them to your STATE ELECTION OFFICIALS and include complaints of FRAUD against McCain. [...]

Fraud Alert

by Jeffrey Toobin

January 14, 2008

Explicit racism has disappeared from mainstream political discourse in the United States. Jesse Helms made his long career in Washington by muttering about "bloc votes," but he's been gone from the Senate since 2003, and he has no similarly outspoken successors. Lest anyone think that racial discrimination itself has been banished from politics, however, Crawford v. Marion County Election Board, a case that will be heard this week by the Supreme Court, provides a disturbing reminder.

One of the lesser outrages of the Supreme Court's decision in Bush v. Gore was the banal assertion that "after the current counting, it is likely legislative bodies nationwide will examine ways to improve the mechanisms and machinery for voting." In fact, the chief "improvement" that has come from the legislatures since 2000 is voter-I.D. laws, like the one that gives rise to this week's case.

In 2005, Indiana began requiring voters to present government-issued photo identification before casting a ballot. (Georgia passed a nearly identical law at about the same time, and several other states have tightened voter-I.D. requirements.) These laws, their sponsors assured the electorate (and now the courts), were passed to correct the problem of voter fraud. As the state of Indiana says in its brief to the Justices, the new rule "establishes reasonable, long-overdue election-security reform in a State highly vulnerable to in-person election fraud."

Actually, it is this purported justification that is the real fraud.

The latest and most extensive examination of electoral irregularities, released in November by the nonpartisan research institute Demos, determined that voter fraud was "very rare," and every other respectable study has reached the same conclusion. This is certainly true in Indiana, where legislators said they were aiming to stop "voter impersonation," which was already a crime in the state; in the entire history of Indiana, the number of prosecutions for this offense has been zero.

Nationwide, despite an attempt by the Bush Justice Department to crack down on voter fraud, there were only a hundred and twenty federal prosecutions and eighty-six convictions between 2002 and 2006—a period in which close to four hundred million votes were cast.

“Let’s not beat around the bush,” Terence T. Evans, the dissenting Court of Appeals judge in the Indiana case, slyly wrote. “The Indiana voter photo ID law is a not-too-thinly-veiled attempt to discourage election-day turnout by certain folks believed to skew Democratic.”

He’s not the only one to notice: the three federal judges who approved the Indiana law were appointed by a Republican President; the lone dissenter was appointed by a Democrat. It was also Republican-dominated legislatures that produced the Indiana and Georgia laws, both of which were signed by Republican governors.

Who are the “certain folks,” in Judge Evans’s delicate phrase, that the Indiana law is trying to discourage? The best answer can be found in a friend-of-the-court brief in the case filed by twenty-nine leading historians and scholars of voting rights. They concluded that the Indiana law belongs to a malign tradition in “this nation’s history of disfranchising people of color and poor whites under the banner of ‘reform.’” Such measures as the poll tax and literacy tests, they write, were “billed as anti-fraud or anti-corruption devices; yet through detailed provisions within them, they produced a discriminatory effect (often intended) within the particular historical context.”

So it will be in Indiana, where the law creates a series of onerous barriers to voting. Consider one: you can get a government photo I.D. by showing your birth certificate, but you can’t get a copy of your birth certificate unless you can produce certain official photo I.D.s. And, with up to twenty million Americans of voting age lacking government-issued identification, the matter of requiring photo I.D.s has broad implications.

The Supreme Court case comes at a time when the nation does face a major problem with its elections, but it is the opposite of the one the Indiana law prescribes: it’s not that too many people are voting but too few.

Voter turnout rose in the 2004 Presidential election, but it still barely reached sixty per cent. There are any number of ways to begin to address this predicament: holding elections on weekends; allowing same-day registration and voting by mail, telephone, or the Internet; permitting registered voters to cast their ballots over several days or weeks; and putting polling places in shopping malls, to name just a few.

As the Demos report observes, “Overall, the disfranchisement of voters through antiquated voting systems, errors, mismanagement of registration bases, and intimidation or harassment is a far bigger problem today than traditional forms of election fraud.” (These issues, it need hardly be added, were the real problem in Florida in 2000.)

Unfortunately, the only serious attempt to address the legacy of 2000, the federal Help America Vote Act, which passed in 2002, today ranks somewhere between a disappointment and a fiasco. In essence, that law issued an unfunded mandate to the states to improve their voting procedures by 2006. Some states, like New York, largely ignored it; others, like Florida and Ohio, the states that, respectively, decided the past two Presidential elections, invested in systems that were, in many cases, less reliable than the old ones.

This week, a majority of the Justices will likely find a way to make a bad situation worse, and uphold the Indiana law. [NOTE: They did.] As a general matter, in recent years the Court has been reluctant to find what is charged in this case: a violation of the constitutional guarantee of equal protection of the laws. (The notable exception, to belabor the issue, was for a plaintiff named George W. Bush.) In the end, though, it will not be the judiciary that rescues democracy; whatever the obstacles, the problems with the ballot box must be solved at the ballot box. -----

INTERVIEW: Robert Kennedy, Jr. by Mike Papantonio

September 23, 2008

Excerpts of transcript from "Ring of Fire" on Air America Radio

Bobby: "There are about 30 scams the Republicans are deliberately using, particularly in the swing states to get Democratic voters off the rolls. These scams originate in the so-called Help America Vote Act which was passed after the Florida debacle in the year 2000. It was originally suggested by Democrats and Republicans but it was passed by a Republican congress with a Republican senate and a Republican president. And instead of reforming what happened in Florida it basically institutionalized all the problems that happened in Florida. And institutionalized a series of impediments that make it very difficult for Democrats to register, for Democrats to vote and then for Democrats to have their vote counted.

"One of these requirements under HAVA is called "the perfect match" and what that does is little known but it is devastating. A quarter of the voters in Colorado have just been removed from the rolls because of this -- just this one scam. And what it does is they use a computer system to compare your registration application to all other government records of you in the state. So they'll look at your social security records, your motor vehicle records and any time you've had any interaction with the government and if there is any information on your voter registration that is different than the information on another government record that they find they remove you from the voting rolls.

"For example, if I registered as Robert F. Kennedy Jr. and yet my motor vehicle license said Robert Frances Kennedy Jr. I'd be removed from the rolls. If your initial is different, if you leave an initial out, if you leave a "Jr." out, if you leave a hyphen out in your name.

And what they've done is a study in New York that said 80% of the errors are errors that were done by state clerks who are taking down this information. And particularly immigrant communities that people tend to vote Democratic, people have names ... spell Muhammad with an "o" instead of a "u"

Pap: "Are the Democrats Suing to Stop This?"

Bobby: "No, the Democrats are doing nothing to stop it. In New Jersey, which is a swing state, 300,000 voters in New Jersey were just sent letters saying that they are now ineligible to vote. New Jersey is nice enough to actually notify them -- most states will not even notify them.

And New Jersey intends to send out 870,000 letters so that is three quarters of a million people off the voting rolls in a state that could decide this vote by 50,000 votes. And these are Democrats that are being pushed off the rolls.

Bobby: "Let me tell you about one other of these scams people should know about. If you're a newly registered voter -- and of course the Democrats have done these gigantic registration drives -- 12 million people on registration -- if you're a new voter you MUST include your license or some other state I.D. when you come to vote. What that means is that if you're a college kid (and college kids now -- they're sending in absentee ballots -- they're not going to the voting place, they do everything online or they do everything remotely- - they don't dream of going to the precinct house voting on election day and waiting in a long line) so if they send in the absentee ballot and they don't include a color copy of their license their vote is going to be thrown into a trash can.

And none of these people know this because you have had to read the law in order to know it.

So there is no notification for when you fill out your registration form, so all of those 12 million people that the Democrats have registered: those ballots are going to be just thrown out.

Pap: "And if Democrats won't talk about this how the hell's anybody gonna know about it? I'm involved with this kind of thing every day -- I didn't know that until you just told me. The media is not talking about it. How in the hell is somebody gonna find this out? It's just incredible.

Bobby: "Hopefully -- Obama is getting 66 million dollars a month -- hopefully somebody in the Democratic organization is going to pay some attention to this before election day.

Voter Purging

By Steven Rosenfeld, AlterNet
September 11, 2007

Now the Department of Justice, like the Republican Party, wants fewer registered voters in 2008.

[...]

The voter roll purges are part of an unprecedented effort at the Justice Department to eliminate "voter fraud," which, as defined by Republican activists, is an assumption that Democratic political operatives or sympathetic political organizations have filed fake voter registrations or encouraged supporters to vote more than once to win elections.

These claims have been investigated by the U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC) and academics and found to be without merit.

However, the Bush administration's Justice Department, starting under former Attorney General John Ashcroft, has devoted considerable resources to prosecuting "voter fraud." The effort to pressure states to additionally purge voter rolls is a trickle-down effect of these policies.

Voter roll purges, if incorrectly done, can be a factor in determining election outcomes -- particularly in tight races. Unlike most of the "voter fraud" cases cited by GOP activists, where a handful of registrations -- usually in the single digits -- from big voter registration drives are found to be erroneous, purges can affect thousands of voters.

In Florida and Missouri in 2000, a total of 100,000 legal voters were incorrectly removed, according to academics and local election officials. In Cleveland in 2004, voter purges were a factor behind long lines and people leaving without voting as poll workers dealt with people who did not know they had been removed from voter lists, various media reported.

The Republican War on Voting

by Art Levine

April 1, 2008

Using the Department of Justice, friendly governors, and its usual propaganda outlets, the GOP has propagated the myth of voter fraud to purge the rolls of non-Republicans.

One week before the close of voter registration in Kentucky last fall, in an election that culminated with the victory of Democratic gubernatorial candidate Steve Beshear, Johanna Sharrard, a fresh-faced 26-year-old national organizer for the low-income advocacy group ACORN, gathered her canvassers in a run-down Louisville office and told them some good news: "We got 396 people yesterday -- that's really great!" Then she added what could have seemed a jarringly discordant note: "We know it's getting harder to reach people with the cards in this area. It's really important that you guys are not slipping up and turning to filling out your own applications or other fraudulent activity. Just yesterday we had to let another person go because she did not follow protocols." Sharrard continued sternly, "What's important is that we get 15,000 new voters. We're not out there to get 10,000 new voters and 5,000 false applications."

Indeed, the voter registration waged by ACORN (the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now) in Kentucky was also an effort to test the group's new system for rooting out any fraud. The organization is readying itself for the challenges to voter participation that the poor and minorities -- and Democrats -- are sure to face in 2008.

Sharrard's cautionary tone was a response to the Republican Party's ongoing nationwide campaign to suppress the low-income minority vote by propagating the myth of voter fraud.

Using various tactics -- including media smears, bogus lawsuits, restrictive new voting laws and policies, and flimsy prosecutions -- Republican operatives, election officials, and the GOP-controlled Justice Department have limited voting access and gone after voter-registration groups such as ACORN. Which should come as no surprise: In building support for initiatives raising the minimum wage and kindred ballot measures, ACORN has registered, in partnership with Project

Vote, 1.6 million largely Democratic-leaning voters since 2004. All told, non-profit groups registered over three million new voters in 2004, about the same time that Republican and Justice Department efforts to publicize "voter fraud" and limit voting access became more widespread. And attacking ACORN has been a central element of a systematic GOP disenfranchisement agenda to undermine Democratic prospects before each Election Day.

Revelations that U.S. attorneys were fired for their failure to successfully prosecute voter fraud have revealed how fictitious the allegations of widespread fraud actually were -- but the allegations haven't gone away. They live on in all the vote-suppressing laws and regulations that will likely affect this year's election, in GOP rhetoric and, most recently, in the arguments presented by champions of Indiana's restrictive voter-identification law in a case currently before the U.S. Supreme Court.

Unfortunately, progressives have tended to pay more attention to Election Day dirty tricks and to electronic voting machines than to a more systemic threat: the Republican campaign to suppress the votes of low-income, young, and minority voters through restrictive legislation and rulings, all based on the mythic specter of voter fraud. Those relatively transient voters, drawn to the polls this year by the Obama and Clinton campaigns, could find themselves thwarted in November and thereafter by the GOP-driven regime of voting restrictions -- particularly if, as many observers believe, the Court upholds Indiana's restrictive law before it adjourns this June.

Voter fraud is actually less likely to occur than lightning striking a person, according to data compiled by New York University's Brennan Center for Justice. [NOTE: That report is reprinted at the conclusion of this reference section.] As Lorraine Minnite, a Columbia University professor, observed in the Project Vote report, The Politics of Voter Fraud, "The claim that voter fraud threatens the integrity of American elections is itself a fraud." In October 2002, then-Attorney General John Ashcroft launched an intensive "Ballot Access and Voting Integrity Initiative" that required all U.S. attorney offices to coordinate with local officials in combating voter fraud. Yet even after the Justice Department declared the war against voter fraud a "high priority," only 24 people were convicted of illegal voting in federal elections between 2002 and 2005 -- and nobody was even charged by Justice with impersonating another voter. (The Justice Department declined to answer questions about more recent fraud prosecutions.) And despite the anti-immigrant frenzy fueling photo-ID laws, only 14 noncitizens were convicted of illegally voting in federal elections from 2002 through 2005 -- mostly because of their ignorance of election law.

Unfortunately, the public hasn't heard just how nonexistent the voter fraud epidemic actually is. While progressives have successfully challenged some of the most restrictive laws in court, they're still playing catch-up when it comes to combating the glib sound bites of voter-fraud alarmists.

Republicans and the Bush Justice Department have cloaked their schemes under such noble-sounding concepts as "ballot integrity." The GOP's vote-suppression playbook features everything from phony lawsuits to questionable investigations to authoritative-seeming reports, all with the aim of promoting restrictive laws. These tactics were first perfected in the hotly contested swing state of Missouri.

The roots of John Ashcroft's passion on this issue go back to the chaos of Election Day 2000 in St. Louis, when hundreds, if not thousands, of mostly inner-city voters were turned away from polling places because their names were not on voting rolls. The resulting last-minute court battle kept some polling places open for 45 minutes after their scheduled closing time of 7 P.M. Ashcroft, then the Republican U.S. Senate nominee, lost his race to the dead Democratic governor, Mel Carnahan, whose name stayed on the ballot weeks after he died in a plane crash. At an election-night party, an infuriated Republican Sen. Kit Bond pounded the podium and screamed, "This is an outrage!" -- and subsequently charged that Republican losses were due in part to dogs and dead people voting. As one local government official observed, "In St. Louis, 'dogs and dead people' is code for black people [voting fraudulently]."

That election night gave birth to the new right-wing voter-fraud movement, while Missouri became a proving ground for the vote-suppression campaigns that later spread to other key states. Missouri's then-Secretary of State Matt Blunt, now governor, launched a trumped-up investigation that concluded that more than 1,000 fraudulent ballots had been cast in an organized scheme. A Justice Department Civil Rights Division investigation, started before Ashcroft shifted the department's priorities, found no fraudulent ballots, however. Instead, it discovered that the St. Louis election board had improperly purged 50,000 voters from the rolls.

Nonetheless, the template for smear campaigns, groundless lawsuits, and politicized prosecutions used across the country had been set in Missouri. Key roles were played by many of the same GOP zealots who later made their mark on the national drive to fight voter fraud, among them St. Louis attorney Thor Hearne, the 2004 Bush-Cheney campaign election counsel who later launched the GOP front group, the American Center for Voting Rights (ACVR).

And as early as 2002, the executive director of the Missouri Republican Party pioneered a new dirty trick: publicly "filing" with the Federal Election Commission a 26-page complaint against the state's leading registration group, known as Pro Vote, that charged it with secretly conspiring with Democrats in the Senate race -- but then failing to sign the document so the agency never considered it.

The goal of such complaints and allegations was to create a barrage of negative publicity about voter-registration groups and the voter-fraud menace that could pave the way for restrictive laws. In Missouri, the Republicans' cries for a new state photo-ID law began in 2002, before the GOP blitz in most other states. The legislature passed such a bill in early 2006, before it was struck down that September by a Missouri state court as unconstitutional.

The GOP in Missouri also turned to prosecutions and lawsuits, most either overblown or groundless. In November 2005, Bradley Schlozman, then the Justice Department's acting civil-rights chief, insisted on filing a lawsuit that accused Missouri's secretary of state, Robin Carnahan, a Democrat, of failing to purge supposedly ineligible voters under federal law. (U.S. Attorney Todd Graves was forced out in March 2006 for having balked at filing the suit.)

A federal judge, who found that the Justice Department did not produce any evidence showing fraud justifying the purges, dismissed the lawsuit in April 2007. The department continues to appeal the ruling.

The fraud-obsessed Schlozman was then moved into Graves' old post without Senate confirmation, through a loophole in the Patriot Act. In an apparent effort to discredit both Democrats and ACORN, just five days before the tight Senate election in 2006 between incumbent Republican Jim Talent and Democrat Claire McCaskill, Schlozman announced, in violation of the department's own standards, the indictment of four former ACORN workers who had been fired by ACORN for filling out false voter-registration forms. The indictments were part of a broader effort to tilt the campaign against Democrats by bashing ACORN and limiting voter access. St. Louis' Republican election director, Scott Leiendecker, sent out a chilling letter shortly before the election to 5,000 mostly African Americans registered by ACORN, asking them to verify to the election board that they were eligible to vote. Leiendecker backed off after he faced the threat of a voting-rights lawsuit and received a warning letter from Secretary of State Carnahan.

What began in Missouri soon went nationwide. Starting in 2003, the Justice Department's civil-rights division issued a flurry of advisory letters, rulings, and lawsuits under the guise of fighting fraud that appear designed to disenfranchise hundreds of thousands of voters. Federal and state courts have struck down some of the laws shaped by policies promoted by the Justice Department, such as strict database-matching laws limiting new voters in Washington state and Florida. Even so, Justice Department-backed secretive purging policies have targeted voter-registration applicants and current voters in several key states:

In Ohio in 2006, 303,000 voters were purged in three major urban counties, while the Brennan Center reported that Pennsylvania's rigid database rules, later loosened, had excluded up to 30 percent of eligible registrants. Karl Rove aide Tim Griffin played a major role in state GOP voter "caging" operations (that is, challenging the eligibility of registered voters) in such states as Ohio and Florida. These schemes, Project Vote reports, challenged the right of 77,000 mostly minority voters to cast ballots between 2004 and 2006, under the pretext that non-forwardable letters sent by GOP activists to their addresses were returned as undelivered.

Thor Hearne's now-vanished ACVR lobbied for strict voter-ID laws in nine states, according to McClatchy and other news organizations. Voter-ID laws in states such as Georgia, Arizona, and Indiana have, for now, been allowed to stand.

All these campaigns have created a kind of GOP vote-suppression playbook that aims to limit voting rights in the states and attack registration groups such as ACORN. In most states where ACORN wages ballot-initiative and voter-registration campaigns, Republican lawyers, officials, and some prosecutors routinely file dubious lawsuits and complaints to generate bad press for the voter-registration drives. The lawsuits seldom if ever succeed, but the bad press they engender creates a climate to pass restrictive voting laws.

In New Mexico by the summer of 2004, ACORN's effort to register voters in advance of the closely fought presidential election was a stunning success: The organization registered 35,000 voters, mostly in the Albuquerque area. "Republicans were freaking out," recalls John Boyd, an attorney for the state Democratic Party. Republicans accused ACORN of "manufacturing voters," conflating error-plagued cards with fraud while trumpeting one registration card filled out in the name of a 13-year-old boy. The boy's card became the centerpiece of the lawsuit Rep. Joe Thompson, an Albuquerque Republican, filed in August 2004 demanding that the state government require photo ID for voters registered by ACORN and other nonprofits. The lawsuit claimed that the Republican plaintiffs' votes were "diluted" by supposedly false registrations.

Their case fell apart in court, and by September, a judge dismissed the lawsuit. But Republicans were not deterred by their loss in civil court and pressed for a criminal investigation, a probe which U.S. Attorney for New Mexico David Iglesias started on the same day that the court ruled against the GOP. Iglesias was a true believer in the menace of voter fraud. As one of just two U.S. attorneys in the nation to form such task forces, he was invited to lecture other U.S. attorneys in 2005 as part of the annual Justice Department ballot-integrity conference.

Iglesias' efforts weren't enough for Patrick Rogers, the Republican National Lawyers Association point person in the state, who mounted a campaign to pressure Iglesias to bring criminal charges before the election, rather than form a task force. Indeed, even before Iglesias concluded in 2006 that there wasn't enough evidence to indict on voter fraud, major Republicans in the state had started asking the Bush administration for his removal.

In early December 2006,
Iglesias was one of seven U.S. attorneys whom the Justice Department fired.

Today, Iglesias says of voter fraud:
"It's like the boogeymen parents use to scare their children.
It's very frightening, and it doesn't exist.
U.S. attorneys have better things to do with their time than chasing voter-fraud phantoms."

But the damage of chasing phantoms proved more substantial. In 2005, the state legislature, with the blessing of its Democratic governor, Bill Richardson, passed legislation that essentially crippled the ability of groups like ACORN to do mass voter registration. In 2006, ACORN had only 10 certified canvassers in the whole state, and registration plunged to 2,000 new applicants from 35,000 two years before, according to ACORN's top New Mexico organizer, Matt Henderson.

In Florida in 2004, ACORN's initiative to raise the state's minimum wage looked to be cruising to victory (it won with 71 percent of the vote), and brought in over 200,000 newly registered voters. That led business lobbies and the GOP to find a poster boy for fraud in a fired ACORN employee and ex-con named Mac Stuart, who spun elaborate tales of ACORN squirreling away hundreds of GOP voter applications it gathered but did not turn over to election officials. Republican attorneys filed two lawsuits featuring Stuart's claims.

After the election, Stuart ultimately conceded that he made false statements about ACORN. In December 2005, federal judges dismissed both lawsuits.

But in the same month, the legislature passed one of the most restrictive voting-registration laws in the country. The new law fined every registration worker $5,000 for any lost application, potentially wiping out the entire budget of the state League of Women Voters if just 14 forms were lost and forcing the group to stop registering voters for the first time in over 70 years. It was not until August 2006 that a federal judge blocked enforcement of the law. However, a slightly revised version passed last year.

Responding to the GOP-generated hysteria over voter fraud, criminal investigations were launched in 2004 and 2005 in Wisconsin, Colorado, Florida, and Ohio, with ACORN often a target. But by the end of 2005, the investigations ended after finding either no evidence of wrongdoing by ACORN or any pervasive voter fraud. Nationally, only six former ACORN employees were charged with registration fraud or other election-related crimes in the 2004 election, offenses involving fewer than 20 forms. That's out of 1 million new voters registered by ACORN during that cycle.

Yet Thor Hearne, among others, took advantage of these assorted investigations and news accounts about fraud to create the fictional appearance of an epidemic, then added some fabrications of his own.

Perhaps the wildest ACVR whopper -- seized on by The Wall Street Journal as late as November 2006 -- was the charge that ACORN and an affiliated group were under criminal investigation for "paying crack cocaine for fraudulent registration forms." Actually, the tale originated with the arrest of a Toledo-area man who may have received drugs while working for another volunteer for a now-defunct organization, not ACORN.

Without substantiation, ACVR identified Democratic-leaning cities as hotspots for fraud. They were generally the same locations where U.S. attorneys later faced pressure over prosecutions, including Seattle, St. Louis, and Milwaukee. (The one exception to overblown investigations targeting ACORN was the indictment last year by a local Seattle prosecutor, welcomed by ACORN, of seven rogue ex-employees who had fabricated nearly 2,000 registration forms.)

The hyped reports, indictments, and hearings had their intended effect after the 2004 elections. Nearly 30 states considered bills to require photo ID or proof of citizenship to register or vote. While most of these measures haven't yet passed, those that have can be severe: An Arizona law requiring proof of citizenship to register has disenfranchised up to 60 percent of applicants in some counties.

Over the past few years, what began as local phony lawsuits and investigations escalated into a concerted drive by the Civil Rights Division to restrict voting. Since 2004, the goal of the state GOP vote-caging initiatives has become official Justice Department policy. The department has also promoted the equivalent of caging by pressuring 16 states and cities to speed up their purging of hundreds of thousands of voters through letters and lawsuits, as first reported by Alternet.

Alarmingly, the insubstantiality of the claims of pervasive voter fraud may not deter the U.S. Supreme Court from upholding Indiana's restrictive voter-ID law -- which, according to a new University of Washington study, could disenfranchise the more than 20 percent of the state's African American voters who lack the ID required by Indiana's law.

Amazingly, Indiana has admitted that there hasn't been a single alleged case of in-person voter fraud in the state's history. Instead, Indiana's attorneys and legal allies, including the federal government, have submitted virtually nothing but unverified newspaper clippings and right-wing claims about fraud allegations in other states.

Indeed, the Supreme Court, in a little-noticed comment in an earlier ruling on Arizona's ID law, has already granted government the leeway to enact laws denying the vote based merely on fears of fraud, regardless of evidence. But outside of the world of voting experts, little attention has been paid to the lack of evidence in the federal court rulings leading up to the Indiana case. As Wendy Weiser of the Brennan Center observes, "The way this case has been decided so far [in lower courts] is that a state doesn't have to justify measures to suppress the vote."

The Supreme Court is expected to issue its Indiana ruling in the next few months, and it's considered unlikely that the Court will strike down the law. [NOTE: Indeed, in April of 2008, the Court upheld the law.]

These days, weakened by the publicity over the U.S. attorneys scandal, the savvy voter-fraud propagandists are shifting their now-discredited arguments about massive voting by illegal immigrants to yet another "menace": "double voting." Republicans and some newspapers point to lists of the same names in different states to claim there has been large-scale double voting. Yet such sweeping double-voting claims are almost always due to administrative errors and the statistical probability that people with the same name and birth date will show up in large pools of voters.

Regardless of the facts, the drive for new voter-ID restrictions will likely be strengthened in the wake of the upcoming Supreme Court decision. There's little sign that progressives or Democrats are going to launch what the Brennan Center's Deborah Goldberg has called the "huge public education effort" needed to raise awareness about the problems with voter-ID laws. Democrats seemingly haven't yet grasped the political importance of fighting these restrictive policies, though they could prove a major impediment to minority voting (and if minorities voted at the same rate as whites, there would be 7.5 million more voters on Election Day).

But Johanna Sharrard and other ACORN leaders aren't going to be deterred by Republican obstacles and smears as they gear up for new registration drives this year that could be their most successful yet. Sharrard's campaign in Kentucky last year brought in over 14,000 new voters, a state record. And after seeing all the attacks against ACORN in Missouri and elsewhere, she realizes, "It's a good motivator; it showed us that that things we were doing are important." It's an open question, though, whether progressives will realize that it's worth fighting to make sure that the voters ACORN is trying to reach will actually have their votes count.

How U.S. Attorneys Were Used to Spread Voter-Fraud Fears

Long before it fired eight U.S. attorneys for political reasons, the Bush administration had politicized their jobs by making them push a favorite GOP talking point.

By Mark Follman, Alex Koppelman and Jonathan Vanian

March 21, 2007 | Under intense criticism for firing eight United States attorneys, the Bush administration has spent the past few weeks casting about for an explanation for the dismissals that involves performance rather than politics. On March 13, White House spokesman Dan Bartlett tried to come up with one. "Over the course of several years, we have received complaints about U.S. attorneys," he insisted, "particularly when it comes to election fraud cases." On Tuesday, President Bush pressed home this claim with a similar statement during his defense of embattled Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. "We did hear complaints and concerns about U.S. attorneys," said Bush. "Some complained about the lack of vigorous prosecution of election fraud cases."

Bush and Bartlett were arguing that some of the fired attorneys had underperformed by failing to prosecute the raft of offenses that make up voter fraud -- things like vote buying, double voting, and voting by felons, illegal aliens and the deceased. And it is true that at least two of the prosecutors who were let go might not have pursued voter fraud cases to the satisfaction of their bosses at the Department of Justice. But under the Bush administration, pursuing voter fraud is not always about performance. It's often about politics.

A belief in rampant voter fraud in Democratic strongholds -- big cities, minority neighborhoods -- is widespread among Republicans, and claims of vote buying and the like have long been a mainstay of GOP rhetoric. The party has used these claims of voter fraud to help build public support for what it considers electoral reforms, like requiring voters to show photo ID -- reforms that also tend to suppress Democratic turnout on Election Day.

During the Bush administration, a rhetorical tool became public policy. The Republicans could not get a photo ID law through the Senate, but they were able to enlist the 93 United States attorneys in their crusade against voter fraud. In 2002, then-Attorney General John Ashcroft announced an initiative that required "all components of the [Justice] Department" to "place a high priority on the investigation and prosecution of election fraud."

Five years later, Ashcroft's initiative hasn't produced all that much in the way of convictions, at least relative to the overall Department of Justice caseload. Prosecutions for electoral fraud remain a minuscule part of the federal criminal docket. In 2002 alone, there were 80,424 criminal cases concluded nationwide in the 94 U.S. District Courts. By comparison, according to a DOJ document, between the fall of 2002 and the fall of 2005, there were only 95 defendants charged with federal election-fraud-related crimes in the whole country. [...]

More generally, there seems to be little statistical basis for the Republican fixation on voter fraud. The few studies that have been done show fraud to be insignificant to the outcome of elections; it has been measured at levels as low as .0004 percent (PDF) of all ballots cast.

Loraine Minnite, an assistant professor of political science at Barnard College, conducted a study of elections from 1992 to 2002 for Demos, a London- and New York-based public-policy think tank. Her analysis of the numbers showed that "the incidence of election fraud in the United States is low and that fraud has had a minimal impact on electoral outcomes." A 2006 report from the United States Election Assistance Commission, an independent agency created by Congress to "[conduct] research on election administration issues," calls Minnite's study the "most systematic look at fraud" (PDF).

Vote Suppression and the "Gonzales Eight Scandal"

by J. Gerald Hebert

March 16, 2007

The ongoing and widening scandal over the firing of eight U.S. Attorneys is racking up column inches and filling the blogosphere these days, and rightfully so. But there are a couple of aspects to the story that have not been written about yet, and I thought it was time to take on a few of them.

In a flurry of emails released earlier this week and now available on the website of the Washington Post, one in particular caught my eye. It was an email from Monica Goodling at the Department of Justice to Scott Jenkins at the White House and to DOJ's Kyle Sampson (Gonzales' chief of staff until he resigned earlier this week).

The subject of the email exchange involved Tim Griffin, a person working at the White House for Karl Rove, and how to move him into a position as U.S. Attorney in Arkansas. There are two parts to the email exchange that jumped out at me.

The email says Griffin would likely face political opposition to the nomination because he played a role "in massive Republican projects in Florida and elsewhere by which Republicans challenged tens of thousands of absentee votes." According to the 8/24/06 email, "[c]oincidentally, many of those challenged votes were in black precincts."

It has been a contention of many Democrats that the Republican obsession with voter fraud is really just a beard for pushing a program of vote suppression, particularly the vote suppression of racial and ethnic minorities. I leave for another day a discussion of the irony in that those targeted in such a vote suppression program are those who historically have been denied the electoral franchise and have only been able to exercise it freely since the Voting Rights Act of 1965 guaranteed that right. The Link: GOP Purging Prosecutors -- and Voters

The exploding U.S. attorneys scandal threatens to engulf the White House with the revelations that the Bush administration as early as February 2005 contemplated sacking all 93 prosecutors.

But today's stories in the New York Times, the Washington Post and the LA Times reveal more than a White House determined to enforce loyalty to President Bush and entrench partisan Republican hatchet men throughout the DOJ's ranks. Simply put, the Bush White House planned to systematically drive down the turnout of Democrats and independents at the ballot box through an unaccountable campaign against "voter fraud." And as I wrote last November, suppressing potential Democratic voter turnout (along with mobilizing its own right-wing base) is one of the two essential prongs of the Republicans' electoral strategy of "Divide, Suppress and Conquer."

While former White House counsel Harriet Miers first raised the specter of replacing all of the prosecutors in early 2005, it was President Bush himself who emphasized the importance of supposed voter fraud to Attorney General Gonzales:

Last October, President Bush spoke with Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to pass along concerns by Republicans that some prosecutors were not aggressively addressing voter fraud, the White House said Monday. Senator Pete V. Domenici, Republican of New Mexico, was among the politicians who complained directly to the president, according to an administration official.

The case of Seattle prosecutor John McKay illustrates the Republicans' preoccupation with voter fraud. Washington State Republicans, including Congressman Doc Hastings, were furious at McKay over what they claimed was his inaction on vote fraud in the wake of Democrat Christine Gregoire's 129 vote margin of victory (out of almost 3,000,000 votes cast) in the twice recounted 2004 gubernatorial campaign.

On July 5, 2005, Tom McCabe of the Building Industry Association of Washington wrote to Hastings, bluntly demanding, "please ask the White House to replace Mr. McKay. If you decide not to do this, let me know why."

But President Bush, Karl Rove, Alberto Gonzales and Harriet Miers weren't merely focused on meting out punishment to one prosecutor they felt let down the GOP in a single race. As I wrote last fall, an essential Republican strategy to regain and retain a ruling majority is to systematically suppress Democratic and independent voter turnout. The GOP's tactics include erecting barriers to new voter registration, draconian voter ID laws, aggressive redistricting and when all else fails, election-day cheating.

Those Republican efforts to dampen turnout are concealed from the American people under a banner of combating vote fraud. As I wrote last November:

Not content to prevent the enfranchisement of new voters, the GOP is committed to blocking their exercise of the right to vote. At the both the state and federal level, the GOP in the name of battling fraud has put up a raft of new roadblocks and barriers to voting with burdensome voter identification requirements.

The fact that voter fraud in the United States is virtually non-existent doesn't derail Republicans in their quest to block access to the ballot box. Just this year, the U.S. Election Assistance Commission issued a report refuting the myth of fraud at polling places. "There is widespread but not unanimous agreement," the report concluded, "that there is little polling place fraud, or at least much less than is claimed, including voter impersonation, "dead" voters, noncitizen voting and felon voters."

The result is a host of new state laws advanced by Republicans with the transparent aim of suppressing the potential Democratic -- and especially black -- vote. As Perspectives reported previously, Georgia's onerous new voter ID card program requiring voters to visit one of the state's limited number of offices, [and] would have trimmed up to 150,000 people (primarily African-Americans and the elderly) from the rolls. (The bill's sponsor, Augusta Republican Sue Burmeister explained that when black voters in her black precincts "are not paid to vote, they don't go to the polls.") Versions of the Georgia law have been ruled unconstitutional twice by federal judge Harold Murphy. And while Indiana's new voter ID law and the milder version in Arizona have to date withstood judicial scrutiny, another measure in Missouri similar to that in Georgia has been blocked during the 2006 elections. In his rebuke to the state of Missouri, Judge Richard Callahan deemed the right to vote "a right and not a license."

(For much more detail on the Republicans' four-pronged jihad of redistricting, registration, voter ID and ballot-box fraud against potential Democratic voters, see "Divide, Suppress and Conquer.")

Ultimately, the Bush team's Prosecutor Purge may now finally be producing a backlash against the White House. Harriet Miers and Karl Rove may be called to testify before Congressional committees. Attorney General Gonzales may have lied under oath during his January 18, 2007 testimony that the Bush administration was committed to having a "presidentially appointed, Senate-confirmed United States attorney." Gonzales' chief of staff Kyle Sampson, an architect of the prosecutor purge who warned his bosses to "prepare to withstand political upheaval," resigned on Wednesday. (Senator Charles Schumer believes Sampson may well have obstructed justice by withholding his role from DOJ witnesses who testified before Congress last week.)

All of the mounting evidence gives lie to a statement Tuesday by White House spokeswoman Dana Perino. "We continue to believe," she said, "that the decision to remove and replace U.S. attorneys who serve at the pleasure of the president was perfectly appropriate and within our discretion."

Despite White House claims to the contrary, this controversy isn't about voter fraud. It's just about fraud, pure and simple.

Firings Had Genesis in White House

Ex-Counsel Miers First Suggested Dismissing Prosecutors 2 Years Ago, Documents Show

By Dan Eggen and John Solomon
Washington Post Staff Writers
Tuesday, March 13, 2007

The White House suggested two years ago that the Justice Department fire all 93 U.S. attorneys, a proposal that eventually resulted in the dismissals of eight prosecutors last year, according to e-mails and internal documents that the administration will provide to Congress today.

The dismissals took place after President Bush told Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales in October that he had received complaints that some prosecutors had not energetically pursued voter-fraud investigations, according to a White House spokeswoman.

Gonzales approved the idea of firing a smaller group of U.S. attorneys shortly after taking office in February 2005. The aide in charge of the dismissals -- his chief of staff, D. Kyle Sampson -- resigned yesterday, officials said, after acknowledging that he did not tell key Justice officials about the extent of his communications with the White House, leading them to provide incomplete information to Congress.

Lawmakers requested the documents as part of an investigation into whether the firings were politically motivated. While it is unclear whether the documents, which were reviewed yesterday by The Washington Post, will answer Congress's questions, they show that the White House and other administration officials were more closely involved in the dismissals, and at a much earlier date, than they have previously acknowledged.

Seven U.S. attorneys were fired on Dec. 7 and another was fired months earlier, with little explanation from the Justice Department. Several former prosecutors have since alleged intimidation, including improper telephone calls from GOP lawmakers or their aides, and have alleged threats of retaliation by a Justice Department official.

Administration officials have portrayed the firings as a routine personnel matter, designed primarily to rid the department of a handful of poor performers.

But the documents and interviews indicate that the idea for the firings originated at least two years ago, when then-White House counsel Harriet E. Miers suggested to Sampson in February 2005 that all prosecutors be dismissed and replaced.

Gonzales rejected that idea as impractical and disruptive, Justice officials said, but over the next 22 months Sampson orchestrated more limited dismissals.

"I recommend that the Department of Justice and the Office of the Counsel to the President work together to seek the replacement of a limited number of U.S. Attorneys," Sampson wrote to Miers in January 2006. A "limited number of U.S. attorneys could be targeted for removal and replacement, mitigating the shock to the system that would result from an across the board firing."

Administration officials say they are braced for a new round of criticism today from lawmakers who may feel misled by recent testimony from Gonzales, Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty and William E. Moschella, principal associate deputy attorney general. Several Democrats have called in recent days for Gonzales to resign.

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said that "it doesn't appear the president was told about a list nor shown a list" of U.S. attorneys at any point in the discussions. She said White House political adviser Karl Rove had an early conversation with Miers about the idea of firing all chief prosecutors and did not think it was wise.

Bush mentioned complaints about voter-fraud investigations to Gonzales in a conversation in October 2006, Perino said. Gonzales does not recall the conversation, Justice Department officials said.

Bush "believes informally he may have mentioned it to the AG during the meeting discussing other matters," Perino said. "White House officials including the president did not direct DOJ to take any specific action with regards to any specific U.S. attorney."

Rove and other White House officials also forwarded complaints that U.S. attorneys were not doing enough to prosecute voter fraud.

Since the 2000 presidential election ended in dispute in Florida, Republicans have repeatedly raised concerns about possible voter fraud, alleging that convicted felons and other ineligible voters have been permitted to cast ballots to the benefit of Democrats.

Congressional committees yesterday requested that Rove testify before them about the firings; the House Judiciary Committee also requested that Miers appear.

The e-mails show that Rove was interested in the appointment of a former aide, Tim Griffin, as an Arkansas prosecutor. Sampson wrote in one that "getting him appointed was important to Harriet, Karl, etc."

Sampson sent an e-mail to Miers in March 2005 that ranked all 93 U.S. attorneys. Strong performers "exhibited loyalty" to the administration; low performers were "weak U.S. attorneys who have been ineffectual managers and prosecutors, chafed against Administration initiatives, etc." A third group merited no opinion.

At least a dozen prosecutors were on a "target list" to be fired at one time or another, the e-mails show.

Only three of those eventually fired were given low rankings: Margaret Chiara in Grand Rapids, Mich.; Bud Cummins in Little Rock; and Carol S. Lam in San Diego. Two were given strong evaluations: David C. Iglesias in Albuquerque, who has alleged political interference from GOP lawmakers, and Kevin V. Ryan in San Francisco, whose firing has generated few complaints because of widespread management and morale problems in his office.

Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos said last night that Gonzales will announce new ways of evaluating U.S. attorneys, but said the department still believes the firings were "based on performance-related considerations."

In January 2006, Sampson sent to the White House the first list of seven candidates for dismissal, including four who were fired at year's end: Chiara, Cummins, Lam and Ryan. The list also recommended Griffin and other replacements, most of whom were edited from documents viewed by The Post.

In September, Sampson produced another list of firing candidates, telling the White House that Cummins was "in the process of being pushed out" and providing the names of eight others whom "we should consider pushing out." Five on that list were fired in December; the others were spared.

Iglesias, the New Mexico prosecutor, was not on that list.

Justice officials said Sampson added him in October, based in part on complaints from Sen. Pete V. Domenici and other New Mexico Republicans that he was not prosecuting enough voter-fraud cases.

Sampson also strongly urged bypassing Congress in naming replacements, using a little-known power slipped into the renewal of the USA Patriot Act in March 2006 that allows the attorney general to name interim replacements without Senate confirmation.

"I am only in favor of executing on a plan to push some USAs out if we really are ready and willing to put in the time necessary to select candidates and get them appointed," Sampson wrote in a Sept. 17 memo to Miers. "It will be counterproductive to DOJ operations if we push USAs out and then don't have replacements ready to roll immediately.

"I strongly recommend that as a matter of administration, we utilize the new statutory provisions that authorize the AG to make USA appointments," he wrote.

By avoiding Senate confirmation, Sampson added, "we can give far less deference to home state senators and thereby get 1.) our preferred person appointed and 2.) do it far faster and more efficiently at less political costs to the White House."

"Kyle thanks for this," Miers wrote back. "I have not forgotten I need to follow up on the info. But things have been crazy."

On the day of the Dec. 7 firings, Miers's deputy, William Kelley, wrote that Domenici's chief of staff "is happy as a clam" about Iglesias.

A week later, Sampson wrote: "Domenici is going to send over names tomorrow (not even waiting for Iglesias's body to cool)."

Miers resigned as White House counsel this January.

The documents also provide new details about the case of Griffin, a former Republican National Committee researcher who was named interim U.S. attorney in Little Rock in December.

E-mails show that Justice officials discussed bypassing the two Democratic senators in Arkansas, who normally would have had input into the appointment, as early as last August. By mid-December, Sampson was suggesting that Gonzales exercise his newfound appointment authority to put Griffin in place until the end of Bush's term.

"[I]f we don't ever exercise it then what's the point of having it?" Sampson wrote to a White House aide.

White House Said to Prompt Firing of Prosecutors

By DAVID JOHNSTON and ERIC LIPTON
The New York Times
March 13, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 12 — The White House was deeply involved in the decision late last year to dismiss federal prosecutors, including some who had been criticized by Republican lawmakers, administration officials said Monday.

Last October, President Bush spoke with Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to pass along concerns by Republicans that some prosecutors were not aggressively addressing voter fraud, the White House said Monday. Senator Pete V. Domenici, Republican of New Mexico, was among the politicians who complained directly to the president, according to an administration official.

The president did not call for the removal of any specific United States attorneys, said Dana Perino, a White House spokeswoman. She said she had "no indication" that the president had been personally aware that a process was already under way to identify prosecutors who would be fired.

But Ms Perino disclosed that White House officials had consulted with the Justice Department in preparing the list of United States attorneys who would be removed.

Within a few weeks of the president's comments to the attorney general, the Justice Department forced out seven prosecutors.

Previously, the White House had said that Mr. Bush's aides approved the list of prosecutors only after it was compiled.

The role of the president and his advisers in the prosecutor shakeup is likely to intensify calls by Congress for an investigation. It is the worst crisis of Mr. Gonzalez's tenure and provoked charges that the dismissals were a political purge threatening the historical independence of the Justice Department.

The idea of dismissing federal prosecutors originated in the White House more than a year earlier, White House and Justice officials said Monday.

In early 2005, Harriet E. Miers, then the White House legal counsel, asked a Justice Department official whether it would be feasible to replace all United States attorneys when their four-year terms expired, according to the Justice Department. The proposal came as the administration was considering which political appointees to replace in the second term, Ms. Perino said.

Ms. Miers sent her query to D. Kyle Sampson, a top aide to Mr. Gonzales, the Justice officials said. Mr. Sampson, who resigned Monday, replied that filling so many jobs at once would overtax the department. He suggested replacing a smaller group, according to e-mail messages and other memorandums compiled by the Justice Department.

Karl Rove, the senior White House adviser, also had rejected the idea of replacing all the prosecutors, Ms. Perino said. But as Ms. Miers worked with Mr. Sampson on devising a list of attorneys to oust, Mr. Rove relayed to her complaints he had received that the Justice Department was not moving aggressively on voter fraud cases.

The White House continued to defend its handling of the dismissals.

"We continue to believe that the decision to remove and replace U.S. attorneys who serve at the pleasure of the president was perfectly appropriate and within our discretion," Ms. Perino said.

"We stand by the Department of Justice assertion that they identified the seven U.S. attorneys who were removed, as they have said, based on performance and managerial reasons."

On Monday Congressional Democrats demanded more information from the White House about the ousters, calling on Mr. Rove to testify about any discussions he had had about federal prosecutors. Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, said he would seek a subpoena for Mr. Rove's testimony if he did not appear voluntarily.

Justice Department officials have said they removed the United States attorney in Arkansas earlier last year to make room for a Republican Party lawyer and onetime adviser to Mr. Rove.

In the other cases, though, the department at first denied that the dismissals were performance related, and then said they were, citing managerial problems, lack of aggressiveness and conflicts over seeking the death penalty or enforcing immigration laws.

Justice Department officials said Monday that they had only learned recently about Mr. Sampson's extensive e-mail and memos with Ms. Miers about the prosecutors. The communications were discovered Thursday when Mr. Sampson turned over the material to officials who were assembling documents in response to Congressional requests.

The documents did not provide a clear motive for the firings. Some suggested that department officials were dissatisfied with specific prosecutors, but none cited aggressive public corruption inquiries or failure to pursue voter fraud cases as an explicit reason to remove them.

On Dec. 4, 2006, three days before the dismissals, Mr. Sampson sent an e-mail message to the White House with a copy to Ms. Miers outlining plans to carry out the firings

“We would like to execute this on Thursday, Dec. 7,” Mr. Sampson wrote. Because some United States attorneys were still in Washington attending a conference, he planned to postpone telling them they were being fired. He wrote, “We want to wait until they are back home and dispersed to reduce chatter.”

Mr. Sampson predicted that dismissals might stir debate. “Prepare to Withstand Political Upheaval,” he wrote in describing what to expect as a result of the firings. “U.S. Attorneys desiring to save their jobs aided by their allies in the political arena as well as the Justice Department community, likely will make efforts to preserve themselves in office. You should expect these efforts to be strenuous.”

Mr. Rove’s role in expressing concerns about prosecutors had emerged in recent days. The White House acknowledged Sunday that Mr. Rove had passed on complaints to Mr. Gonzales and Ms. Miers about David C. Iglesias, who was dismissed as the United States attorney in New Mexico. Mr. Rove’s role surfaced after the McClatchy Newspapers reported that a Republican Party official in New Mexico had complained to Mr. Rove in 2005 and again a year later about Mr. Iglesias’s failure to indict Democrats in a voter fraud investigation.

Concern about voter registration fraud turned political in several states in 2004 where there were close elections, including some lost narrowly by Republican candidates. In New Mexico, for example, complaints from Republicans poured in, including some from Representative Heather Wilson and Mr. Domenici, after President Bush narrowly lost to Senator John Kerry that year, and some voters claimed that they had been unable to participate because someone had illegally voted on their behalf. The narrow loss by a Republican in the Washington State governor’s race in 2004 produced similarly politically pointed charges.

An associate of Mr. Rove said Monday that although he had learned in November that the prosecutors were being replaced, his conversation with Allen Weh, the Republican Party chairman in New Mexico, and subsequently with Mr. Gonzales, were brief exchanges at holiday parties and that they occurred after Dec. 7, when Mr. Iglesias and six other prosecutors were dismissed.

John McKay, the ousted United States attorney in Seattle, said last week while in Washington to testify before Congress that White House lawyers interviewing him for a possible federal judgeship had asked him why he had “mishandled” an investigation into voter fraud allegations in his state following the 2004 elections.

House and Senate investigators have already made clear that they want to examine exactly what role the White House, Mr. Sampson, Ms. Miers (who left the administration in January), Mr. Rove and other senior officials played in the matter. Last week, six of the fired prosecutors testified before the Senate Judiciary Committee. Officials said Mr. Sampson, who once worked at the Bush White House interviewing candidates for United States attorney, was largely behind the effort at the Justice Department.

This week, the United States attorney dispute will be aired on the Senate floor during debate over legislation to roll back a provision of the antiterrorism law that allows President Bush to appoint interim United States attorneys indefinitely.

INTERVIEW: David Becker, Former Senior Attorney, US Department of Justice Speaks to David Brancaccio

BRANCACCIO: Welcome to NOW. The election year is just around the corner and it's time ask the question, how safe is your right to vote? Over the past few years we've been reporting on the various ways your vote can be suppressed: Everything from problems with voting machines to voter identification laws. Stay with me to meet former Justice Department official David Becker. He saw from the inside just what the government was doing or not doing to protect every citizen's right to vote. Now a voting rights activist, Becker is concerned about 2008 and says the government is part of the problem.

BRANCACCIO: Well, David Becker, thanks for joining us.

BECKER: It's my pleasure, Dave.

BRANCACCIO: How are we doing, America as a beacon of democracy?

BECKER: Well, the short answer is not so great, unfortunately. There have been problems with voters being intentionally disenfranchised. Vote suppression is still going on. And it is having a substantial impact on not just actual elections, but also, the confidence of our citizens in those elections and the results of those elections.

BRANCACCIO: You have to explain to me how some of this works. And let's go through some of it. For instance, one part of it is requiring voter photo identification. Increasingly, states are asking for this. A lot of it is in court. The idea here is to stop people who are not supposed to vote. For instance, in many states, parolees aren't supposed to vote—from voting. There's nothing wrong with that part of it, right?

BECKER: No. Of course, only eligible voters should vote. But one of the things that we have discovered and countless studies have confirmed is that we actually have a fairly honest citizenry when it comes to voting. And they—people take voting pretty seriously. The Bush Justice Department even initiated a special ballot integrity initiative to try to find out whether people were committing voter fraud, pretending to be someone else when they voted, voting when they were ineligible. And over the course of about four years, they discovered only two dozen instances of that kind of voter impersonation fraud.

BRANCACCIO: But are you kidding me? I mean, I turn on AM radio. And I'm constantly hearing—people venting about the perceived problem of all this fraud at the polls nationwide.

BECKER: And sadly, it's an invented problem, because if the extreme right wingers who have tried to promote this kind of idea didn't have this potential threat, they couldn't come up with this unnecessary solution of things like voter I.D. which restrict access to the toll—to the polls and, ultimately, do disenfranchise eligible voters who otherwise would be able to cast a ballot and have it counted.

BRANCACCIO: Well, it's interesting to explore this. Because on its face, you say, "So what?" Ask people to have a photo I.D. so they can vote. In fact, in 2006, we were in Georgia, a state that had passed a voter I.D. law—though it was bound up in court. We met a wonderful woman by the name of Rosa Laster. She was in her late eighties at the time we spoke with her. And it was not a trivial undertaking for her to try to get to a place to get an official I.D. so she could vote.

[NOW on PBS - September 1, 2006]

HINOJOSA: Laster, a retired nurse, has lived in Plains all her life and for years, she's been able to vote close to home without a photo I.D. But now, in order to get an ID, she'd have to go 11 miles away to Americus, the county seat.

And that, she says, could be really tough. The closest relative who could drive her lives four hours away.

LASTER: I would have to get somebody to take me over there, bring me back. And then I'd have to pay them. And sometimes, you don't have the money.

BRANCACCIO: You meet a person like that. But still, you will hear the rejoinder that society isn't asking too much to ask even someone like Rosa Laster to figure out a way to get the photo I.D.

BECKER: We're not used to—to seeing people who don't have photo I.D. I mean, you and I carry it in our daily lives. We both live in big cities. However, about one out of every eight people in this country, citizens, do not have photo I.D. And one of the reasons for that is it's not just the trouble of getting the photo I.D. But, in order to get a photo I.D. in most of these states, you need back up documentation to prove you are who you say you are. You need a birth certificate. You need a passport. These things cost a lot of money.

It's essentially a poll tax. To take people who are living on very tight budgets and say, "You have to spend $50 on a birth certificate, $95 on a passport, to go and be able to get the kind of I.D. to—take advantage of the most fundamental right in our democracy, the most fundamental right guaranteed by the Constitution, right to vote."

BRANCACCIO: Who's affected most when the requirements go up for I.D. to cast your ballot?

BECKER: These laws disproportionately impact minority communities, student communities, elderly communities and the poor. These are the people who are least likely to have I.D. Between 140,000 and 170,000 Missouri citizens, eligible voters, did not have the photo I.D. necessary in order to cast a ballot in Missouri. Similarly, in Georgia, some independent academics reviewed the data and determined that 300,000 Georgia citizens did not have the photo I.D. necessary in order to cast a ballot under the new laws in Georgia. I don't think there could be much disagreement that disenfranchising 150,000, 300,000 of your fellow citizens just in one state is—is a way to go about building a democracy.

BRANCACCIO: There are legal fights about voter I.D. across the country. The big case could be resolved next year when the U.S. Supreme Court is expected to rule on Indiana's photo identification requirement. Indiana is one of two states with especially strict I.D. rules. If it's upheld by the high court [NOTE: It was], other states could pass similar laws in time for the presidential election.

BECKER: I urge everyone to keep a close eye on that. It could have a very big impact on this election. And I hope the Supreme Court recognizes—especially after—the—the fiasco of Bush v. Gore and some of the credibility issues the court had shortly thereafter that these—these decisions they make aren't being made in a vacuum. They affect real people's ability to go out and dictate who is going to govern them. And that matters.

BRANCACCIO: Voter I.D. And then, there's this I.D. that has a weird name. It's called voter caging. My team and I looked into this this summer. The idea is—in this case, the Republican Party—sends out nice little letters to registered voters. And if those letters come back as Not Delivered, the idea is to use that returned letter as evidence of why someone should get their name struck off the voter rolls. Let's take a look.

[NOW on PBS - July 27, 2007]

BRANCACCIO: Documents have surfaced showing that in 2004, the republicans put in motion a plan to hold down the democratic vote in key battleground states. As more detail becomes known, many are convinced that republican officials broke the law by aiming to disqualify voters based on race.

GREG PALAST: This is a big problem in America. We're still asking today, nearly half a century after Martin Luther King was killed, do black people have the right to vote?

Here's how it worked. The Republican Party sent these newly registered voters a friendly welcome letter. It began, "Congratulations!" But what the Republicans really wanted to see was whether that letter could be delivered. If a letter could not be delivered, the name was added to a list of people the Republicans planned to stop as they tried to vote. What seemed like an innocuous piece of junk mail was really a test.

BRANCACCIO: Behind the scenes, Republican officials were delighted. NOW was able to obtain some of their e-mail.

[NOTE: Please See "Voter Caging Documents" Links Below]

In one, an official calls the returned letters, "a goldmine." In another, officials discuss doing the same thing in other battleground states, including, Nevada, Florida, Pennsylvania, and New Mexico.

In Ohio, the Republicans eventually put together a list of 35,000 people to stop on Election Day.

BRANCACCIO: That's voter caging. But, related to that is—something that many people haven't thought about before. It's called voter purging. How does that work?

BECKER: Basically, what the D.O.J. has been doing in recent years—is to go into jurisdiction states and tell them—for instance, "You have more voters on your registration list than the census estimates are eligible to vote currently right now." They then force the jurisdiction to go through their list and to start engaging in a program where they're going to literally take off ten, sometimes hundreds of thousands of voters off of those lists. And inevitably include some voters who are eligible who still need to vote and who often don't know that they're being removed from these lists.

BRANCACCIO: What happens to them when they show up at the polls to vote? They thought they were registered.

BECKER: The poll workers tell them they're not on the rolls—not through any fault of their own. And—they're given a provisional ballot. It's kept separate, in a separate envelope. But ultimately, if these people aren't on the rolls, that provisional ballot's not gonna be counted.

BRANCACCIO: So, you had the U.S. Justice Department saying to states—in some cases, threatening to sue states—in some cases, suing states?

BECKER: Yeah.

BRANCACCIO: "Clean up those voter registration lists." And you're saying that's probably gonna catch a whole bunch of legitimate voters and cancel their right on election day?

BECKER: That's exactly right. And ironically, it's coming out of the Civil Rights Division of the Justice Department, the Voting Section there where I used to work—which has traditionally been the place where the traditionally disenfranchised knew they had lawyers fighting for them to make sure they would be able to cast a ballot.

BRANCACCIO: Ever since President Johnson signed the Voting Rights Act - considered the legislative crown jewel of the Civil Rights Movement - the U.S. Justice Department has had expanded powers to protect minorities from discriminatory voting laws.

Becker thought he had landed his dream job when he joined Justice in 1998. But he says things changed radically when the Bush Administration came in and changed the way voting laws were enforced.

BRANCACCIO: You saw some of this while you were still at the Justice Department, the beginning of the shift?

BECKER: Sure, yeah. I—I—

BRANCACCIO: Really? How does it play out?

BECKER: Well, every administration has a right to set its priorities. There—and—and—and a realignment on priorities is often legitimate. I think in this administration, we saw something quite different. We saw a complete subversion of the—of the traditional mission of the Justice Department. For instance, during about a five-year span, not one single case was brought on behalf of African-Americans in—in the Voting Section of the Civil Rights Division. There has never been a span like that in the history of the voting section.

This isn't just a partisan issue. This isn't Republican, Democrat. There have been Republican administrations where even though priorities might have been reassessed, enforcement of the law was always done on a non-partisan basis. Now, they might have philosophical differences from other administrations. Progressives and Democrats are usually viewed as being a little more activist in their enforcement of the laws. And conservatives and Republicans are usually viewed as being a little more states rights and not being quite as activist.

But, you wouldn't see policies being established which, on the one hand, favored Republicans. And yet, when the same thing happened, they would—they would choose the path that disfavored Democrats. And that's what started happening in this—in this administration.

You'd see a redistricting plan that was drawn by Democrats. And you'd see this administration very much go after the redistricting plan and try to prove that it violated the Voting Rights Act. Whereas a redistricting plan that was drawn by Republicans would come before the voting section. And you'd see a very hands off approach.

That should be very troubling to people. 'Cause I would hope that people of both parties would want to make sure that if the other party was in power, they weren't gaming the system to make sure that their party was going to remain in power.

BRANCACCIO: Becker wasn't the only attorney who was unhappy at Justice. Since 2005, over half of the career lawyers in the Department's voting section have left.

BECKER: A lot of this, fortunately, has come out now thanks to the U.S. attorney scandal and Con—

BRANCACCIO: Yeah, big scandal of the year. There are these—many of the Republican U.S. attorneys who are on the record now as saying they were pressured into finding evidence and prosecuting cases of voter fraud. And in many jurisdictions, they couldn't really find many.

BRANCACCIO: One of those prosecutors was David Iglesias, the former U.S. attorney from New Mexico... whom we spoke to this past summer.

[NOW on PBS - July 27, 2007]

BRANCACCIO: Iglesias says his task force could not find a single case of voter fraud worth prosecuting. State Republican officials were so angry, they complained to senior White House aide Karl Rove. A short time later, Iglesias got the boot.

IGLESIAS: What really scarred the party was the election of 2000, in which the President lost the popular vote, but won the Presidency through litigation and I believe there was an attempt to not ever let this happen again. And win by any means, legal or otherwise. It's reprehensible, it's unethical, it's unlawful. It very well may be criminal.

BECKER: This was someone who—his career could have skyrocketed if he had just done what his higher ups had wanted. But, un—but, fortunately, for all of us, he felt his higher duty. And his duty was to enforcing the law. And he knew there were no prosecutions to be had here. And there were no—there was no violations of the law.

BECKER: I think this has been largely the conclusion of Congress as well—Republicans and Democrats—that the D.O.J. especially under Alberto—Alberto Gonzalez—was being used as an arm of the right wing of the Republican party to effectuate partisan gains in elections.

BRANCACCIO: Let's drill down a bit on this issue of partisanship. You work for People for the American Way, a liberal organization. And there are some people who watch this and see your words and your work as really a strategy to get Democrats elected. The idea being, Republicans are always screaming voter fraud. Democrats are always screaming voter disenfranchisement. But really, it's just a tactic.

BECKER: This is not about getting Democrats elected. It's not about getting Republicans elected. If the vast majority of people in this country wanna vote for one political party over another, they should be able to. And they should be able to express their opinions at the polls without fear of intimidation or suppression. And unfortunately, we don't have that right now. Because there is—there are elements of the Republican party at least who are actively engaged in a—overall scheme to minimize the number of votes of people that they don't think they can convince to vote for them.

There is a cynical element out there who's promoting these restrictive laws that find it easy to dismiss people and just say, "Oh, they're just liberals. You can dismiss them." And simply, it's just not true. The fact of the matter is during my career at the Justice Department, I sued Democrats far more than I sued Republicans. I—my—

BRANCACCIO: What? In cases involving how they drew district lines?

BECKER: Redistricting, other potentially discriminatory practices on—regarding voter registration and things of the sort. My former chief of the Voting Section—who worked for 36 years in the Civil Rights Division, wor—worked for Richard Nixon, worked for—President Ford, President Reagan, President—Bush's father—as well as Clinton and Carter. He worked for all those years. It was this administration that drove him out of the Civil Rights Division. Because no longer could he enforce the laws in a way that was even handed with regard to both parties. And similarly for me, that—that was—that was a real concern of mine. And I would no sooner have enforced the law to the benefit of the Democratic Party—than I would for the Republican Party.

BRANCACCIO: Now, let's talk about voting machines. A lotta people very worried about, for instance, electronic voting and even non-electronic voting. and there have been moves by the federal government to promote more modern technology at America's polling places. Yet, even by the midterm elections in 2006, they were still problems. We happened to be in Michigan with the NOW camera crew watching as they were trying out some machines. Let's take a look.

[NOW on PBS - September 8, 2006]

BRANCACCIO: Just a few minutes after our arrival it became clear that things were off to an interesting start.

RANCELLI: I'm not sure why this is happening

BRANCACCIO: A couple of election officials have run into a snag with one of the new voting machines. It's called the Automark and was designed specifically to help disabled people vote.

The two workers try to run a few test ballots, but can't get the machine to work.

LARRY: "Print validation failed."

RANCELLI: That's because your ballot jammed again coming out.

BRANCACCIO: In the end, no luck. Going into the primaries, election officials had been apprehensive about this machine.

BRANCACCIO: How big a problem is this issue of voting machines?

BECKER: They still pose a significant problem, I'd say. I think that—we are still seeing problems in the election technology that we're using, being able to properly count and then—justify the counts through audits and other means.

BRANCACCIO: Are you for a paper trail, for instance, when you vote?

BECKER: Absolutely. I think that there has to be some kind of permanent record of a ballot. I mean, we saw real problems with that in 2006, probably most notably, in Sarasota County, Florida where in the 13th Congressional District there, a seat that Katherine Harris was vacating -

BRANCACCIO: The Katherine Harris from the 2000 vote count in the Presidential election?

BECKER: A—absolutely. These things keep coming back, it appears. And—

BRANCACCIO: And that was a very close election.

BECKER: Very close. An open seat election, very tightly contested, undoubtedly the most tightly contested election in that area. And yet, the electronic voting machines there, the touch screen machines, did not record 18,000 votes in that race. And keep in mind, this was a race that was ultimately decided by 369 votes.

It was that close. Congress is currently investigating it. There are law suits going on investigating it. Had they had a paper record, we might have a better way of determining who the real winner in that race was. As it stands—the people of Sarasota County and the 13th Congressional District have to be very—curious as to whether or not the person that they truly elected is representing them in Congress right now.

BRANCACCIO: So, in the end, are you worried that the problems are so widespread that next year's Presidential election could really get stolen?

BECKER: Stolen might be a strong word. But, when you see circumstances like we saw in Ohio, where there were an insufficient number of voting machines in precincts with large numbers of black voters compared to white voters in places like Franklin County, Ohio and voters, disproportionately African-Americans voters, waiting in long lines to get to the polls, and having to leave without casting a ballot.

When you see people being stationed in areas where they think there are gonna be large numbers of Hispanics voters and racially profiling voters without regard to whether they actually know whether they are a citizen or not to try to intimidate them before they get into the polls. Yes, it can effect the—the outcome of an election. And it's anti-democratic behavior. And we should be outraged by it. And we should be fighting it.

BRANCACCIO: Well, you say people should be outraged. Can they do anything else?

BECKER: It's incumbent upon all of us, unfortunately, in this environment, to do whatever we can, be in contact with our registrars and county election officials to make sure we're on the rolls, make sure we verify where our polling place is. I encourage everyone—every voter, do not take your status as a voter for granted. People are out there trying to target you based upon who they think you're going to vote for.

BRANCACCIO: Well David Becker, Democracy Campaign, People for the American Way. Thank you very much.

BECKER: Thank you, David.

David Brancaccio hosts for NOW in a segment entitled "Voter Caging and Housing Works"

While Attorney General Alberto Gonzales refused to answer many questions about the controversy as he testified before the Senate this week, [targeted US Attorney David] Iglesias told NOW he believes the White House is keeping documents from Congress to protect the Bush Administration. "That's why there has been such a circling of the wagons around Karl Rove and Harriet Miers and Sarah Taylor. I believe there to be incriminating, possibly criminally incriminating evidence contained in those e-mails and other memoranda," he said.

Mr. Iglesias, the Republican son of Baptist Missionaries, and a Judge Advocate (JAG) in the US Navy -- Tom Cruise played him opposite Jack Nicholson in "A Few Good Men" -- went on to become one of the United States Attorneys taken out by Karl Rove and Alberto Gonzalez in their efforts to intimidate voters. After this scam was revealed, both Gonzalez and Rove were forced to resign.

INTERVIEW: David Iglesias, Former United States Attorney, Speaks with NOW

NOW: As the U.S. Attorney of New Mexico you were asked to investigate and prosecute instances of voter fraud. What was the nature of this alleged voter fraud?

DAVID IGLESIAS (DI): I was aware that the Justice Department was interested in having U.S. attorneys investigate and prosecute voter fraud going back to 2002. In New Mexico, I wasn't really aware of that being a potential large scale issue until the summer of 2004. So I set up a taskforce in September 2004 to investigate. I made it state, local and federal law enforcement, and I had made sure that the FBI was involved, and that the Justice Department, public integrity section in Washington was involved. I made sure that there were both Democrat and Republican officials as part of this voter fraud effort because I wanted to allay the fears of New Mexicans that this was some kind of partisan witch hunt.

NOW: And did you find prosecutable cases?

DI: No. We looked at well over 100 cases ... Upon reviewing the evidence and looking at the FBI reports, and actually talking to the FBI agent in charge of this, I concluded, as did the public integrity section at main Justice [Department] and at the local FBI office, that we didn't have any prosecutable cases.

NOW: Clearly, voter fraud is a crime. When do efforts to ferret out those few offenders cross the line into something more inappropriate where you are engaging in an effort to strike legitimate voters from the rolls?

DI: Are you putting pressure on the U.S. Attorneys to try to file indictments immediately before an election? If so, that is inappropriate. In fact, there's a longstanding policy in the Justice Department to not do that. And it appears, in some districts, there was pressure put on us to engage in unlawful activities. And that is not what the Justice Department stands for.

NOW: One press account described it as, "A misuse of power of the Department of Justice in the service of the Republican Party." Do you agree?

DI: I think that handsomely covers the issue, yet.

NOW: You said the Justice Department made it clear that if the U.S. Attorneys believed there was voter fraud than you needed to investigate and prosecute it. How did they make that clear?

"... there was pressure put on us to engage in unlawful activities."

DI: This refers to emails that we received with memoranda attached to them in the fall of 2002, 2004 and then again in 2006. [They] admonished U.S. Attorneys to work closely with election officials to offer assistance and investigate and prosecute what appeared to be voter fraud cases.

NOW: Was there any explanation ever given as to why there was this interest?

DI: No, there was no explanation. I had assumed that was the historic practice of the Justice Department. But I subsequently learned that this administration has made it a priority.

NOW: So you're saying prosecuting cases of voter fraud is not something that traditionally has been high on the list of priorities for U.S. attorneys in New Mexico or elsewhere in the country?

DI: That's correct. You have to understand there are approximately 4,000 federal criminal laws and we're tasked to enforce them all ... it's impossible to enforce every possible law. So every administration has to come up with a list of priorities and this was a priority every two years during the election cycle for the Bush Administration.

NOW: It wasn't only officials at the Department of Justice who were expressing an interest in pursuing such cases. You were getting requests from other individuals, correct?

DI: That's correct. In fact, there was a Republican attorney, Pat Rogers, who was a prominent local attorney who tried to pressure me to come up with cases. He would send emails to my assistant, who I had tasked with running this election fraud taskforce ... And I had lunch with Mr. Rogers last fall and he expressed his concern about what he believed to be this systemic, ongoing election fraud. I did not know at the time that he belonged to an organization called the American Center for Voting Rights. He did not disclose to me that he was representing any other interest. And I've also found out that the Republican Party was very interested in stamping out what it believed to be instances of voter fraud.

NOW: The State Republican Party or the National Republican Party?

DI: Both. But who contacted me or some of my assistants was the State Republican Party.

NOW: What interest would they have in seeing you pursue cases of voter fraud?

DI: If they believe there to be prosecutable cases, it obviously sends a strong message. You don't violate federal criminal laws. But I do understand there are some allegations that, in battleground states such as New Mexico, prosecuting even a few cases sends a very strong message and could actually result in suppressing minority voting.

It was never made that blunt. It was never that clearly presented to me. And a lot of this I'm reconstructing since leaving office on March 1 [2007].

NOW: What was the nature of the allegations that Rogers and other state GOP officials that you heard from or had contact with?

DI: They singled out ACORN [Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now] as an entity that they thought was engaging in this systemic election fraud. Specifically, they believed there to be a plan to register individuals who were not legally entitled to vote. Under-aged people, people who perhaps were felons, people who perhaps were not American citizens.

But it was generally that there were people voting who did not have the legal right to vote. And that may skew the result. And I believe this to be as a direct result of Al Gore's razor thin victory over George Bush in 2000.

NOW: Remind us of what happened in the 2000 election in your state?

DI: Al Gore won New Mexico by a very small margin. If memory serves me, it was approximately 344 votes. It was the smallest margin of victory of any of the 50 states. I distinctly recall hearing among Republican Party activists, there was a belief that George Bush actually won the 2000 election [in New Mexico]. And that somehow Gore stole the election. So I think there was this belief that let's not let this happen again. That's what I believe to be the genesis of them attempting to put pressure on me to find prosecutable cases.

NOW: In one press account you're quoted as characterizing Mr. Rogers' interest in this issue as "obsessive."

DI: Yes. I was aware of grumbling within the State Republican Party. I had friends of mine who were attorneys. One was a former federal prosecutor himself and he would tell me during the course of early 2005 through mid-2006 ... "The Republicans are still upset with you. They still expect you to prosecute cases."

So I knew there was this belief that was I intentionally not prosecuting prosecutable cases. And I knew Rogers, as a prominent Republican, who had actually represented the State Republican Party in some civil litigation related to the voter ID issue ... I knew he was interested in the issue. And then I was also aware of the emails and phone calls he had been leaving with my assistant, who I had tasked with prosecuting this. So I knew there was a tremendous amount of dissatisfaction of me not prosecuting any cases.

What I believed, however, was consistent with historic practice—that the Justice Department would insulate me from any partisan political pressure. As it turns out, they didn't do that. And that was one of the bases for forcing my resignation.

"There appears to be a growing body of evidence that suggests that there's voter suppression going on throughout the country."

NOW: it was face-to-face conversations with people like Mr. Rogers or the buzz out there about you from your critics, did any of these conversations or any of these criticisms ever make you feel uncomfortable or pressured?

DI: That's a hard question to answer. It made me angry because I knew what we were doing. And I kept asking myself, "How can they possibly criticize me when they don't know the evidence. They've not looked at the evidence. They've not looked at the FBI reports. I have." Why would they think that a Bush appointee—who had run for public office—I had ran for state attorney general—would intentionally not prosecute a righteous case? That the one thing that I never understood. But I think in their zeal and their obsession for getting anything indicted, they let their theories get in the way of the facts and get in the way of the evidence, which they only knew a very small portion of.

NOW: In retrospect, do you believe they were rightly motivated or do you believe they were motivated by partisan politics?

DI: They were clearly partisan. I can't reach into their minds and tell you what they were thinking but I am very disturbed to read accounts of what appears to be "voter caging" in Arkansas and other parts of the country. There appears to be a growing body of evidence that suggests that there's voter suppression going on throughout the country. I'm not sure if that happened in New Mexico. All I know is there was an attempted pressure put on me by local Republicans to indict voter fraud cases. I resisted that. I thought I was going to be protected by the Bush Justice Department and I was wrong in that assumption.

NOW: Did any state Republicans complain to the White House about you?

DI: They did ... I believe they spoke to Karl Rove. I know that Senator Pete Domenici called and complained to President Bush about my alleged lack of zealousness in voter fraud issues. But I didn't know any of this until after I left office. The hearings have resulted in thousands of pages of documents and emails and what not. And I've been able to find out what was going on behind my back.

NOW: Why do you think you were fired from your position?

DI: I've maintained from day one for illicit, partisan political reasons. Specifically not coming up with voter fraud cases, number one. And number two not rushing forward indictments involving prominent Democrats during the election cycle. And thirdly, and this is a possible, since the evidence, it hasn't rolled out yet. But my reserve military duty being gone from the office a lot, I was called an absentee landlord. I believe it's a combination of those three reasons.

NOW: How would you characterize the act of enlisting a U.S. attorney in activities that will benefit a political party at the polls?

DI: It's reprehensible. It's unethical. It's unlawful. It very well may be criminal ... I know it's a marked departure from prior administrations, both Republican and Democrat, who understood that U.S. attorneys, as chief federal law enforcement officials, have to stay out of politics. And that's consistent with what Former Attorney General John Ashcroft told me in the summer of 2001. When he said, "Politics cannot enter into your decision making as a US attorney."

NOW: Where do you believe it went off the rails?

"That's why there has been such a circling of the wagons around Karl Rove and Harriet Miers and Sarah Taylor. I believe there to be incriminating, possibly criminally incriminating evidence contained in those e-mails and other memoranda."

DI: Once Alberto Gonzales took over from Ashcroft, I don't think he ever fully understood that his role as the Attorney General was for the United States of America, that his client was the American public. It wasn't serving the needs of the President. I think that's where the train left the rails.

NOW: Do you think the problems surrounding the U.S. attorneys' firings, as well as what we're learning about some of these voter suppression efforts has tainted the party?

DI: It's tainted the party and it's tainted the Justice Department, which is a real shame. It's a tragedy because, for many years, the only agency that really had a standing as the untouchable agency from partisan politics was the Justice Department. And unfortunately, what's happened over the passed couple of years has tarred it with a very, very ugly brush ... It's a serious problem. The American people have the right to believe that "prosecutive" decisions are made on the basis of evidence alone. And right now, that's called into question.

Every president has the right to set their priorities. But they have to stay within the rules. I mean, this entire scandal in one sense is about the rule of law. And this sordid affair was an attempt to use the power of the Justice Department in an unethical and unlawful way.

NOW: Trying to use the office of a U.S. Attorney for partisan political purposes is unethical. But you're saying it is actually illegal?

DI: Right. That's why there has been such a circling of the wagons around Karl Rove and Harriet Miers and Sarah Taylor. I believe there to be incriminating, possibly criminally incriminating evidence contained in those e-mails and other memoranda. That's why the White House doesn't want to produce it to Congress.

INTERVIEW: Bud Cummins, Former United States Attorney
Speaks with Maria Hinojosa

This week, Maria Hinojosa speaks with Bud Cummins, a former U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas, who was one of eight federal prosecutors fired by the Justice Department. Cummins, a Republican, shares his beliefs on the involvement of senior administration officials, the credibility and morale problems of the Justice Department, and the tenuous future of the Patriot Act.

Interview Excerpts:

"They [the fired federal prosecutors] don't deserve to be slandered in this way. They should be commended for their service and if the President wants to go in a different direction for whatever reason that's his legal right. Now he can defend those decisions to Congress however he wants but he can't make things up. And that's what's happened here."

"The Chief of Staff of the Deputy Attorney General, Mike Elston, called me... and he said if this controversy continues to be stirred up, the [Justice] Department is going to be put in a position where they're likely going to have to roll out more embarrassing information to justify these decisions."

"It's painful for me to have to take my own party and my own former colleagues to task, but they're just simply wrong on this. There's an issue of right and wrong, and it's not political."

"Will Moschella [Associate Deputy Attorney General] described a deliberative committee performance review process that had taken place of all the U.S. Attorneys. If anything even resembling the process that he described to Congress had taken place, there would be a stack of memos a mile high ... The memo hasn't been produced because it doesn't exist because such an exercise never took place."

"My mom is 80 years old, and she's just afraid that her boy —someone's going to paint a target on his back. And if I become too much of an annoyance that one of these guys may try to take me out. And frankly, they have already, you know, in subtle and not so subtle ways, tried to discredit me to the media and say things."

About Bud Cummins:

Bud Cummins served as U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas from 2001 to December 2006. Before taking the federal prosecutor's job, Cummins served as Gov. Mike Huckabee's chief legal counsel in 1997.

In 1996, he ran for the 2nd District congressional seat representing central Arkansas, but was beaten by Democrat Vic Snyder, who still holds the post. Cummins obtained his J.D. from the University of Arkansas law school.

Cummins is currently working as a consultant for a bio-fuel company.

HINOJOSA: The news this week is all about the eight fired U.S. Attorneys. And we're joined by one of those former federal prosecutors, a newsmaker himself, even though he didn't choose to be one. We're speaking with Bud Cummins of Arkansas. Welcome to our program, Bud.

CUMMINS: Thank you, Maria.

HINOJOSA: Bud, your reaction to news that the discussion about the removal of—the federal prosecutors actually was taking place with Karl Rove and Alberto Gonzales before the White House had actually admitted that this was taking place. What's your reaction?

CUMMINS: From my perspective, it—it's most important because it is just another piece of evidence that the assertions that my seven colleagues were terminated for performance reasons is an absolute lie. And it is embarrassing to me that for whatever reason, the Attorney General of the United States, the Deputy Attorney General, who was a U.S. Attorney with all eight of us, who—and who should know better—and who absolutely does know better—would for whatever reason still be clinging onto this notion and this suggestion that there were somehow performance issues on the table when these decisions were made. Karl Rove is not a person who is in a position to make a call about performance of a United States Attorney. And so if he—the more he was involved in these decisions, is just stronger evidence that the decisions were made for other reasons. But performance isn't one of 'em. They've slandered these people's professional reputations.

An admission now that performance probably was not a significant factor in these decisions, really would not worsen their position in any measurable way. And it is beyond me why people on my team—these are Republicans, these are people in the Department of Justice who I served with proudly for five years—it is beyond me that they seem to be unable to at least right the wrong that they've committed against these seven people.

HINOJOSA: Bud Cummins, I need you to help us understand what it means when yourself, a Republican, former federal prosecutor, and you are prepared to say flat out that the U.S. Attorney General is a liar.

CUMMINS: What I don't know is exactly how much truth he knows about the lies that he has continued to—perpetuate. He's apparently surrounded himself with a—a lot of little political mischief-makers who probably had no business in these important positions at the Department to begin with. And I think the problem now is—it's hard for me to hold the President of the United States responsible, for instance, for this because it looks to me like all the people that he's getting direct advice from and he's relying on to tell him about what happened here, are the very people who are trying to keep themselves outta trouble for their role in it.

And so I think if he could see beyond their briefings to know that the seven people that I'm talking about—and—and I separate myself because they've admitted the truth in my case, that I asked was to leave so that another person could serve in my place. And they were within their legal discretion to ask me to leave. They asked me to leave. I left. And they're pretty squared away in my case.

But they never admitted whatever the other reasons were in the other seven cases, and tried to just lump them all together as performance-related decisions. And as recently as yesterday, I saw where Karl Rove gave a speech and tried to—ratify that suggestion once more. And—and that's just simply not true. And he knows it. And I'm—Paul McNulty, the Deputy Attorney General, knows it, because he has enough direct experience in this business to look at the list of reasons that—that they have recited to the Congress, and know that on their face they don't hold water.

HINOJOSA: So when Karl Rove in fact says, "Look, the previous Administration fired all the U.S. Attorneys," and he's basically saying, "This is something that's part of the MO of—of—of Presidential Administrations." And he says, "No one made a big political discussion about the firings." So clarify for our audience, what makes this different?

CUMMINS: Well, I want your audience to understand, like you said, I am a— very Rep—Republican person. I agreed to put that aside when I became a U.S. Attorney. And I did very successfully. But I—I have a very deep political background. And I'm very familiar with what a talking point is. And I think you are, too. And probably most of your li—listeners are.

He's reading from the talking points. And—and somebody has decided that if they try to continually talk about Bill Clinton firing 93 U.S. Attorneys, that will somehow you know, muddy this water up to where people can't see anything. The truth is, what they have done here is unprecedented. Presidents are entitled to—to appoint their own U.S. Attorneys. In modern history, Presidents have come into (UNINTEL) office, wiped the slate of 93 U.S. Attorneys clean, appointed their own people.

I can make a good argument why that's—that's the right thing to do. I think it's important to have their own people that are on the same page with their priorities and initiatives.

But no President that I'm aware of has ever then reached out later in his term and tried to remove one of his United States Attorneys that he appointed, absent malfeasance. There have been a handful of cases where people have made serious mistakes of some—one kind or another. And they've been asked to leave.

But—and that was my biggest concern. People have asked me you know, "What was your reaction when you got the call?" Well number one, I was surprised, 'cause I didn't think that was really one of the possibilities. Technically, obviously, when you serve at the pleasure of the President, they can call you at any time and ask you to leave.

But I—I was unaware of them ever doing that unless you made a mistake.

So my second concern—reaction was concern. Have I made a mistake? And they assured me that I had not. And then my third reaction was, a little bit of personal disappointment because I felt like I had served the President very well, and I was a little disappointed that they would start with me to—you know, an unprecedented move like that. But all those things aside, I knew all—we all knew we served at the pleasure of the President.

I accepted the decision. And I moved on without any complaint, as did all my seven colleagues. And no one spoke out. And you would not have me on the phone here today if they had not gone to Congress later and tried to avoid discussing very embarrassing—apparently very embarrassing things that went into these decisions, by trying to justify them by saying they were performance issues.

Because you're dealing with a group of people with my seven colleagues, that—everybody that knew them, that watched them, that worked with them—knew that they were particularly good United States Attorneys.

And they were serving the President loyally, if for no other reason because they were making him look good for putting them there. And they don't deserve to be slandered in this way.

They should be commended for their service. And if the President wants to go in a different direction for any reason, that's his legal right.

Now he can defend those decisions to Congress however he wants, but he can't make things up. And that's what's happened here.

HINOJOSA: When you were upset about the fact that you felt you and your colleagues were being slandered, you did start to speak out. And then you got a phone call from a Justice Department official. Who called you? What did they say?

CUMMINS: I had made some comments to—a reporter at the Washington Post who had contacted me. And one point I made to him is that they can replace us for no reason or any reason. But I actually threw in, "or even an idiotic reason." And that was probably a little bit of a slap at 'em. But—my point was that they can do this any time they want. It's not for me to complain about it. That's their discretion.

I also said, though, that if—I said at that time, if, because I wasn't really completely convinced of what was going on at that point, but if they were using this performance issue explanation to cover up some other agenda, that that was wrong and they oughta retract those statements. And that touched a nerve at the Department—in the Department of Management. And—the Chief of Staff of the Deputy Attorney General, Paul McNulty, whose name is Mike Elliston, called me.

It was obviously triggered because of that article. And he said, "If this controversy continues to be stirred up, some of these people are gonna find that—that the Department's gonna be put in a zi—position where they're likely gonna have to roll out more embarrassing information to justify these decisions." And I—I had already heard a briefing of that more damaging information that they had privately briefed the Senate Judiciary Committee on, and so had my colleagues.

And none of us were particular impressed by it. So I didn't really see it as a significant threat. But I did pass that—the fact of the call on to my colleagues. And some of 'em you know, were predictably quite offended.

HINOJOSA: How did you pass the information on to your colleagues? What—what did you do after you got this phone call from Mike Elliston, basically saying, "You know, if you keep talking about this, there may come a point where we're gonna have to—we're gonna have to move this forward a little bit ourselves, too, and start revealing information." I mean, some people might say that that was something of a threat.

What did you do when—after that phone call? How did you communicate this to your colleagues?

CUMMINS: When I got the call from Elliston, and I felt like I needed to share it with some of my colleagues, and so I sent an e-mail to all of them. And I tried to describe the call in the e-mail. I really didn't think about it again until the night before our Congressional testimony.

One of my colleagues—was concerned about it and—and had mentioned it to a Senate staffer. And I learned from a reporter the night before, very late the night before the hearings, that I was gonna be asked about that call. And that reporter also shared with me that the Department was completely disavowing that those calls ever took place.

And one person at the Department had said specifically, "If it's Bud Cummins saying it, he's a liar." And I'm probably a lotta things, but I'm not a liar. So that—that ticked me off a little bit. So I got up, put my clothes back on, and went to the basement of the hotel and paid $5 a minute or something to get on their internet. And I found that e-mail. And I printed it out, put it in my pocket. And I was asked about it. And they asked if I had the e-mail, and I did. So that's how all that kinda got into the public record.

HINOJOSA: And has the Justice Department released any kind of information that shows that the ot—the seven other fired U.S. Attorneys did have performance problems, that there was a history of a discussion around these seven—U.S. Attorneys?

CUMMINS: No, Maria. And that's—and that's really, I think, the key point in why I'm so embarrassed that they continue to continue to wanna say that. They—they had Will Moschella go to the House Judiciary Committee the same day we testified there under subpoena. We were under subpoena. He wasn't.

And he recited the supposed reasons in each of those seven cases. And the—the reasons are in some cases laughable. There—there is no substance to really any of it. Additionally, if you look at the e-mails—from Kyle Samson that were released early in the week, there's no discussion of any of those issues there.

And the thing that's most persuasive to me, and maybe you'd had to work in the Department to really understand it, but the people that worked in Main Justice, what we call Main Justice in D.C. don't make a decision about changing a light bulb without writing a 30 page memo. They write memos to their bosses about anything. They always cover themselves.

Will Moschella described a deliberative committee performance review process that had taken place of all the United States Attorneys. If anything resembling the process that he described to Congress had taken place, there would be a stack of memos a mile high.

And they have not rolled out so much as a half a page.

Don't you think if they were gonna disclose all those embarrassing e-mails, that by now they would've shared the memo where they analyzed 93 U.S. Attorneys on their performance? The—the—the memo hasn't been produced because it doesn't exist, because such an exercise never took place. But there's no excuse, they could cure this problem today by just conceding that performance was never on the table when they made the decisions about my seven colleagues. And it's outrageous to me that they haven't done that.

HINOJOSA: Do you think that you and your colleagues were targeted because you were not quote unquote "loyal Bushies," that you were too independent, that you were not prepared to follow—a kind of political line on prosecutions that the White House wanted you to follow?

CUMMINS: Well the short answer is, we don't know really. And Kyle Samson's credibility is so low, that trying to draw a conclusion about that from his e-mails is not you know, a real useful exercise. But I'll just tell you this. I've been a Republican all my adult life. I was a Congressional candidate in 1996. I've raised money and campaigned for other Republicans for 30 years.

I was the Bush Cheney Arkansas counsel in 2000. I went to Florida and counted chads during the recount. I was a electoral college elector for Bush Cheney in 2000. And all that happened before I became United States Attorney. I think the fact that my name turned up and other names turned up on the disloyal list had a lot more to do with some political minion at Justice wanting to be a U.S. Attorney and wanting to create a vacancy than it had to do with anybody's loyalty to the President.

HINOJOSA: So when you hear that Democrats and—and even Republican Arlen Specter, are trying to investigate whether or not the—the firings were motivated by a desire to squelch corruptions in—corruption investigations that may have involved Republicans, you say what?

CUMMINS: There was a time when I would say that that was a little bit too conspiratorial or a little too paranoid, and—and that it probably doesn't reach so far to retaliate against somebody that conducted a corruption investigation, or to stop someone from conducting another one, or to punish somebody for not investigating a voter fraud case or a Democrat public corruption case. But at this point, the—the credibility of some of these people involved in this is so low that I wouldn't—you know, I really wouldn't wanna put my credibility on the line and tell you that it—that didn't happen.

It—it—it seems more obvious to me that this had mostly to do some mid level, like I said, political mischief-makers wanting to create some vacancies for themselves and their friends. I think there was some personal animus probably factored into it. Maybe the Deputy Attorney General and other people just kinda didn't like certain people, and would like to see 'em gone.

And I think that at the end of the process, that it's very likely that somebody threw a few names in because some Republican members of Congress or party leaders in their home states were aggravated at 'em for one reason or another. The first two reasons are kinda dumb and petty. But you know, I don't think the history of the world changes because they change out a U.S. Attorney 'cause somebody wanted his job.

The last reason is a lot more serious. Because you know, when I became a U.S. Attorney, I had—I explained to my wife you know, "I have to go where these cases lead me. And they may lead me to take out Republican leaders, you know Republican businessmen in the community. And at the end of the time I'm United States Attorney, if I do this job right, we may not be real popular in the circles we have previously—moved in. And that's just the way it's gonna be."

But it never occurred to me that the Department would fail to insulate me from that pressure so I could do my job. And—and this suggestion or this notion that—that prosecutors were out there doing their job by the book, exercising their very important prosecutorial discretion in the right way, and that it somehow aggravated their party leaders at home and they filed a complaint with the White House, and that immediately resulted in their dismissal, is very frightening.

HINOJOSA: So when you hear that Democrats and—and even Republican Arlen Specter, are trying to investigate whether or not the—the firings were motivated by a desire to squelch corruptions in—corruption investigations that may have involved Republicans, you say what?

CUMMINS: Well you know—somebody at the H—in the House Committee asked me, "Are—you know, are you giving up the Republican Party?" And my answer to that—I should have answered it more strongly, I just said no—but you know my answer's really, "Hell, no."

And—and this is about weeding about—you know, cleaning your own house. In this instance, this isn't a Republican problem. This is a problem about individuals that have been put into—positions of responsibility that didn't understand the responsibility they were given.

HINOJOSA: Some of the seven other attorneys that were let go have said that they received pressure in certain cases. David Iglesias from New Mexico said he felt, quote unquote, "leaned on" after Senator Dominici called him and asked whether a corruption probe of local Democrats would result in charges by Election Day. We're gonna listen to a little bit of what David Iglesias said in testimony in the Senate earlier this month.

DAVID IGLESIAS: He wanted to—ask me about the corruption matters or the corruption cases that had been widely reported in the local media. And I said, "All right." And he said, "Are these gonna be filed before November?" And I said I didn't think so. And to which he replied, "I'm very sorry to hear that," and then the line went dead.

SEN. SCHUMER: So in other words, he hung up on you?

DAVID IGLESIAS: That's how I took that. Yes, sir.

SEN. SCHUMER: And he didn't say good-bye or anything like that?

DAVID IGLESIAS: No, sir.

SEN. SCHUMER: Now did you take that of a—as a sign of his unhappiness with your decision?

DAVID IGLESIAS: I felt sick afterward. So I felt he was—upset that—at hearing the answer he received.

SEN. SCHUMER: Right. And so is it fair to say that you felt pressured to hurry—subsequent cases and prosecutions as a result of the call?

DAVID IGLESIAS: Yes, sir, I did. I felt—leaned on. I felt pressured to—get these matters moving.

SEN. SCHUMER: And as you say, it was unusual for you to receive a call from a senator at home while you were the U.S. Attorney.

DAVID IGLESIAS: Unprecedented. It had never happened.

SEN. SCHUMER: Okay, how long after that contact with Senator Dominici were you fired?

DAVID IGLESIAS: Approximately six weeks later (SIC)—five—five—five week (SIC) later.

HINOJOSA: So what's your reaction to that testimony?

CUMMINS: It's a concern that Senator Dominici would use the bad judgment to make the call. I'm gonna leave it to other people to decide what the call constituted—whether it was just bad judgment or a bad day or something more serious and—you know, a—some kind of a violation of Senate rules. David did the right thing. He sealed it off from the United States Attorney's Office.

He—he—was not persuaded to talk to the Senator about things he shouldn't talk about. He put up a stop sign, even though Senator Dominici was a very influential Republican—I think David said—considered him a mentor. And John McKay did the same thing in Seattle when he got a similar call from a Congressional staff person.

That's what the Attorney General of the United States should have done when political pressure was comin' to the front door of the Department of Justice. But that apparently did not happen. And it didn't happen because the people all around the Attorney General apparently, were too enamored by the activities at the White House.

HINOJOSA: But one of the things—one of the issues that this Administration has apparently wanted to pursue is—pressing cases of voter fraud. Is there really a case for U.S. Attorneys to pursue cases of voter fraud when we have a new report—released by the Project Vote—, which says that there is essentially extremely rare—extremely rare cases of voter fraud in the United States, and that actually this is a myth that promulgated to quote unquote "suppress voter participation." So do we have a case in the United States where voter fraud is something that we should be pursuing? Or is this something that this Administration wants to pursue for political reasons?

CUMMINS: I will tell you that in my experience here in the eastern district of Arkansas, that there is a—a perception in the Republican Party that there is you know, widespread rampant voter fraud going on on election day, that people are voting dead people. Or there's a widespread feeling among the Democrats that reposition are somehow conspiring to violate people's civil rights by keeping them away from the polls.

Occasionally actual complaints came to me or to the FBI along both of those lines. They were always investigated. Always investigated. Very seldom was there any evidence to back them up. People will call you and say, "Everybody over here in Smith, Arkansas," if there is a Smith, Arkansas—forgive me, I—I'm not—I'm not aware of one. I'm—trying to make up a generic name. But, "Everybody over here in Smith, Arkansas, knows that they stole our election over here."

And so you say, "Okay, give me the first witness and we'll interview 'em." "Well, I—I don't know who that would be. But—everybody knows it was stolen." And that's kinda what you run up against. And so I can just tell you that I—I would be shocked if any U.S. Attorney didn't proactively investigate any complaints along either of those lines. It's a high priority for the depart—I mean for the Bureau, too. So the idea that out in the field we are somehow lax on voter fraud investigations is silly. Moreover, we never had any—there was never any communication to us that there was a desire by the Administration to emphasize that more than we were already doing it.

HINOJOSA: I'm wondering about—again in this process of you suddenly being a newsmaker, when you were really behind the scenes just trying to do the job as—as a U.S. Attorney, but in your history as—as a member of the Republican Party—an active member—you supported—the Patriot Act. You were a big supporter of the Patriot Act. You were a member of the Department of Justice's Anti-Terrorism Advisory Council . But in essence, they were able to replace you because of a provision in the Patriot Act. So what are your thoughts on the Patriot Act now?

CUMMINS: To the extent I'm familiar with the Patriot Act, and I don't claim to—I obviously didn't know about this page, 'cause I'd never heard about the change in the interim appointment process in the Patriot Act, and I don't think any of us had—I don't think any of the senators had that voted on it. You know, the events in the last several weeks—not only the you know, frivolous use of the Patriot Act to try and circumvent the Senate in the case of the United States Attorneys, but also the audit about the National Security letters—of the FBI's use of the National Security letters—has probably jeopardized the future of the Patriot Act.

This discredits the whole project. And—and it would be impossible for me if I wasn't one of the eight U.S. Attorneys and I was still in office, if they asked me tomorrow to go back and put my credibility on the line for the Patriot Act in the same way that I had before, it would be impossible for me to do that. So I think it was really reckless of the people that thought this was a cute way to solve a political problem.

HINOJOSA: I—I've heard that perhaps that are some members of your family—your mother—who's a little bit concerned about the fact that you are speaking out. What do you do when your mom says to you, "Son, I'm worried about the fact that you are out there talking and being so public about this"?

CUMMINS: Well my mom's 80 years old. And she's just afraid that her boy's gonna—somebody's gonna paint a target on his back, and—and if I become too much of an annoyance at some—one of these guys—may try to take me out. And frankly, they have already—you know, in—in subtle and not so subtle ways tried to kinda discredit me to the media and say things. That's—that's kinda backed off now.

But you know, they can't hurt me. I mean to—to be honest with you, my—my family and—and the—the peop—my—our neighbors here in Little Rock and the people in Arkansas that know me—their—their opinion's not gonna change no matter what Karl Rove tells his—his reporter friends in Washington, you know? It's—it's painful for me to have to take my own party and the peo—my own former colleagues to task. But they're just simply wrong on this.

There's an issue of right and wrong here that's not political. It's just about people. And—and they really oughta get right on this one issue. It won't solve all their problems. But—it'll solve their problem with me, 'cause they won't ever hear from me again.

HINOJOSA: So what do you think needs to happen right now? Is—I mean are you saying there should be an apology? Are you saying there should be official testimony? Are you saying there should be resignations? What does Bud Cummins want right now?

CUMMINS: They need to admit that the idea of performance is silly and—and embarrassing, and they shoulda never said it to begin with. And they need to apologize to those seven. On the one hand, if you were advising them you might say, "Well, if you do that then the Congress is gonna accuse you of lying to 'em." But I—you know, I got news for 'em.

I've spent a lot of time unfortunately with the—the staffs in the judiciary committees in Congress. Nobody believes 'em anyway. They've got severe credibility problems now with the Congress and with the public. And frankly, they—you know within the United States Attorney community, I mean there's a—there's 93 U.S. Attorneys, but they represent you know, tens of thousands of career prosecutors and paralegals and legal—assistants. And you know, I talk to enough of those people to know that they've got some severe morale and confidence problems among those ranks right now, based on what those people have seen in these e-mails.

HINOJOSA: So you're saying that we have U.S. Attorneys right now that are having morale problems, that there are morale problems in the Justice Department. Just finally Bud, what does this mean to all of us as citizens?

CUMMINS: Well I just think that it's important that every citizen can believe that federal prosecutors are operating in a neutral and non-partisan way. Well many of us were political before we got those jobs. We come to 'em through a fairly political process. But it's very important that we leave the politics out and give up that part of our lives while we serve as federal prosecutors.

Because when you go and indict somebody and threaten to take their liberty away and their property—you know, that's a pretty serious thing. And—and the public has to believe that you're doing it for right reasons and no wrong reasons. Once something like this happens, and you let somehow politics get injected into substantive decisions of the Department, people have a perception that maybe there is a political component to other decisions you're making.

And they really question every decision you make. And it's—and it's already being demonstrated. I—I—you know, I'm—right now talkin' to probably a dozen or two dozen reporters a day. They're asking me questions about things that are so far distant from this, and whether they're related to Karl Rove, or—you know and I don't really have any information on that for 'em. And I really doubt that there are connections to most of these things.

But that's the natural result. Once you lose your credibility, people question every decision you make. So they're asking me whether this incident is related to decisions that have been made in the civil rights division, or the environment division. And that's what people naturally do when they lo—they've lost confidence in your credibility.

And—and—and the Department of Justice frankly lives on its credibility. So it's important that that not happen. It has happened. And it needs to be fixed.

HINOJOSA: Bud Cummin, a former U.S. Attorney from Arkansas who was fired. Thanks so much for joining us on "NOW on the News." And good luck.

CUMMINS: Thank you.

League of Women Voters Stymied in Registration Campaign

Transcript:

BRANCACCIO: Welcome to NOW...

Are you voting this fall? Sure about that?

It hasn't been getting much attention, but some states are putting new restrictions on your right to vote, all in the name of preventing voter fraud. Critics say these new state laws on voter registration and voter identification threaten to -- here's the word of the day -- threaten to disenfranchise hundreds of thousands of voters, among them the elderly, poor and minorities. And what's the Justice Department doing about it? Well, not much, insiders say.

Senior correspondent Maria Hinojosa and producer Peter Meryash have our report.

HINOJOSA: In St. Petersburg, Florida, volunteers with the League of Women Voters are gearing up for another election. Usually, the league here would do what they do all over the country ... register new voters. But so far, not this year. The reason? A new Florida law.

WHEATLEY-GILIOTTI: The law has done harm because the League of Women Voters, as well as other— other organizations— were not able to register voters before the primary.

HINOJOSA: That's right ... for the first time in sixty-seven years ... this mainstay of American civic life decided it had to stop registering new voters in Florida because of that new law.

And Florida is only one of several politically important states where battles have been erupting recently ... over who's going to be able to vote ... or not ... in this year's elections.

The battles shape up this way: on the one side, mostly Republican state legislatures ... passing laws, they say, intended to prevent voter fraud and the chaos of recent elections.

STATON: "We want to make sure that the voting process has integrity at every point ..."

HINOJOSA: On the other side, many Democrats and civil rights groups ... who believe these laws could disenfranchise hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of often elderly, poor or minority voters across the country.

FORT: "... it's passing the most restrictive requirements for voting since the Jim Crow era."

HINOJOSA: And what's more, civil rights advocates say ... the Bush administration is part of the problem. The U.S. department of justice, which is responsible for enforcing the voting rights act, has signed off on some of these restrictive laws.

David Becker knows about some of the inner working of the Justice Department. He was a senior attorney in the department for seven years under Presidents Clinton and Bush.

BECKER: Everyone in America, regardless of their political ideologies should be very concerned about these restrictive, disenfranchising, suppressive laws that are being enacted in many states all over the country.

HINOJOSA: For example, three states have recently passed strict laws that require voters to show government-issued photo identification at the polls. Two states require proof of citizenship to register or in some cases even vote.

In six states, laws set tight restrictions on voter registration drives. And in a majority of states, similar kinds of restrictions are being considered.

Which brings us back to Florida. Voter registration there, like in other swing states, surged in recent years.

Republican state representative Ron Reagan, no relation to the former president, says that caused problems, forms were turned in last minute, or not at all. He admits those cases weren't widespread, but even so, he thought something needed to be done.

REAGAN: I don't think it's asking too much to simply say if you go out to register somebody to vote, turn their registration card in promptly so that we can get them on the rolls so when the time comes they can vote. And that's it. Pure and simple, that's all I strove for with this law, and I think that's all we're really after.

HINOJOSA: The law threatens volunteers and their organizations with substantial fines. Two hundred and fifty dollars for each individual voter registration form turned in more than 10 days after it's signed ... or $5,000 if the form is lost, or never turned in.

These fines pose an enormous risk for volunteer groups like the league of women voters.

WHEATLEY-GILIOTTI: My budget for this year is $70,000. Okay? So 14 forms, times $5,000? My whole budget is wiped out for the year.

HINOJOSA: Dianne Wheatley-Giliotti is the league's state president.

WHEATLEY-GILIOTTI: They're volunteers. What happens if there's an automobile accident? What happens if there's a hurricane? What happens if there's a fire? What happens if there's a family emergency? These well-intentioned persons might just inadvertently forget to turn in these forms. In which case, that individual would be individually subject to this fine, and the League of Women Voters.

REAGAN: I understand the fines may be a little— excessive in some people's minds. However, it's to encourage people turn 'em in on time. And if a particular group feels that they don't have control over their own members and can't expect their own members to follow the rules— I'm sorry for that.

HINOJOSA: But the League of Women Voters and other groups say the law unfairly punishes them because political parties and their voter registration efforts are exempt from these same fines.

The voter groups have challenged the law in court, and just this week a judge issued an order temporarily blocking it. But damage has already been done.

Normally by this time, the League and other groups would have already registered thousands of new Florida voters, particularly the elderly, the poor and people of color. Now, says the League, several thousand might not be able to vote in the upcoming primary.

And that could have a significant impact. Remember, the 2000 election came down to just 537 votes in Florida.

Of course, getting people registered is only half of the equation ... they still need access to the ballot box. Now, even that has become a political and legal battle in several states.

Indiana, Missouri, and Georgia have all passed strict laws requiring people to show photo identification in order to vote.

FRENCHER: I know that I'm not going to be able to get an updated Missouri State ID due to the fact that I don't have a birth certificate

HINOJOSA: Maria Frencher is politically active in her Kansas City, Missouri community. She can often be found these days registering new voters. Ironically, a new Missouri voter ID law which took effect on Monday will actually keep her from the polls this, she says, because she doesn't have the right documents to prove who she is.

FRENCHER: I have a social security card, I have a Kansas state ID. It says who I am...not enough.

HINOJOSA: Missouri state election officials say more than two hundred thousand registered voters don't currently have a correct picture ID.

But perhaps nowhere has the battle over photo ID been more acrimonious than in Georgia.

SENTATOR: You can laugh about this if you want, but I'm telling you, you are stabbing race relations in the heart with this piece of legislation.

HINOJOSA: Democrats there howled when Republicans, who now control the legislature for the first time since reconstruction, passed the law requiring voters to show a photo-ID at the polls.

STATON: The yays are 31 and the nays are 22, this bill having received the Constitution majority is therefore passed...

HINOJOSA: State senator Cecil Staton, a Republican, says he wrote the law to prevent voter impersonation.

STATON: It just seemed common sense to me that when you come to vote, you ought to be able to show that you are who you say you are.

HINOJOSA: Senator Staton says only a few thousand voters in Georgia don't have a government-issued photo-ID. But Democrats in the state say the real number is closer to seven hundred thousand.

MORGAN: And I realize that when people hear that you have to show a photo ID, most people who live in a metro area would say: What's the big deal with that?

State Representative Alicia Thomas Morgan is a Democrat ... And the first African American to represent her county.

HINOJOSA: But what's the problem with saying: Well, you know, it's gonna—you're gonna have to get this ID. And it may take you a little bit of time, but if voting is so important to you then it shouldn't be that big of a deal.

MORGAN: Well, I think that sounds good— except that when you put barriers in the place of people voting then you are asking people to jump through several hoops to exercise their Constitutional right to vote.

HINOJOSA: People like 87-year old Rosa Laster who lives by herself in Plains, Georgia.

LASTER: No, I don't have a photo ID.

HINOJOSA: Laster, a retired nurse, has lived in Plains all her life and for years, she's been able to vote close to home without a photo-ID. But now, in order to get an ID, she'd have to go 11 miles away to Americus, the county seat.

And that, she says, could be really tough . The closest relative who could drive her lives four hours away.

LASTER: I would have to get somebody to take me over there, bring me back. And then I'd have to pay them. And sometimes, you don't have the money.

HINOJOSA: Voting, she says, is very important to her. She remembers what it was like for African Americans where she lives. They were turned away at the polls or beaten up trying to get there.

Senator Staton denies his law has anything to do with race.

STATON: I think there is a bigotry of low expectations among those who would say that African-Americans don't do the very same things that all other Americans do. Use a ID to go cash a check at a bank or to rent that video or to get on an airplane.

I would argue that the slight inconvenience it may be for some people to have to get that ID, it's worth it in order to guarantee the integrity of the process.

HINOJOSA: But, in fact, what are the numbers in terms of people impersonating voters in Georgia?

STATON: Well, that's a very good question.

HINOJOSA: In fact, there's no hard evidence to indicate how big a problem voter fraud at the polls might be.

Senator Staton cites a story from 2000 in the Atlanta Journal Constitution that reported more than five thousand dead people voted in the twenty years between 1980 and 2000. But it's uncertain how many of those were fraudulent and how many were simple clerical errors.

Georgia's Secretary of State, a Democrat, says there hasn't been one documented case of voter impersonation fraud at the polls in the past 10 years. And if this new law is really aimed at curbing voter fraud, then why has Georgia now made it easier to vote absentee?

According to state election officials, absentee voting is the most common form of election fraud in the state of Georgia. It also happens to be a way of voting used disproportionately by white Americans.

HINOJOSA: So, what do you think is the real reason why this legislation has passed then?

MORGAN: I believe that there is an effort in this country to disenfranchise several groups of people. That includes people of color. That includes the elderly. That includes young people, and students in particular. That includes people who would generally vote for progressives or Democrats, however you'd like to call it. And I believe that there is a concerted effort to keep those people at home.

And when I know that people have died for me to have the right to vote, it hurts and it bothers me.

HINOJOSA: Civil rights groups challenge Georgia voter ID requirement in court. A Federal and a State judge have repeatedly found the law likely to be unconstitutional. And so they've temporarily blocked it. But in Indiana a federal judge upheld a very similar photo-ID requirement. And meanwhile, many challenges to other election reforms are pending in states across the country.

So where in all of this is the U.S. Department of Justice?

Ever since President Johnson signed the voting rights act in 1965, the Justice Department's civil rights division has historically taken the lead in protecting voters from just these kinds of restrictive state election laws.

But some former Justice Department officials charge ... under the Bush administration ... all that's changed. David Becker says that's why he left the Justice Department a year and a half ago ... Part of an exodus of attorneys from the civil rights division.

He's now with People for the American Way Foundation.

BECKER: It's not just that it's turning a blind eye to discrimination. It's actively validating discrimination in some places. It's actively validating policies that are harmful to racial minorities in terms of their access to the polls, in terms of the poor and the elderly, being able to achieve full access to the polls.

HINOJOSA: Becker and other former insiders say a series of decisions by the Justice Department have resulted in Americans being restricted from voting ... even denied the right to vote.

They point to approval of the Georgia voter identification requirement and the Florida voter registration fines. Remember, the Justice Department has the final word, because under the voting rights act, it has to sign off on changes in election law in states with a history of discrimination.

Just look what happened, these critics say, in the Justice Department's review of the Georgia voter ID law.

It all came out in this revealing internal memo that was leaked. A team of the department lawyers and analysts found the Georgia voter ID law was likely to discriminate against African Americans, and so, recommended four to one to reject it.

But the department's leadership over-ruled that recommendation ... and just a day after receiving the 51-page, detailed analysis ... gave the Georgia law the "OK."

GONZALES: There have been stories which have troubled me about the politicization of the Civil Rights Division. This is something that troubles me as a Hispanic in particular.

HINOJOSA: The Justice Department turned down a request for an interview ... but Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told Congress in April that the department is committed to protecting voting rights.

GONZALES: ... the guidelines that we follow is the law. Those are the guidelines that we follow.

HINOJOSA: The Justice Department says it's filed a record number of cases on behalf of Latino and other minority language voters.

But something's changed ... over the past 5 years, the Justice Department has brought only one voter discrimination case based on race on behalf of African Americans, none on behalf of Native Americans ... and the first case ever on behalf of white voters.

DRISCOLL: And those kinds of things, I think, reflect that the country is changing, and priorities have to change to go along with that.

HINOJOSA: Bob Driscoll was a Deputy Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights in the Bush administration ... and he says people have to understand that elections have consequences.

DRISCOLL: Everyone that works for the Department knows that the policy decisions are made by political appointees. And that is the reality. And the day-today work of the division is carried out by the career staff. But the policy priorities and— and the chain of command is that those folks make the decision.

HINOJOSA: And as decisions about election reforms are being made all across the country, civil rights advocates say ... they will have a real impact on American voters.

BECKER: There are individuals who are eligible voters who have voted for years— in some cases, voted for decades, who are gonna find themselves without a way to express themselves in this democracy.

And that's— that's not just sad, that's a tragedy.....

Vote Caging and the Attorney General: A Short History

by J. Gerald Hebert and Brian Dupre

July 23, 2007

When Attorney General Alberto Gonzales testifies before the Senate Judiciary Committee tomorrow morning, vote caging by the Republican Party and the related actions and inactions by the Department of Justice (DOJ) deserve careful examination. When former Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty testified before Congress last month, he offered to have DOJ look into the issue of vote caging (“If you’re raising with me as Deputy Attorney General the question of caging votes, I’m very happy to work with you on that concern.”).[1] It would be interesting to ask the Attorney General for a progress report on how the DOJ review/inquiry into vote caging is going.

Conspiracies to stop African-Americans from exercising their constitutional right to vote aren’t new – and neither is vote caging. The Republican National Committee has been under a federal consent decree not to engage in the practice since getting caught in the 1981 gubernatorial election in New Jersey. Despite the injunction, which remains in effect, vote caging schemes continue to be used as an integral part of an ongoing campaign to suppress minority voting rights.

To bring these schemes to an end will require vigorous prosecution by the United States Department of Justice. But the Department’s priorities have shifted over the years, with the Bush-Ashcroft-Gonzales Justice Department not only ignoring vote caging schemes, but actively working to give them a boost in the courts.

Contrast, for example, the Department of Justice’s efforts in 1990 in North Carolina under President Bush’s father to the Department’s actions in the 2004 election cycle in Ohio. In 1990, the North Carolina Republican Party and the Jesse Helms for Senate campaign engaged in vote caging by sending 44,000 postcards to black voters, giving them incorrect information about voting and threatening them with criminal prosecution. The plan was to use the mailing to compile a caging list. In response, the Bush I Justice Department, where I served at the time as a federal prosecutor of voting discrimination cases, filed a federal lawsuit against the GOP and Helms’ campaign and obtained declaratory and injunctive relief. In 2004, when the Ohio Republican Party was sued by voters prior to the election to stop what appeared to be a similar vote caging scheme in progress, the Bush II Justice Department did not file its own lawsuit to stop the vote caging but instead intervened in a highly unusual manner on the opposite side: by writing a letter to the federal judge overseeing the case and coming to the defense of the Ohio's GOP efforts! The judge appears to have ignored the letter, which was totally unsolicited and contrary to the Department's tradition of avoiding intervention in pre-election litigation.

It's one more example of how, under this Administration, a politicized Justice Department has perverted its mission of defending the right to vote, and instead harnessed the resources of the federal government to attack that very right for partisan political purposes.

The Legal Center has gathered information on vote caging activities in multiple states over the last few decades. The vote caging issue continues to be a topic of discussion here in DC, often emerging in testimony on Capitol Hill as the scandal over the firings of U.S. Attorneys continues to unfold. The issue has yet to be fully probed, and tomorrow's appearance by Attorney General Gonzales before the Senate Judiciary Committee offers another opportunity to press him on his knowledge of vote caging schemes.

As the following state-by-state list of some high profile instances of vote caging shows, a Department of Justice review of this issue as promised by Paul McNulty could take quite some time, because there is a lot out there.

The 1980's: The Early Days of Vote Suppression Through Caging

New Jersey 1981

The notorious 1981 New Jersey gubernatorial election between Republican Tom Kean and Democrat Jim Florio provided a window into voter intimidation and suppression techniques, vote caging in particular. The Republican National Committee used vote caging to compile a list of more than 45,000 voters, mostly Black and Latino, to challenge at the polls.[2] Republican "ballot security" teams hired armed guards with armbands to police polling places.

Kean won by less than 2,000 voters, but only after an almost month-long recount. Both state and county prosecutors launched investigations into voter intimidation. A federal court eventually entered a consent decree that prohibited the RNC from engaging in vote caging.[3]

Louisiana 1986

In the 1986 election, the RNC used vote caging to compile a list of 31,000 voters, mostly black, that it attempted to have thrown off the voter rolls.[4] At the time, Kris Wolfe, the Republican National Committee Midwest political director, wrote Lanny Griffith, the committee's Southern political director, "I know this is really important to you. I would guess this program would eliminate at least 60,000 to 80,000 folks from the rolls. If this is a close race, which I assume it is, this could keep the black vote down considerably." [5]

Following this caging scandal, both parties agreed to amend the original 1982 consent decree to require that the RNC would submit to the court any ballot security plan for approval.

The 1990's: Vote Suppression Through Caging Continues

North Carolina 1990

In October of 1990, when the black Democratic candidate for U.S. Senate, Harvey Gantt, was leading incumbent Jesse Helms in the polls, the Helms for Senate Committee and the North Carolina Republican Party developed a vote caging scheme.

As described above, according to a lawsuit brought by the Bush I Justice Department, on October 29, 2004, at least 44,000 postcards were sent, without a disclaimer that they were paid for by a political party, exclusively to black voters in North Carolina.[6] The postcards served two purposes; first, they were intended to directly intimidate and threaten black voters and to give them false information about voting; second, and more insidiously, the undelivered postcards would be used to create a caging list of black voters with the intent of challenging them at the polls. According to the suit, "This effort was terminated shortly before the election and subsequent to the initiation of an investigation ... by the United States Department of Justice." [7] Later a consent decree was entered against defendants that allowed the court oversight until 1996.

The 2004 Elections: Vote Caging Suppression At Full Bore

Florida 2004

The 2000 election in Florida raised the stakes and also showed the effectiveness of disenfranchising black voters in a close election. Both parties trained their sights on the state again in 2004 and vote caging became an integral part of the Republican Party plan in the Sunshine State.

In the late summer and fall of 2004, the Republican National Committee developed a caging list of voters in predominantly black areas of Jacksonville, Florida. The scheme came to light when Tim Griffin, then the Research Director and Deputy Communications Director for the RNC, mistakenly sent an e-mail with the subject line "caging" to an e-mail address at georgewbush.org, a political parody website whose operators sent it to the press. Griffin had meant to send the list to a Republican operative with an e-mail address at georgewbush.com, the official Bush campaign e-mail suffix.

Griffin's e-mail contained an Excel spreadsheet "Caging-1.xls" containing the names of 1,886 Florida voters, mostly black, including the names of black soldiers deployed abroad.[8]

As the BBC reported, "An elections supervisor in Tallahassee, when shown the list, told Newsnight: 'The only possible reason why they would keep such a thing is to challenge voters on Election Day.'" [9] A recent analysis of the names on the caging list showed that the Jacksonville caging preferentially selected blacks and excluded whites.[10]

Griffin was later appointed an interim U.S. Attorney in Arkansas. The White House refused to submit him to the Senate for confirmation out of concerns over his involvement in vote caging, as Monica Goodling verified in her testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee.[11]

Nevada 2004

In Clark County Nevada, the former state Republican Party executive director, Dan Burdish, attempted to cage 17,000 voters weeks prior to the 2004 election. The voters had been put on an “inactive” list when mail sent to their addresses was returned.

The Las Vegas Review Journal reported, “Burdish said he only targeted Democratic voters because ‘I’m a partisan Republican, I admit it.’”[12]

Local election administrators objected to the challenge, including Registrar of Voters Larry Lomax. As reported by the Review Journal, “Lomax said he can see no legitimate reason why Burdish would challenge the voters. ‘The law already tells us what to do with inactive voters,’ Lomax said. ‘The law provides a remedy for these people, and I’d guess that the only point in a challenge would be an attempt to intimidate voters.’”[13]

Ohio 2004

More so than Florida, Ohio was ground zero for the hotly contested 2004 election – and also a hotbed of voter intimidation.

The Ohio Republican Party developed a caging scheme and identified 35,000 newly registered voters in urban areas, mostly black, who either refused to sign for letters from the Republican party or whose letters came back undeliverable.[14] An attorney for the Ohio Republican Party even admitted that the plan was to use the returned letters from minority neighborhoods to challenge voters.[15]

Prior to Election Day, when the caging list would be used to challenge voters at the polls, the caging scheme was challenged in court on two fronts. In New Jersey, voters filed suit against the RNC for violating the 1982 consent decree. The RNC argued that the consent decree only applied to it, not the Ohio Republican Party, which planned to supply the challengers, and therefore was inapplicable to the Ohio election.[16] The federal court rejected that argument, and, on Nov. 1, 2004, ordered Republicans in Ohio not to proceed with the caging scheme on Election Day.[17]

Meanwhile, in Ohio, voters filed suit to challenge the Ohio law permitting political parties to post challengers in polling places on Election Day – challengers armed with caging lists.[18]

While the court battles were playing out in New Jersey and Ohio in the days and hours leading up to the 2004 election, with the rights of minority voters hanging in the balance, did the Department of Justice step in to enforce the Voting Rights Act?

Unsurprisingly for anyone who’s followed the ongoing scandal over the politicization of the Civil Rights Division, the answer is “of course not.” Perversely, the Justice Department sent a letter to the Ohio federal judge overseeing the lawsuit to tell her that the challenge statute that was to be used as part of the vote caging scheme was perfectly fine.[19]

Assistant Attorney General Alex Acosta’s Oct. 29, 2004 letter to District Judge Susan Dlott was unusual not just in that it attempted to offer legal cover for the same practices that 12 years earlier DOJ had sued to stop, but also because it was nearly unprecedented for DOJ to intervene in an election eve case in which it had not previously participated, its involvement was unsolicited, and it was not a party. (Acosta's letter was sent just a few days after then-U.S. Attorney Bradley Scholzman filed the now-infamous indictments against the four ACORN workers in Missouri.)

Judge Dlott refused to heed the advice of the Assistant Attorney General, found that permitting the challenges would have a racially discriminatory impact, and issued an order enjoining the Republican Party from placing challengers at the polls.[20] In the end, the caging scheme was stymied. (For a thorough discussion of other voter intimidation techniques that succeeded, see Preserving Democracy: What Went Wrong in Ohio, Status Report of the House Judiciary Committee Democratic Staff, January 5, 2005 [a.k.a. "the Conyers Report"].)

Pennsylvania 2004

The Pennsylvania GOP targeted for caging only voters in Philadelphia, which is approximately 45% black, according to Census data.[21] Voters in other parts of the state, which is 85% White,[22] were not caged.

The party compiled a caging list of 10,000 returns from a Republican mailing purporting to welcome new registrants in Philadelphia to the political process, and then announced plans to challenge those 10,000 voters on Election Day.[23] The Republican speaker of the state House admitted the campaign tactics were intended to "keep down" the vote in Philadelphia.[24]

As The Inquirer reported, "State Republicans released additional details yesterday from their list of 10,000 letters to Philadelphia voters that they said were returned as undeliverable. They said they would use this list to challenge voters at the polls today - a type of challenge similar to one that federal judges have barred Republicans from using today in Ohio." [25]

According to the Bucks County Courier Times:

"Election officials and other observers, however, say the 7.6 percent rate of returned letters isn't surprising in a large city with many transient, low-income neighborhoods. 'This is a mobile population,' said Randall Miller, who teaches a course on elections at St. Joseph's University. 'Some people are living in places where they don't really have addresses, [such as] shelters. They have every right to vote.'" [26]

When the media asked the GOP for the list, the party initially refused but later provided just six names and addresses.[27]

Wisconsin 2004

The Wisconsin Republican Party announced the Saturday before the 2004 election plans to challenge 37,180 voters on a caging list developed by the party.[28] The Wisconsin GOP targeted for caging only voters in Milwaukee, which is approximately 40% black and 55% minority (black and Hispanic), according to Census data.[29] Voters in all other parts of the state, which is 91% white, were not caged.

In this caging scheme, the party used a commercial software program to compare addresses on voter registration cards to a postal service database of known addresses, and then announced plans to challenge 37,180 voters at the polls whose addresses, the party claimed, didn't match.

The non-partisan City Attorney called the plan "outrageous." It was. Of the caged list, 13,300 of the addresses simply listed incorrect apartment numbers. Some 18,200 more cases stemmed from the lack of an apartment number for a resident of an existing building.[30]

Of the remaining 5,000 or so addresses, the City Attorney's office found hundreds actually did exist, and many of the other non-matches were likely due to clerical errors. Had the plan been allowed to go forward, thousands of legally-registered, apartment-dwelling black voters would have been challenged because of a clerical error involving apartment numbers. The attempt was stopped by the City Attorney and Election Commission.

"A Nationwide Vote Caging Scheme"

In Ohio, Florida, Wisconsin, Pennsylvania, and Nevada – all battleground states with significant minority populations living in urban communities – vote caging was the voter suppression method of choice for Republicans in 2004. It's no coincidence.

Despite the sworn declaration of Deputy RNC Chair Maria Cino that the RNC has not "been involved in any efforts to suppress voter turnout,"[31] e-mails circulated among top RNC and Bush-Cheney campaign officials suggest otherwise. A document for use by state GOP officials in developing campaign plans worked on by Bush-Cheney campaign lawyer Christopher Guith provides a template of plans for vote caging.[32]

An e-mail from Guith declares "we can do this in NV, FL, PA, and NM[33] because we have a list to run," referring to a plan to challenge absentee ballots using a caging list.[34] Terry Nelson, Political Director of the 2004 Bush/Cheney Campaign, was included on the e-mail.

Those who perpetrate these caging schemes know full well the invidiously racially discriminatory nature of their efforts, and make every effort to cover their tracks and distance themselves from the vote suppression schemes they unleash. Thus, in another e-mail chain involving the vote caging in Ohio later enjoined by a federal judge, Guith, Tim Griffin and others discuss "the risk of having GOP fingerprints" on the caging lists.[35]

Your State 2008 ?

As we enter what is sure to be another hotly contested, high stakes election cycle, there is reason to believe vote caging will once again be used illegally to suppress the black vote for partisan gain. The recommendations of the Conyers report on how to stop vote caging have yet to be heeded. The RNC has shown that federal consent decrees are inadequate to stop vote caging from again and again rearing its ugly head.

Unfortunately, those at the DOJ who failed to stop – and in some cases actually supported – the voter suppression of 2004 have not been held accountable.

Instead, they've been rewarded with promotions for their partisan misdeeds. Alex Acosta, the Assistant Attorney General who sent the letter to the Ohio federal judge in defense of the vote caging scheme there, was appointed in May 2005 to the post of U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of Florida – a past and possibly future site for voting rights controversies.

And the DOJ political appointee who likely drafted the letter to the Ohio federal court in support of the 2004 vote caging scheme, Hans von Spakovsky, has been nominated for the Federal Election Commission,[36] the agency charged with overseeing the fair administration of our election laws.

With the stakes in the upcoming 2008 elections being so high, it is likely that both major political parties will once again direct their efforts at combating alleged voter fraud (the GOP) and fighting alleged vote suppression schemes (the Democrats).

Given the politicization of the DOJ, it is highly unlikely that Americans will see efforts to bring an end to vote caging among the enforcement priorities of the Civil Rights Division. That's unfortunate because it means that once again the burden to put an end to these tactics will be on private litigants.

Congress can and should do something: hold hearings devoted exclusively to vote caging, bring in Party officials, and ask them under oath about these past efforts. Such hearings might have a chilling effect on those who were otherwise planning a new round of vote caging activities. Caging voters will continue to be a tool unless and until Congress exposes the tactic for what it is: an effort to influence the outcome of elections by suppressing the voting rights of minorities.

In addition, "Armed Madhouse" covers such subjects as the absurdly corrupt dispersal of the pork-barrel billions attending the War on Terror; and the Dueling Plans for Invading Iraq which competed for primacy before the attack date. One of these plans would have left the Iraqi Economy intact, having removed Saddam in a typical CIA-Sponsored Coup much like the one which installed him in the first place. That plan lost. Victorious in its place -- the plan of economic theft and infrastructure destruction which guaranteed the rise of the "insurgency" and has empowered the Corporate Feeding Frenzy favored by Halliburton et al -- a plan which essentially carved up the whole country and dished it out for consumption by non-Iraqis.

BOOK: Stealing Democracy

by Spencer Overton

Spencer Overton is a professor of law at George Washington University specializing in voting rights and campaign finance law.

This is the introduction to his book Stealing Democracy.

EXCERPT:

In the end the Party would announce that two and two made five, and you would have to believe it.

-George Orwell, Nineteen Eighty-Four

"I was amazed. . . . I wasn't prepared for it to be a good movie," Rick Clerici, a Massachusetts therapist, told the Boston Herald newspaper. "The Matrix reminded me of Huxley and Orwell in that vision of control over the larger reality. . . . We have some measure of control in our tiny personal lives but the larger reality is manipulated by far greater forces."

Clerici was not alone. In 1999, the movie took in more than $450 million worldwide, making it a huge hit for Warner Bros. Studios.

In The Matrix, thirty-something Thomas Anderson (Keanu Reeves) plods through life as a software programmer at the megacorporation Metacortex. Anderson often arrives late to his cubicle, weary from a late night of moonlighting as a computer hacker who operates under the alias "Neo." Neo intuitively suspects that something is amiss in the world. He can't put a finger on what's wrong, but the search for answers consumes him. Neo starts receiving cryptic messages via computer and telephone about "the Matrix" from a mysterious voice who calls himself Morpheus—played by Laurence Fishburne. As the story unfolds, Neo is guided to Morpheus.

In response to Neo's longing to learn the meaning of the Matrix, Morpheus explains:

It's that feeling you have had all your life. That feeling that something was wrong with the world. You don't know what it is but it's there, like a splinter in your mind, driving you mad, driving you to me. But what is it? . . . The Matrix is everywhere, it's all around us, here even in this room. You can see it out your window, or on your television. You feel it when you go to work, or go to church or pay your taxes. It is the world that has been pulled over your eyes to blind you from the truth.

Morpheus reveals that the date is approximately 2199, and that the 1999 life that Neo thought was reality is actually a computer-generated virtual experience. Most human beings, Morpheus reveals, are physically warehoused in stacks of gelatin cocoons filled with fluid and tended to by man-made artificial intelligence. The machines hard-wire the humans with a program to create what the humans perceive as their lives. This dreamscape is much more comfortable than reality. People in the Matrix casually dine on virtual steak, for example, while Morpheus and his band of rebels survive on bowls of slop that resembles cottage cheese.

Morpheus explains that the villain is not a single physical machine or entity, but instead "a neural-interactive simulation that we call the Matrix." The simulation placates most human minds into unquestioning acceptance of their captivity, while the parasitic machines drain energy from the encapsulated human bodies.

Morpheus leads a band of underground rebels and nurtures Neo's gifts to remake the Matrix and liberate humankind from its own creation. "[C]ontrol the Matrix," Morpheus explains to Neo, "and you control the future."

The Matrix's script drew from biblical texts, higher-level math, classic literature such as Alice in Wonderland, and Greek mythology. While the popularity of the movie arose in part from its action scenes, the theme of questioning invisible systems that control our lives also spoke to contemporary audiences.

"Many people these days are questioning the reality they have been socially conditioned to perceive," John Bates, a forty-three-year-old computer consultant who saw the film six times, told the Herald. The theme of questioning the systems that organize our "reality" also spoke to the actor who played Neo. "It starts with my character asking, 'What is the Matrix?' and from there you're asking, 'What is reality? What is around me?'" said Keanu Reeves. "The film also introduces themes of choice and what happens when you make choices. You can either learn about reality . . . or you can go on living in ignorance."

"The idea of The Matrix is that it's very easy to live an unexamined life," Matrix co-director Larry Wachowski explained. "It's not just computers; it's about anything you allow to think for you, systems of thought."

Most people have a relatively simple understanding of American democracy. Each person has a right called a "vote." A person casts the vote for a candidate. The candidates who receive the most votes win and make laws. Candidates win by supporting popular policies. "Free" citizens thus govern themselves.

But contrary to conventional perception, American democracy is not an organic, grassroots phenomenon that mirrors society's preferences. In reality, the will of the people is channeled by a predetermined matrix of thousands of election regulations and practices that most people accept as natural: the location of election-district boundaries, voter-registration deadlines, and the number of voting machines at a busy polling place. This structure of election rules, practices, and decisions filters out certain citizens from voting and organizes the electorate. There is no "right" to vote outside of the terms, conditions, hurdles, and boundaries set by the matrix.

Although most people are oblivious to the matrix, it has very real consequences. In our closely divided political environment, even an obscure election rule in a single state can determine who sits in the White House or which party controls Congress.

Collectively, the various rules and practices result in a class of politicians that control various aspects of Americans' lives, such as the number of students in a second-grade classroom in Detroit, the level of mercury in the air we breathe, and the matter of whether a student in the Army Reserve will sleep in his University of Iowa dormitory or in a barracks in Baghdad, Iraq. And because the United States is a military and financial superpower, the matrix affects not just Americans but also hundreds of millions of humans around the globe.

The matrix is not a grand conspiracy orchestrated by a single mastermind. Instead, it is a collection of ever-changing rules and practices employed by various partisans and bureaucrats that converge to shape who goes to the polls and which votes are counted. Although no single individual is in control, some enjoy more influence, such as legislators who draft election law, secretaries of state, election commissioners, county election boards, poll challengers, and poll workers. These individuals justify their actions using seemingly innocuous terms like "budgetary constraints," "states' rights," "administrative convenience," or "prevention of fraud."

But whatever the stated reason, their decisions often exclude particular voters, enhance the power of certain politicians, and advance specific policy preferences. This is a critical moment for American democracy. Evolved technology -- which can process each voter's address, race, gender, political affiliation, and likelihood of voting -- enhances politicians' ability to tailor election-district boundaries to include voters who favor them, purge selected voters from registration rolls, and manipulate the matrix in other ways.

Cash-strapped municipalities and states hesitate to spend limited tax dollars on better voting machines or more staffing at polls, while better-heeled counties have the resources to ensure that every one of their votes gets counted. An influx of immigrant populations from Latin America and Asia threatens the political status quo in certain communities across the nation, but bilingual ballots and translators are often not provided. Efforts by the United States to promote democracy abroad are compromised by the fact that our political process falls short at home. At this pivotal juncture we should not accept the matrix passively, but question it.

There is no way to eliminate the matrix completely. Voting requires ground rules. But we can remake the matrix so that it more fairly empowers all voters rather than simply privileging the insiders who know how to manipulate it.

America's founders divided government power among executive, legislative, and judicial branches in order to prevent abuses. By manipulating election rules and tolerating election flaws, however, politicians weaken the most effective check on government abuse -- the people.

Rather than obscure the matrix with the soundbites of self-interested political insiders or the dry jargon of academic elites, this book uses real-life stories to show how the matrix affects all Americans.

Chapter 1 shows how the fox too often guards the henhouse in American politics. Incumbent politicians draw the boundaries of their own election districts to ensure that they cannot lose an election, and partisan secretaries of state feign neutrality in administering elections but issue decisions that too often follow the party line. Chapter 2 explains how local control allows for unequal and underfunded elections, as well as partisan manipulation that excludes voters.

Chapter 3 grapples with the provocative question of whether race still matters in twenty-first-century American politics. Chapter 4 explains the continued need for provisions of the federal Voting Rights Act that ensure that changes to voting rules made by state and local politicians are not discriminatory. In response to English-only advocates' attacks on bilingual ballots, chapter 5 explains the need to make voting accessible to all citizens.

Chapter 6 describes an emerging antifraud movement that proposes measures such as photo-ID requirements, which threaten to exclude many more legitimate voters than fraudulent ones. The book concludes by focusing on a few average Americans who -- despite the demands of business and family -- make time to work on democratic reforms in their community.

Americans are not inevitably destined to a fate in which a narrow class of political elites controls the matrix. Change is possible. This book is a road map for bringing the power of the vote back into our hands.

INTERVIEW: Greg Palast, Author of Armed Madhouse,

Interviewed by Mark Karlin, for BUZZFLASH:

BuzzFlash: You're having incredible success with the new expanded paperback edition of Armed Madhouse: From Baghdad to New Orleans -- Sordid Secrets and Strange Tales of a White House Gone Wild. Of course, the electronic voting machines and how they function is a very significant issue, but your specialty has really been how the Bush/Rove GOP political machine keeps persons who are likely to vote Democratic or Independent from voting.

Greg Palast: Yes. People ask me: Are they going to steal the 2008 election? No, they've already stolen the 2008 election. We still have a chance of swiping it back, but the reason I've expanded and put out the new edition of Armed Madhouse is to tell you how they will steal in 2008, and what to do about it. That's one of the main new things. Plus a special chapter on New Orleans and my bust down there.

Of course, I was very flattered that the first review of the new edition of Armed Madhouse was written by Karl Rove and the Rove-bots -- it was subpoenaed by the House Judiciary Committee -- I can't make this up. On February 7th, the Rove team, which had been writing several e-mails screaming about Armed Madhouse and "that British reporter," Greg Palast, were gloating that no U.S. media had picked up my stories. And they had a .pdf file attached.

Of course, the reason my book was subpoenaed is that it has to do with the US prosecutor firings. The prosecutor firings were 100% about influencing elections -- not about loyalty to Bush, which is what The New York Times wrote. The administration team couldn't tolerate appointees who wouldn't go along with crime.

In the book I present the evidence that Karl Rove directed a guy named Tim Griffin to target suppressing the votes of African American students, homeless men, and soldiers. Nice guy. They actually challenged the votes and successfully removed tens of thousands of legal voters from the voter rolls, same as they did in 2000. But instead of calling them felons, they said that they had suspect addresses.

BuzzFlash: In which election cycle?

Greg Palast: 2004. And in 2006 and 2004, they challenged tens of thousands of black soldiers. They stopped their votes from being counted when they were mailed in from Baghdad. Go to Baghdad and lose your vote -- mission accomplished.

BuzzFlash: How did they do that?

Greg Palast: By sending letters to the homes of soldiers, marked "do not forward." When they came back undelivered, they said: Aha! Illegal voter registered from a false address. And when their ballot came in from Fallujah, it was challenged. The soldier didn't know it. Their vote was lost. Over half a million votes were challenged and lost by the Republicans -- absentee ballots. Three million voters who went to the polls found themselves challenged by the Republicans. This was not a small operation. It was a multi-million dollar, wholesale theft operation.

They're right that I'm a British reporter, because I put this story on British TV, not on American TV, which won't touch it. [BuzzFlash note: Palast writes for British papers and reports on the BBC, but he is a product of the San Fernando Valley and the University of Chicago, 100% American.] But our election was a complete, total fraud. This is grand theft -- no question. It's not a dirty trick; it's a felony crime.

I'm working with Bobby Kennedy, who is a voting rights attorney. He said, "This is not just an icky, horrible thing that people do wearing white sheets. This is a felony crime." [paraphrase] And the guy they put in charge of this criminal ring to knock out voters is a guy named Tim Griffin. Today, Tim Griffin is -- badda-bing -- U.S. Attorney for Arkansas. When they fired the honest guys, they put in the Rove-bots to fix the 2008 election. That's what I'm saying -- it's already being stolen, as we speak. Tim Griffin is the perpetrator who's become the prosecutor, and that's what's going down right now.

BuzzFlash: You have been questioned about prosecutor-gate and about the theft of the election of 2008. But these replacement prosecutors are still in place, not to mention the ones who have cooperated with Bush. Gonzales has basically told the House Judiciary Committee, make my day. I'm staying on. It's over with. You asked me questions. I didn't give you answers, but you don't have the courage to impeach me, so I'm staying.

Greg Palast: That's the game, too. Congress is shooting at the glove puppet. I shoot at the puppeteers. It's not Gonzales. He's meaningless. He's a nothing. He should go because he allowed it to happen, and that's a crime. When I was a racketeering investigator, we used to call it "willful failure to know." He can't just say to his staff, I know what Rove is doing, but don't tell me about it. He would still be liable for criminal conspiracy of obstruction of justice. That's why Monica Goodling took the Fifth. Not knowing doesn't mean you're not guilty, especially when you went out of your way not to know.

Gonzales should be read his rights and carted away. But it's the puppeteers behind him -- Rove and Harriet Miers -- who were deeply involved in the prosecutor hits. No one's talking about her. This is the woman who went from head of the Texas State Lottery to nomination to the U.S. Supreme Court by George Bush, and no one asked how that happened. They said: Harriet who? But they didn't ask how that happened. They said, oh, she's loyal to Bush. She's the one who did the payoffs to cover up the fact that George Senior got George Junior out of the war in Vietnam. Do you think that that was done just by daddy making a call? Money had to be paid -- lots and lots of money to keep people quiet -- $23 million. That is something I reported on BBC Television and in the Guardian newspaper. We've given them plenty of time to challenge that story about the payoffs. We've never gotten a peep from these guys. And unlike CBS, the BBC has not withdrawn the story that the fix was put in to get Chicken George out of Vietnam. No one has challenged our story, nor have we withdrawn a comment on our story that the payoffs were made to keep it quiet.

BuzzFlash: Let's focus for the moment on voter suppression, and we'll return later to other elements of the voter manipulation story.

Greg Palast: I have it all in Armed Madhouse, including in the three new chapters. First and foremost, is that it's not one thing. It ain't just electronic voting, guys. You go, oh, we have paper ballots, we're saved, we're saved. Bulls! Wake up! Hello! Let's remember that in Florida and Ohio, they didn't have computer voting. So all the stuff about Diebold -- Ohio was not stolen by computers, because they didn't have computers there. In fact, they were thrilled when people complained about computers because they could keep the junky punch cards in. That doesn't mean that computers are safe. As I point out in the new chapter, the Republicans held on to Katherine Harris' seat -- and we don't want to think too carefully about that image -- they held onto Katherine Harris' seat with 300 votes, while 18,000 votes disappeared in the computers. So they do use computers. That was a pure, straight-up, shoplift of the Congressional seat.

BuzzFlash: A House committee just voted not to pursue an investigation of that election, despite the disappearance of 18,000 votes.

Greg Palast: That's sick -- deeply, deviously sick. First of all, in New York and other states, when votes are in question, they simply redo them. People talk about recount -- forget it. Redo the vote. When the machines collapse, then there's no question that there was monkey business.

BuzzFlash: Then why do you think --

Greg Palast: -- why don't Democrats stand up?

BuzzFlash: The U.S. House of Representatives is controlled by Democrats. It's like saying, well, $320 million is missing from a bank but we're not going to investigate that.

Greg Palast: You're forgetting it's not about the two parties. Vote theft is mainly a racial issue in America, and it's a class issue. The white caucus is a lot bigger than the black caucus. They don't call the Congress a millionaire's club for nothing. There aren't many guys in there -- or women -- who are not millionaires. So it's the millionaires versus us. It's the white caucus versus the black caucus, which is of great concern. So the vote is along racial class and economic lines, not along party lines. Party lines are pretty much meaningless. There's pretty much one party -- the party of the cash. But I'm not one of these people that says there's no difference between the Democratic and Republican Party. The question is: is the difference meaningful? That's all. When it comes down to voter issues, remember that the Democrats in power there were elected under the racist, broken, classist system. If you fix the voting system, a third of those Democrats could never win a primary. The last thing that they want is poor people to vote.

BuzzFlash: Let's go back to your tremendous work in the 2000 election.

Greg Palast: In that case, Katherine Harris and Jeb Bush targeted 97,000 registered voters, as it turned out, to remove from the voter rolls on the grounds that they were criminals. They were "guilty of voting black." By the way, of out of the 97,000 people, do you know how many they charged with actually voting illegally? Of the 97,000 names that they had? Zero. They looked at six cases and brought no charges. There were only six suspected cases, out of 97,000. That's how sick that was. And the U.S. press -- Fox TV -- said not one voter was wrongly disenfranchised. In Armed Madhouse, I have the little weasel on Fox who said that, next to the picture of one of the disenfranchised voters, a Gulf War veteran. They love to take out veterans, because who do you think is in the armed forces? A whole lot of war veterans lost their vote because they happened to have -- as part of the legacy of slavery -- names that are the same as someone who, maybe fifty years before, got convicted of something.

BuzzFlash: We just want to praise you again to the readers. We've seen you present a number of times, and several years ago, in Chicago, you did a presentation that shows the list that was used to disenfranchise voters.

Greg Palast: Those are the purge lists. For 2004, we have the caging lists. And in 2008, we're going to have what's called the verification list.

BuzzFlash: Meaning the return of the Jim Crow laws, I assume?

Greg Palast: When I say the 2008 race has already been stolen, about a million and a half voter registrations have been turned down. Even though there have been massive voter registration drives among Hispanics and African Americans, as the churches fill up the bucket, there's a hole in the bucket where the registrations are being dumped.

It used to be that you signed your name -- bang, you got through, you're registered. Not anymore. About 40% of the registrations are being rejected on the grounds that they don't match citizenship files. Well, you know what? It ain't the Soviet Union. We don't have citizenship files in the United States. They don't exist. They can't exist under the law, which is the U.S. Constitution.

So how do you verify voters? Well, you don't. About the only thing that could happen is if you require a passport -- and who has passports?

BuzzFlash: This is not conjecture on your part. You're very methodical.

Greg Palast: We've got the documents. We ain't guessing. When I say they had caging lists targeting innocent black soldiers, I have the lists. I have the soldiers' names. We spoke to their families. In fact, interestingly, "60 Minutes" came into our office and said, "My God, to prove what these caging lists are, you're going to have to make hundreds of calls and spend hundreds of hours going through this stuff." And we said, "Yeah, it's reporting. Try it. It won't hurt you."

BuzzFlash: You go back again to Florida and Choice Point, and you have excellent video documentation of the confrontations with Choice Point.

Greg Palast: Yes.

BuzzFlash: The Secretary of State's office, meaning Katherine Harris' office, no doubt at the request of Jeb Bush and the Bush campaign, chose to expand, rather than limit, the list.

Greg Palast: After they were done bleaching the voter rolls of Florida white -- yes, they wrote some memos to cover their ass. They knew exactly what was happening. These guys were guilty as sin. They should be in prison. But it's all right. Their CEO may be in trouble now. He may still yet be cuffed because of allegations of insider trading. The Choice Point people are back in Armed Madhouse for a very good reason. It's that after they bleached the voter rolls white for the Bush family, they were paid off by no-bid contracts for the war on terror. They're the guys who are keeping these KGB lists for the government, because the government is not allowed to keep information files on citizens. It's against the Constitution.

But somehow Bush has decided that if he contracts it out to his cronies, that there's kind of a contracting out exception to the Constitution. So he gives it out to Choice Point. Well, do we want this private KGB earning billions? And what else do they do with the information? Well, first of all, they're in the info biz. They are using it -- they sell this stuff. And in fact, they got caught selling at least 145,000 records to identity thieves.

Another problem with using private contractors, of course, is that these private guys don't have any of the requirements that the government does to be accurate, to produce the information under the Freedom of Information Act. These guys can ream you. And they do. Some people say, well, it's worth it if they keep us safe. Well, I was charged by the Department of Homeland Security with violating the anti-terror laws -- me. Probably I was caught doing investigative reporting in the United States.

BuzzFlash: In New Orleans, right?

Greg Palast: Yes, that was in New Orleans. While I was charged, I was afraid I wouldn't get home, because I'd be on a watch list. And then, I'd be more afraid when I got home. So, I mean, I'm still wearing my fedora. And these are the guys who are supposed to be saving us from Osama. And as I point out in the book, I have lists of several six-month-old children who are on the terrorism watch list. You can never start too young, I suppose. Maybe they'll open up a kind of kindergarten at Guantanamo.

BuzzFlash: People have to read Armed Madhouse and your other articles. They need to go to your site, gregpalast.com. Because you are the expert on what is basically a RICO case to undermine the American electoral and voting system in a comprehensive way from several different angles, as masterminded by Karl Rove and other people in the Republican Party. What you have exposed is, in essence --

Greg Palast: A criminal conspiracy, according to Bobby Kennedy. The BBC requires me to work with lawyers so that I don't just shoot my mouth off on legal stuff. And Bobby Kennedy, Jr., is a law professor and an expert on voting rights law. And his father gave his life for voting rights, too, don't forget.

Bobby Kennedy says that what we have here is a criminal conspiracy to commit felony manipulation of the voter system. It violates endless numbers of laws.

These people really need to be not in office, but in prison. He's not a guy given to much excitement, but when he looked at the evidence in Armed Madhouse, he just flipped. And what's driving him crazy as well is that Karl Rove is right. The U.S. media is not picking up the investigation.

BuzzFlash: That's why I want to say that people should read your book and follow your website and your articles.

Greg Palast: They should stay on with BuzzFlash because, yes, a lot of my stuff will eventually get picked up by the U.S. media. They may say "there are accusations within the blogosphere," because it's on BuzzFlash. But, of course, this started out with a massive, high-level investigation for the BBC Television network. I'm proud to give it to BuzzFlash because we sure as hell ain't getting it into the Washington Pravda Post. We aren't getting into the New York Judith Miller Times. And I'm glad to say that you're growing and they're dying, and that's the way it ought to be.

BuzzFlash: It is such a massive assault on the voting system and felony suppression of rights in many ways, as we've pointed out. They're coming at it from all angles. For instance, in prosecutor-gate, they're using prosecutors to kind of gin up accusations of voter fraud that don't exist just to win elections. And then when the elections are over, they get Republicans and state legislatures to cry, oh, that was terrible, even though nothing was ever prosecuted. We need new Jim Crow voter laws to keep people who shouldn't vote from voting, to prevent fraud that never existed.

Greg Palast: Right now, I'm following up with another story that involves prosecutor-gate. I'm speaking to one of the fired prosecutors' offices -- David Iglesias. Rove had this whole scheme. While he's stealing votes with both hands -- I mean, literally -- he is, at the same time, coming up with this scheme to accuse Democrats of registering illegal aliens and encouraging massive voter ID theft. It's a complete goofy scheme. And what they did is try to involve the U.S. attorneys in bringing prosecution. For example, in New Mexico, they wanted David Iglesias. Rove's people told me that. Rove's people claimed that there were 150 cases of voter ID theft in New Mexico. And I said, "Well, then send them to me." And they said, "Well."

It's in the book. And they said, "Well, David Iglesias, the U.S. attorney, will back us up." So I called his office. And they refused to back it up. They said, "Well, we don't really have an open investigation on this."

I said, "In other words, you can't back up this story." They said, "Well, I guess you could say that." I said, "I guess I will." In other words, they fabricated the evidence and they wanted him to bring a phony prosecution -- like a Stalin trial. Pick out a couple Mexicans and say that they were voting illegally, and then we'll disappear.

But you know what? Iglesias wouldn't do it. He and eight prosecutors drew a line in the sand.

Iglesias, you have to understand, is a right-wing Ashcroft protégé Republican, and he turned away from evidence of the Republicans stealing the election in New Mexico, which they did in 2004. He wouldn't bust the Rove-arians there. But he wouldn't go so far as to actually bring false prosecutions. He wouldn't do it.

He has now said the evidence they gave him is bogus. Not that he didn't try. He had the FBI on these cases. They had the state attorney general on these cases, hoping to give them one prosecution in the entire state. They couldn't find one. And he said he wasn't going to just cuff some poor Mexican-American and charge him with voter fraud because Karl Rove ordered him to.

And by the way, Karl Rove flew to New Mexico. The Capo himself flew to New Mexico to give a kiss on each cheek to the doomed prosecutor. And speak to the local guys ordering his execution. Rove went to New Mexico himself to do the hit. It was bring prosecutions against Mexican Americans, or look for a job -- and let's not forget Iglesias' last name, okay?

BuzzFlash: Now let's focus on one individual who stands above all the prosecutors in terms of suppressing the right to vote through fraudulent strategies.

Greg Palast: A lot of competition there, but I think we have a winner.

BuzzFlash: You've written about "The Talented Mr. Griffin," Arkansas' new U.S. attorney, who has a history of suppressing minority voters. So how does Tim Griffin, a Rove protégé, Rove hit man, Rove op and research man, Rove suppression and voter man, end up in one of the disputed districts?

Greg Palast: Because the Democrats have no cojones. I'm going to tell you something very unhappy, okay? Again, it's the white caucus versus the black caucus. It's not Democrats versus Republicans. I talked to the black caucus. John Conyers, head of Judiciary on the House side, is very upset that you have a criminal who knocked black soldiers off the voter rolls as the U.S. attorney in Arkansas. The white caucus leader on the Senate side, is Patrick Leahy. His people said, well, Griffin is just there as an interim appointment, so big deal. Well, he's interim through the 2008 election. In fact, I have another e-mail from inside the Rovian office which said if the Democrats complain, just say that Griffin is interim.

BuzzFlash: The press fell for this, and Democrats fell for this, too. They won't seek Senate appointment, and everyone went, oh, you see? They're conceding that they wouldn't get it. But it didn't matter because that was the whole scheme. They are in place for 2008. Rove won.

Greg Palast: Oh, it's okay because he's only in there for two years. It's through the election. Like I say, this is not about Democrats versus Republicans. What you just saw was the millionaires white boys' club -- versus the black caucus. And that's what it's all about. America has an apartheid electoral system and an apartheid Congress. And it's about time we call it what it is.

BuzzFlash: How does the amazing Tim Griffin represent what really is the goal? As you just pointed out, it's very important. The Democrats in Congress seem to have forgotten this in not calling for the impeachment of Gonzales.

Greg Palast: If the prosecutors are wrongfully fired, what you do in any wrongful dismissal is you hire them back. Why don't we have one Democrat saying put them back? Crazy.

BuzzFlash: Basically if you're Karl Rove and you're sitting there, you feel you've survived everything. And you say I'll survive this one. The people I've put in place to steal the 2008 election are gonna still be there.

Greg Palast: My boys count the votes.

BuzzFlash: Let's look at Mr. Griffin, who's one of those who's in place and will be there until 2008. They went around the senior Democratic senator from Arkansas, Mark Pryor. There's all sorts of e-mails indicating how they played Pryor.

Greg Palast: The Republicans proved their point. They can break the law. They can put a criminal in as U.S. prosecutor. They can break every rule of the Senate by going around -- remember, it's not just senatorial privilege, it's called voter privilege. The people of Arkansas elected Senator Pryor. One of the things that they elected him to do is approve the U.S. attorney for his area. We call that democracy.

BuzzFlash: Why is Griffin particularly emblematic of the reason that most of these eight were being replaced? Either to muddy up Democrats --

Greg Palast: I think that muddying the Democrats is secondary. It's that he is the guy in charge of the caging list operation. He's the guy who knocked off tens of thousands -- and it may go up to hundreds of thousands -- of Democratic voters, mostly minorities. That was his operation. And that is why he is particularly evil, manipulative; and plus, if he can get away with it and then get this appointment without any Democrat raising their voice, then what do you think he's going to do in office? In other words, if he could get away with what he did, and the Democrats don't complain, and they basically piss all over the Democrats and Senator Pryor says that's all right with me, and Patrick Leahy says that's all right with me, then obviously, what's he going to do once he's in office? Take my word for it, he's going to wipe out the black voters of Arkansas.

And I smell a deal, by the way -- and now I'm speculating. Everyone keeps saying he's been put in Arkansas so he can do investigation of Hillary Clinton. He's not going to do that. The deal's been cut. Why do you think that he's allowed to be there? Because the deal has been cut. We'll put in Timmy, but he's not going to touch Hillary. I've seen this before. There was a deal cut between the Democrats and Republicans back in the late nineties. The Republican, Newt Gingrich, was going to be in big legal trouble. So was Hillary Clinton. They traded. I smell a trade right here. Why would you allow a complete dirt bag, felon, criminal, racist scum spider in as U.S. prosecutor in Arkansas, in Hillary Clinton's state, unless the deal was cut that Hillary is off limits to any investigation or grand jury charges?

BuzzFlash: Now we've got Griffin, specialist in violating the Voting Rights Act. In Arkansas, we have other people who were appointed who are willing to go on with the scheme to suppress the vote and then have states pass Jim Crow-type laws and Republican legislators. There probably are other prosecutors who weren't replaced who are willing to go along with this scheme in key states. Otherwise, they would have been replaced. There also have been bogus claims of violation of registration of voters on Native American reservations.

Greg Palast: There is a litany of fake charges. In the new Armed Madhouse, I have Russell Pearce, a Republican legislator from Arizona, who said five million illegal aliens crossed the border to vote for Democrats -- five million. I asked this fruitcake to give me five names. I said, "If they voted, that means that you have their names. You have their registrations. So why aren't you arresting them?" And that's when I began to smell the Rove plan. He said, "Oh, the U.S. attorneys are going to arrest them." But there was not one case brought in New Mexico by the honest attorney. Not one case where there's an honest U.S. attorney. And by the way, they did find about a half dozen illegal aliens who had registered to vote in Arizona. They were registered by the Republican Party.

BuzzFlash: You've shown an arc from 2000 up through 2008. Again, we want to emphasize for the umpteenth time in this interview, that despite all this "investigation" of Gonzales, the status quo remains. These U.S. attorneys were replaced, and "interim" attorneys are still functioning on behalf of Gonzales and Rove. Nothing has been done to inhibit or curtail their activity, which can result in the theft of the election in 2008. And what's more, no one is even speaking about investigating the patterns of behavior in suppressing votes by those who weren't replaced.

Greg Palast: But there were cases brought against voters in Missouri. One of the new prosecutors, who came in after they fired the honest guy who said that there were no cases here -- the Rove-bot came in and actually brought charges in Missouri. Illegal voters, illegal voters, illegal voters -- nothing in the papers about the fact that every single case -- every single one -- was dismissed by judges. The judge says, you're kidding, right? You know, you're talking about things like someone being arrested for voting twice as Juan Gonzalez. How many guys named Juan Gonzalez there are in a state? They knew. These were fraudulent cases. And when you bring a fraudulent case, you go to jail. This is what the RICO laws were about, and the Civil Rights Act of '64, and the Voting Rights Act of '65. It used to be the Democratic officials in the South that teamed up with the Ku Klux Klan to bring false cases. Well, they're back, but the white sheets have switched parties.

BuzzFlash: You've laid it right out on the table in Congress, this abuse of power, the suppression of voting rights. Why then is the mainstream media ignoring what is clearly a multi-year strategy to commit felonies?

Greg Palast: Two reasons. The victims are the poor, and the victims are the defenseless. The victims are black soldiers. There's a whole section of New Orleans -- these are people that are off the radar. Do you think Obama gives a flying toot about someone living in a mobile home for a year and a half in New Orleans? Nah. They're not voters. They're not going to let them vote, so he doesn't care.

And it's a class issue. It's a class war issue, and it's tainted by race, too. Let's not forget that. When I talk about voter suppression in 2000, it was a race issue. It was a story about black people. If they had removed people from country clubs off the voter rolls -- baby, you'd hear it. In fact, let's remember that the only vote manipulation story that got any play at all in 2000 was in Palm Beach. Because imagine -- rich people didn't have their votes counted correctly. All the reporters are down there, taking pictures of voters in string bikinis. And we're down the road in Gadsden County, the blackest, poorest county in Florida where the big vote theft was done -- not one single camera.

Okay, except for Ted Koppel who went down there and said these poor black people -- they're just too stupid to figure out the ballot, you know? And Koppel didn't even check on the fact that they had busted machines. But it was very easy to say black people are too stupid to figure out how to vote. You have to understand, the racism within U.S. papers is absolutely unbelievable. There is an assumption that black people are stupid, incompetent and lazy.

BuzzFlash: Where do we stand today? Gonzales appeared before Conyers' committee, I believe, and Conyers was, of course in a huff, as he should be, because he's a righteous man. He sees the plot.

Greg Palast: Again, he knows what's happening. I'm in contact with his office. He's worked on a lot of investigations with me. It's like the man is the entire conscience of the U.S. Congress.

BuzzFlash: Along with Henry Waxman. Let's give him at least some credit here.

Greg Palast: Waxman is fantastic. Of course, you can't separate New Orleans and voting, Iraq and voting, the war on terror and voting -- it's all the same crew playing the same games. And there's not only votes being lost, but blood being spilled. Of course, the book has a lot of funny stuff in it, because it's so grim it's humorous. It's like a comic horror show. My friend calls it the clown-ocracy, because these are armed and dangerous jesters.

BuzzFlash: So where do we stand? Right now, we have these replacement prosecutors, and the prosecutors who weren't replaced -- some of whom went along with this voter suppression plan and rewriting state laws into Jim Crow laws. We have electronic voting machines. We have a vast scheme here. But the mainstream media is playing the story that Gonzales is going to survive this because they don't have any more goods on him.

Greg Palast: It's a Punch and Judy show. It's all about Gonzales. He's the glove puppet. How come they aren't bringing Rove up? And remember that Conyers cannot just call Rove by himself. He needs the power of the other Democrats who have to find their soul and find their balls. They haven't grown back yet, despite the election of 2006.

BuzzFlash: Is there anyone else on the national scene in the media, in politics, beyond Conyers and Waxman, who understands that the Bush Administration is still trying to extend unitary, executive authority, as it did a couple of weeks ago, trying to extend wireless taps, spying power, and domestic surveillance? They are not doing this with the intention that a Democrat may then end up in the presidency with expanded powers. Their intention is that the Republicans are going to hold on to the White House. To have that expectation, they must have inside knowledge about how they're going to manipulate the election.

Greg Palast: The new chapter, called "The Theft of 2008," calculates with, I think, some reasoned accuracy, that four and a half million votes are going to be shoplifted. Get ready for it. That doesn't mean that they will own the White House. It just means that they start with a big old thumb on the electoral scale.

We should scream bloody murder. But the whining is not a help, you know. It only takes five million more votes. I say work with Jessie Jackson on this. If they're going to knock out 40% of the registrations, then overwhelm them with more. If they're going to throw away half the soldiers' votes, then you better make sure that more of them vote, and that you're watching it. Yes, try to change the laws. And when you can't, you better protect yourself.

Don't mail in your ballot. Don't go posting, fools. You know, everyone's concerned about the electronic voting. So, do you think that they're going to go through all this hassle to manipulate the software, but then politely take your vote that you sent through the mail, open it up, and count it correctly? Really? If you believe that, then you deserve not to have your vote counted.

BuzzFlash: One of your contentions, and it's an important one, concerns the proprietary software issue, and the likelihood that votes have been lost through it. Certainly the Sarasota incident of 18,000 lost votes gives one pause.

Greg Palast: They want you to think that there's one problem, which is electronic voting and paper ballots. By the way, that's also racial. You talk to white voter activists, they talk about computers. You talk to black voter activists, and they talk about suppressing the vote.

I want to repeat: There were virtually no computer voting machines in Ohio, and that's where they stole it. There were virtually no computer voting machines in New Mexico. That's where they stole it. There were virtually no computer voting machines in Florida in 2000. That's where they stole it.

It's not the computer voting machines. Yes, they're evil. They are wrong, they are manipulative, they are hack-prone, and they stole the election through computers in Sarasota and elsewhere in the last election. By the way, Jeb Bush got reelected as governor through manipulation of the new electronic voting machines. So, yes, they are a problem. But if you think that's it, baby, they've got you.

So let me explain. Start thinking like a Hispanic or black voter who's trying to get to the polls, and they ask you for your ID.

BuzzFlash: I believe in Arizona now it's a birth certificate.

Greg Palast: You can't use a driver's license, because an alien can get a driver's license. So, you can use a birth certificate -- certified original -- or a passport. And what people have passports?

Now, again, it's a class issue. After all, Andy Young and Vernon Jordan and Bill Richardson are all for voter ID, okay? Because at their country club, they have plenty of IDs and they can always vote because their chauffeur can vouch for them.

Every time you have a new question or a way to challenge a voter, they will use it. They will abuse it. Three million voters were given provisional ballots. If you're reading this and you're white, you don't know what a provisional ballot is. If you're reading this and you're black, you were the ones that got one. It's that simple. We have one ballot for black folk, one ballot for white folk. And the black ballot is a provisional ballot and it does not get counted. And that's how it was coming down in the United States of America.

So it's time that the apartheid within the voter protection movement in America -- white voters better start thinking about the need to protect the black vote, because your vote ain't safe if it gets canceled out by Karl Rove when they take away a Hispanic voter's right to vote. You can have a nice, neat paper ballot they will count, but they're laughing at you because they just purged fifteen Hispanics.

BuzzFlash: In your presentations, you often bring up the figure of millions of votes that are stolen before the election was even open.

Greg Palast: That's right. Because people are being thrown off the voter rolls. In addition, the one thing that we're constantly forgetting is that, while there's this endless discussion of how they can hack the votes that turn you to vote from Democratic to Republican, there's very, very little evidence of it. It's there -- I don't doubt it. But we're not going to find it.

But one thing we know for damn sure is that they have to do something simple. The machines simply don't work and don't record the vote. And then there's no fingerprints. There's no manipulation. It just didn't work. We had a million and a half votes in the 2006 election which just disappeared because machines didn't work. And now you try to prove that it was deliberate.

All you have to do is look at where they didn't work. In places like New Mexico, 88% in minority areas -- 88% in minority areas. You want to know how Diebold might have fixed the election in Cynthia McKinney's district? Their machines don't work in humidity. What do you have in July in Atlanta but humidity? In the poor areas. In the rich areas, they're in air conditioned gymnasiums. That's the games that they play. And the way that you figure it out is, you stop thinking white, and you start thinking slave.

BuzzFlash: Greg. Thank you so much.

Greg Palast: You guys are the best.

THE TRUTH ABOUT VOTER FRAUD

by Justin Levitt

Brennan Center for Justice at New York University School of Law

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Justin Levitt is counsel for the Democracy Program at the Brennan Center for Justice, working on election administration, redistricting, and other voting rights concerns. Before he joined the Center, Mr. Levitt served as in-house counsel to America Coming Together, the largest voter mobilization campaign in history, and as Director of Strategic Targeting for a national presidential campaign. He is the author of Making the List: Database Matching and Verification Processes for Voter Registration (Brennan Center 2006), and a number of other scholarly and popular publications on election law.

The Truth About Voter Fraud

I. Introduction

Allegations of election-related fraud make for enticing press. Many Americans remember vivid stories of voting improprieties in Chicagoland, or the suspiciously sudden appearance of LBJ's alphabetized ballot box in Texas, or Governor Earl Long's quip: "When I die, I want to be buried in Louisiana, so I can stay active in politics." Voter fraud, in particular, has the feel of a bank heist caper: roundly condemned but technically fascinating, and sufficiently lurid to grab and hold headlines.

Perhaps because these stories are dramatic, voter fraud makes a popular scapegoat. In the aftermath of a close election, losing candidates are often quick to blame voter fraud for the results. Legislators cite voter fraud as justification for various new restrictions on the exercise of the franchise. And pundits trot out the same few anecdotes time and again as proof that a wave of fraud is imminent.

Allegations of widespread voter fraud, however, often prove greatly exaggerated. It is easy to grab headlines with a lurid claim (“Tens of thousands may be voting illegally!”); the follow-up — when any exists — is not usually deemed newsworthy. Yet on closer examination, many of the claims of voter fraud amount to a great deal of smoke without much fire. The allegations simply do not pan out.

These inflated claims are not harmless. Crying “wolf” when the allegations are unsubstantiated distracts attention from real problems that need real solutions. If we can move beyond the fixation on voter fraud, we will be able to focus on the real changes our elections need, from universal registration all the way down to sufficient parking at the poll site.

Moreover, these claims of voter fraud are frequently used to justify policies that do not solve the alleged wrongs, but that could well disenfranchise legitimate voters. Overly restrictive identification requirements for voters at the polls — which address a sort of voter fraud more rare than death by lightning — is only the most prominent example.

The Brennan Center for Justice at NYU School of Law carefully examines allegations of fraud to get at the truth behind the claims. The Brennan Center has analyzed purported fraud cited by state and federal courts; multipartisan and bipartisan federal commissions; political party entities; state and local election officials; and authors, journalists, and bloggers. Usually, only a tiny portion of the claimed illegality is substantiated — and most of the remainder is either nothing more than speculation or has been conclusively debunked. This paper seeks to distill our findings: the truth about voter fraud. It first offers a straightforward definition to avoid the common trap of discussing election irregularities that involve neither voters nor fraud as if they showed voter fraud. It then discusses different alternative reasons more credible than voter fraud to explain many of the recurring allegations. The paper then analyzes, scenario by scenario, some of the more common types of alleged voter fraud and their more likely causes and policy solutions. Finally, the paper presents individual case studies of notorious instances of alleged voter fraud, and finds those allegations to be grossly inflated. For more information, analysis, and opinion about voter fraud, by the Brennan Center and others, please see www.truthaboutfraud.org.

II. What Is Voter Fraud?

“Voter fraud” is fraud by voters.

More precisely, “voter fraud” occurs when individuals cast ballots despite knowing that they are ineligible to vote, in an attempt to defraud the election system.¹

This sounds straightforward. And yet, voter fraud is often conflated, intentionally or unintentionally, with other forms of election misconduct or irregularities.

There are many such problems that are improperly lumped under the umbrella of “voter fraud.” Some result from technological glitches, whether sinister or benign: for example, voting machines may record inaccurate tallies due to fraud, user error, or technical malfunction.² Some result from honest mistakes by election officials or voters: for example, a person with a conviction may honestly believe herself eligible to vote when the conviction renders her temporarily ineligible,³ or an election official may believe that certain identification documents are required to vote when no such requirement exists.⁴ And some irregularities involve fraud or intentional misconduct perpetrated by actors other than individual voters: for example, flyers may spread misinformation about the proper locations or procedures for voting; thugs may be dispatched to intimidate voters at the polls; missing ballot boxes may mysteriously reappear. These are all problems with the election administration system ... but they are not “voter fraud.”

Conflating these concerns is not merely a semantic issue. First, the rhetorical sloppiness fosters the misperception that fraud by voters is prevalent. That is, when every problem with an election is attributed to “voter fraud,” it appears that fraud by voters is much more common than is actually the case.

This, in turn, promotes inappropriate policy. By inflating the perceived prevalence of fraud by voters, policy-makers find it easier to justify restrictions on those voters that are not warranted by the real facts.

Moreover, mislabeling problems as “voter fraud” distracts attention from the real election issues that need to be resolved. It draws attention away from problems best addressed, for example, by resource allocation or poll worker education or implementation of longstanding statutory mandates, and instead improperly focuses on the voter as the source of the problem.

It is more likely that an individual will be struck by lightning than that he will impersonate another voter at the polls.

III. The Research Landscape

It is easy to find opinion pieces and legislative statements claiming that voter fraud is a substantial concern. But aside from a trickle of news stories of low-grade fraud in a few isolated elections, there are surprisingly few sources recounting specific incidents of alleged voter fraud.

The most notorious such sources are documents prepared by the American Center for Voting Rights (“ACVR”), a controversial organization established in early 2005 and apparently defunct just over two years later.⁵ The ACVR produced two reports — one compiling allegations of fraud in Ohio in 2004, and another compiling allegations of fraud in 2004 nationwide.⁶ The ACVR has also repeated these and other allegations in amicus briefs filed in litigation related to voter identification provisions.⁷

Former Wall Street Journal editorial board member and weekly columnist John Fund has also recounted several specific allegations of voter fraud in his 2004 book Stealing Elections;8 two other books by academics, Dirty Little Secrets and Deliver the Vote, address allegations of fraud from a historical perspective.9 Hans von Spakovsky, a commissioner on the Federal Election Commission and a former Counsel to the Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights in the Department of Justice, has similarly recounted allegations of voter fraud in several policy papers and presentations.10

Finally, there are a few newspaper articles that seem repeatedly cited in discussions of voter fraud — for example, a 2000 article in the Atlanta Journal-Constitution and a 2004 article in the New York Daily News.11 These articles review attempts to match voter rolls to other large lists in an effort to find allegedly ineligible voters; the limitations of such studies are discussed later in this paper.

Similarly, there are surprisingly few sources of information specifically analyzing the allegations of alleged voter fraud to determine the extent to which they show reliable evidence of fraud. In two studies, both focusing more heavily on the political and legal context of voter fraud allegations, Professor Lorraine Minnite has reviewed several incidents.12 Professor Spencer Overton, a former commissioner on the 2005 Commission on Federal Election Reform, has also reviewed several incidents of alleged fraud in his book Stealing Democracy.13 After careful analysis, both authors find the claims largely overblown.

Among its other work on the subject,14 the Brennan Center for Justice has developed a methodology for reviewing allegations of voter fraud,15 and continues to collect analyses of noted allegations at www.truthaboutfraud.org.

This paper distills the results of that work, compiling for the first time the recurring methodological flaws that continue to spawn allegations of widespread voter fraud where it does not exist.

IV. Voter Fraud And The Press For Photo ID

The most common example of the harm wrought by imprecise and inflated claims of “voter fraud” is the call for in-person photo identification requirements. Such photo ID laws are effective only in preventing individuals from impersonating other voters at the polls — an occurrence more rare than getting struck by lightning.16

By throwing all sorts of election anomalies under the “voter fraud” umbrella, however, advocates for such laws artificially inflate the apparent need for these restrictions and undermine the urgency of other reforms.

Moreover, as with all restrictions on voters, photo identification requirements have a predictable detrimental impact on eligible citizens. Such laws are only potentially worthwhile if they clearly prevent more problems than they create. If policymakers distinguished real voter fraud from the more common election irregularities erroneously labeled as voter fraud, it would become apparent that the limited benefits of laws like photo ID requirements are simply not worth the cost.

Royal Masset, the former political director for the Republican Party of Texas, concisely tied all of these strands together in a 2007 Houston Chronicle article concerning a highly controversial battle over photo identification legislation in Texas. Masset connected the inflated furor over voter fraud to photo identification laws and their expected impact on legitimate voters:

Among Republicans it is an “article of religious faith that voter fraud is causing us to lose elections,” Masset said.

He doesn’t agree with that, but does believe that requiring photo IDs could cause enough of a dropoff in legitimate Democratic voting to add 3 percent to the Republican vote.¹⁷

This remarkably candid observation underscores why it is so critical to get the facts straight on voter fraud. Virtuous public policy should stand on more reliable supports.

The voter fraud phantom drives policy that disenfranchises actual legitimate voters, without a corresponding actual benefit.

V. The Truth About Voter Fraud

There have been a handful of substantiated cases of individual ineligible voters attempting to defraud the election system.

But by any measure, voter fraud is extraordinarily rare.

In part, this is because fraud by individual voters is a singularly foolish and ineffective way to attempt to win an election.

Each act of voter fraud in connection with a federal election risks five years in prison and a $10,000 fine, in addition to any state penalties.¹⁸

In return, it yields at most one incremental vote.

That single extra vote is simply not worth the price.

instead, much evidence that purports to reveal voter fraud can be traced to causes far more logical than fraud by voters. Below, this paper reviews the more common ways in which more benign errors or inconsistencies may be mistaken for voter fraud.

Clerical or Typographical Errors.

In the course of millions of recorded votes and voters, it is virtually certain that there will be clerical errors. Often, what appears to be voter fraud—a person attempting to vote under a false name, for example — can be traced back to a typo.

Errors in the poll books.

In a jurisdiction of any significant size, it is unfortunately easy to make an entry in the poll book next to the wrong voter's name. For example, despite having died in 1997, Alan J. Mandel was alleged to have voted in 1998; upon further investigation, Alan J. Mandell (two "l"s), who was very much alive and voting at the time, explained that local election workers simply checked the wrong name off of the list.¹⁹ The same problem may occur when information from a poll book is entered incorrectly into a county's computer system, as in Milwaukee in 2004.²⁰ Or voters — legitimate voters — may make a mistake: a 1994 investigation of fraud allegations in California, for example, revealed that voters accidentally signed the poll books on the wrong lines, next to the names of deceased voters.²¹

Errors in registration records. Simple typos may also infect voter records, changing a name or an identifying number or an address in a way that interferes with attempts to validate the voter's information against some other source. For example, in Washington State in 2006, Marina Petrienko tried to register to vote for the first time, but a county official mis-typed the year of her birth, entering "1976" into the database, instead of the year on her form: "1975."²² First-time Illinois voters Mike and Sung Kim "had been mistakenly registered with Kim as their first names" in 2004.²³ And in Milwaukee, Victor Moy was listed on the rolls as living at 8183 W. Thurston Avenue, but actually resides at number 8153.²⁴ Because such typos may prevent registrations from being externally validated by information in other sources, officials and observers may believe that registrations are fraudulent when they are, in reality, entirely legitimate.

Bad "Matching."

The most common source of superficial claims of voter fraud, and the most common source of error, probably involves matching voter rolls against each other or against some other source to find alleged double voters, dead voters, or otherwise ineligible voters.

Errors in the underlying data.

Some such matches fail to account for errors or default entries in the underlying data. In New Jersey in 2005, for example, examiners alleged fraud by individuals on the voter rolls in two different places whose first and last names and birthdates matched, including a woman named Mary Johnson.²⁵

Closer examination, however, showed that some of the matching birthdates in question were January 1, 1880, which was simply a system default for missing information.²⁶ In reality, the examiners had found only two different women named "Mary Johnson," with no relevant birthdate information at all.

Partial matches.

Other matches neglect middle names or suffixes: in the same New Jersey procedure described above, for example, James A. Smith and James G. Smith were presumed to be the same person, as were J. T. Kearns and J. T. Kearns, Jr.²⁷

Similarly, in New Hampshire, 22 pairs of people who shared the same first and last names were flagged for possible double-voting; in fact, all of the flagged voters had different middle names.²⁸ And in one of the more infamous examples of inappropriate matching, a vendor preparing a set of voters to be purged in Florida in 2000 found “matches” in the first name if the first four letters were the same on two different lists, and “matches” in the last name if 80% of the letters were the same.²⁹

The final set of voters to be purged, of course, contained the names of many individuals whose records had been falsely matched.³⁰

The “birthdate” problem.

Even given an exact match, however, two entries with the same name and birthdate may not represent the same individual. Statistics students are often surprised to discover that in a group of 23 people, it is more likely than not that two will share the same month and day of birth; in a group of 180, two will probably share the same birthdate. In any group of significant size, statistics teaches that there will be many with the same first and last names — and it is likely that at least two such voters will be born on the same day.³¹

It should not therefore be surprising, for example, that “Kathleen Sullivan” was most likely listed twice on the rolls of 2004 New Jersey voters not because one woman drove the length of the state to cast a second ballot, but because two women named Kathleen Sullivan happen to share the same birthdate.³²

Jumping to Conclusions.

Those searching for fraud — politicians, pundits, and even occasionally prosecutors — sometimes jump to unwarranted conclusions with a limited amount of information. The “birthdate problem” above — mistaking two different people with the same name and birthdate — is one example. But there are many other circumstances in which observers draw illicit conclusions from data that in fact have a benign explanation.

Dual registration.

Registering twice — or mistakenly leaving an old registration on the rolls — is not meaningful evidence of an intent to commit fraud by voting twice. There is no requirement that citizens inform their local election officials before they move, and with approximately 14% of Americans moving each year,³³ it is not surprising to find that many voters are registered under multiple addresses — but vote only once. In New Hampshire in 2004, for example, local officials found 67 individuals on the rolls in both Dover and Durham; each of the 67 had moved from one town to the other, and each voted only once.³⁴

It may seem significantly more suspicious to register twice on the same day — but even then, two registrations do not necessarily yield two votes.

In 2004, for example, federal prosecutors charged Wisconsinite Cynthia Alicea with double-voting. Wisconsin allows residents to register on Election Day, which Alicea did. Poll workers found an error on the form, and asked Alicea to fill out another, which she also did — but the first form was never discarded.

Although Alicea completed two registration forms, following poll worker instructions, she voted only once. Her innocence was eventually proven, but not before prosecutors forced the 23-year-old through an unwarranted trial.³⁵

Alicea voted only once, but based on two registration forms, prosecutors took her to trial.

*She eventually won her case but, because of the ordeal,
"she's inclined not to vote ever again."*

Death records.

Voting from the grave offers salacious headlines, and investigators often attempt to match death records to voter rolls in an attempt to produce purported evidence of fraud. Yet in addition to the problems with inaccurate matching identified above, a simple match of death records to voter rolls may conceal citizens who voted before dying, in quite ordinary fashion.

In Maryland in 1995, for example, an exhaustive investigation revealed that of 89 alleged deceased voters, none were actually dead at the time the ballot was cast. The federal agent in charge of the investigation said that the nearest they came was when they "found one person who had voted then died a week after the election."³⁶ Similarly, in New Hampshire, postcards were sent to the addresses of citizens who voted in the 2004 general election; one card was returned as undeliverable because the voter died after Election Day, but before the postcard arrived at her home.³⁷

Criminal records.

Reports of votes by persons with convictions have often fed claims of voter fraud. Yet without more information, such reports may be deceptive. Many, if not most, convictions are misdemeanors, which in most states do not affect the defendant's voting rights.

Wallace McDonald, for example, was purged from the Florida voter rolls in 2000 because of a conviction. Yet Mr. McDonald's crime was not a felony, for which many Floridians forfeit voting rights forever — but merely a misdemeanor, which should not affect voting rights at all. Indeed, Mr. McDonald had been convicted only of falling asleep on a bench.³⁸ Similarly, in Washington's 2004 gubernatorial election, hundreds of citizens were alleged to have voted illegally because of convictions that were actually juvenile dispositions — which do not disqualify voters.³⁹

Other claims of fraud rely solely on the fact that someone was convicted but never look to see whether the accused person had his voting rights restored. Even in Florida, where, until 2007, most persons with felony convictions lost their voting rights permanently, not every person convicted of a felony was ineligible to vote.

Reverend Willie Dixon, 70, was purged from the Florida voter rolls in 2000 because of a felony conviction — but Reverend Dixon had already been pardoned for his crime and his voting rights had been restored.⁴⁰ In most other states, persons with convictions regain the franchise after release from either incarceration, probation, or parole. Allegations of fraud that rely on a past criminal conviction but fail to investigate whether voting rights were restored will likely prove unfounded.

Returned mail.

Voter “caging” is a tactic involving a mass mailing to registered voters to sniff out mailings that are returned undelivered; these undelivered mailings are then used to compile a list of voters allegedly enrolled under invalid addresses. But for many reasons, undelivered mail need not be an indication that a person registered at the given address is not entitled to vote there.⁴¹ A voter may be away from home for work, like a Louisiana Congresswoman challenged because she received her mail in Washington;⁴² or for military service, like an Ohio servicewoman challenged because she received her mail where she was stationed, in North Carolina;⁴³ or for an extended vacation, like an Oregon woman rendered inactive because she was out of the country for a few months.⁴⁴ A voter may live with others but be unlisted on the mailbox.

Or, like Ohio resident Raven Shaffer, he may receive mail at a post office box or other mail service, and not at his registered residence.⁴⁵ Moreover, some mail is simply not delivered, through no fault of the voter: in the 1990 census, for example, The New York Times reported that “[a]lthough at least 4.8 million [census] forms were found to be undeliverable by the Postal Service, 1.8 million of those were later delivered by hand.”⁴⁶ And recent reports found that government records used by Chicago postal workers to deliver mail contained more than 84,000 errors.⁴⁷

Mail sent to a listed registration address may also be returned as undeliverable because the voter has moved— even though the citizen remains wholly eligible to vote without re-registration. Each state has different rules determining when a voter who has moved must inform election officials of her new address. At a minimum, however, federal law provides that if a voter has moved within the same area covered by a given polling place — if, for example, a voter moves from one apartment to another within the same apartment complex, as a 2000 Oregon voter did⁴⁸ — she may legitimately vote at that polling place even if she has not yet notified a registrar of her move.⁴⁹ Similarly, a voter who has moved within the same registrar’s jurisdiction and Congressional district may return to vote at her former polling place without re-registering.⁵⁰ Especially in urban areas where there is high mobility within a particular neighborhood, undeliverable mail may simply reflect the recent move of a voter who remains fully eligible to vote.

Unusual addresses.

In most states, voters must register at a residential address; those looking for fraud may therefore flag addresses zoned for business use as an indication of fraudulent activity. Broad zoning restrictions, however, do not account for many less traditional — but legitimate — residences. Barbara Taylor was among hundreds of Washington voters challenged in 2005 for this reason. While it is true that the address on her registration was the address of a public storage facility, Taylor explained that she is “a manager for the company and has lived in an apartment on the site for 12 years.”⁵¹ In other cases, transient or homeless individuals have registered — as they are legally entitled to do — at shelters or government buildings.⁵²

Records compiled for a different purpose. In St. Louis in 2000, officials compared the voter rolls to city property records and alleged that some voters fraudulently registered from vacant lots.⁵³ The property records, however, were originally compiled for a purpose other than individual identification; an address with multiple plots of land was apparently deemed entirely “vacant” if only one of the plots had no building. Further investigation by local reporters revealed that the supposedly vacant lots where voters were registered in fact contained valid residences.⁵⁴

Voter Mistakes.

Even after accounting for the false conclusions above, investigations reveal that ineligible voters do sometimes cast votes. It is important, however, to distinguish those cases in which voters know they are ineligible but vote anyway — real voter fraud — from cases in which ineligible voters mistakenly believe themselves to be eligible. Both scenarios are unquestionably of concern. But it is likely to be more productive to address mistakes with remedies different from those often proposed for fraud.

Of the relatively small number of ineligible voters who mistakenly cast ballots, most are citizens rendered ineligible by criminal conviction. The laws concerning eligibility vary from state to state and can be confusing: different voters are disenfranchised for different convictions for different lengths of time.⁵⁵

Moreover, the process of restoring a citizen’s right to vote varies as well, from automatic restoration upon release from prison in states like Pennsylvania, Indiana, Ohio, Illinois, and Michigan,⁵⁶ to the excruciatingly burdensome application process in Kentucky — which requires all would-be voters to submit a written application accompanied by three character references, an essay explaining why they should be eligible to vote, and a filing fee.⁵⁷

These rules are not merely difficult for voters to navigate: election officials with special training in the rules and regulations governing eligibility routinely get the law wrong. A 2004 survey, for example, found that 43% of New Jersey’s county election offices did not follow state law in restoring citizens’ right to vote.⁵⁸ In New York, a much-publicized 2003 survey found that more than half of the local election officials did not follow state law; when the survey was repeated just two years later, 38% of the local boards of elections still got the law wrong.⁵⁹

It is difficult to expect disenfranchised voters to navigate the election laws successfully when so many election officials with expertise do not. Indeed, in Milwaukee, one voter asked to present identification at the polls showed his Department of Corrections ID card, with “OFFENDER” printed in bold letters across the face — but he was not informed by any poll worker that he might be ineligible to cast a ballot.⁶⁰

Such cases show confusion ... but not voter fraud.

VI. Types of “Voter Fraud”

Allegations of “voter fraud” seem to fall into one of several recurring categories. Some would represent actual fraud if the allegations proved true, though the allegations are often unsupported. Some would not actually represent fraud even if they were true. This paper reviews some of the more common assertions of “fraud” below, to substitute more careful analysis for overeager and salacious headlines.

Allegations of Double Voting

Allegations of double voting are among the most common assertions of voter fraud. Consider one set of agitated headlines: “More Double Voting Tied to ‘04 Election,”⁶¹ “Double Voting Being Investigated,”⁶² “Double Voting Fear Rises,”⁶³ “Hundreds Might Have Double-Voted,”⁶⁴ “Exposed: Scandal of Double Voters.”⁶⁵ Most of these reports are hypothetical — hundreds “might” have double voted — and further research shows reason to question the conclusion that widespread double voting occurred. Other reports appear more certain but are actually more incorrect.

There are a handful of known cases in which admissions, poll book entries, absentee ballots, provisional ballot stubs, or other documentation indicate that one individual has actually voted twice.⁶⁶ These cases are extremely rare — not because such documentation is hard to come by (many states require that such documents be retained), but because actual double voting is itself extremely rare. Moreover, the scarcity is expected, given the severity of the penalty (criminal prosecution), and the meager nature of the payoff (one incremental vote).

Instead, it is far more common to see allegations of epidemic double voting that are unfounded. Such claims are usually premised on matching lists of voters from one place to another; upon closer inspection, the match process shows error.

Sometimes the interpretation is flawed: two list entries under the same name — even the same name and birthdate — indicate different individuals, as with two Kathleen Sullivans confused for each other in New Jersey in 2004.⁶⁷

The opportunity for error increases with the size of the attempted match: when allegations of fraud in 2000 were based on a nationwide attempt to match names and birthdates, it is not surprising that 3,273 alleged double voters were found — and not surprising that many, like those attributed to Martha Alexander, the chair of the North Carolina legislature’s panel on election laws, were based on flawed assumptions that two people with the same name and birthdate were the same individual.⁶⁸

Moreover, sometimes the lists themselves are flawed: because of the occasional clerical error by overworked and undertrained election workers, an individual is marked as voting when she did not in fact cast a ballot, as Missouri investigators discovered in 2004.⁶⁹

Sometimes, merely following a poll worker’s accurate instructions can land legitimate voters in unwarranted hot water. In 2004, for example, federal prosecutors were especially attuned to claims of voter fraud, and fixed the weight of the federal government on 23-year-old Cynthia Alicea. Alicea, an eligible resident of Wisconsin, registered on Election Day, as permitted under Wisconsin law. Poll workers found an error on the form, and asked Alicea to fill out another, which she also did. The poll workers, however, never discarded the first form. Alicea voted only once, but based on the two registration forms, prosecutors took the young woman to trial. Though she eventually won her case, because of the ordeal, “she’s inclined not to vote ever again.”⁷⁰

Exaggerated or unfounded allegations of fraud through double voting include the following:

- In Missouri in 2000 and 2002, hundreds of voters were alleged to have voted twice, either within the state or once in Kansas and once in Missouri. The same analysis acknowledged that the “computer files contain many errors that show people voting who did not actually vote.”⁷¹ Of 18 Kansas City cases that reporters followed up, 13 were affirmatively shown to result from clerical errors.⁷² We are aware of public sources substantiating only four cases (amounting to six votes within the state), yielding an overall documented fraud rate of 0.0003%.⁷³
- In New Hampshire in 2004, citizens were alleged to have voted twice. In fact, on further investigation, many of the voters who were allegedly listed multiple times on the rolls actually represented different people with identical names; others were listed with multiple registrations, but voted only once. We are not aware of any public materials substantiating the claims of double voting.⁷⁴
- In New Jersey in 2004, 4,397 voters were alleged to have voted twice within the state, and 6,572 voters were alleged to have voted once in New Jersey and once elsewhere.⁷⁵ Many of these alleged double votes were actually flawed matches of names and/or birthdates on voter rolls.⁷⁶ Only eight cases were actually documented through signatures on poll books; at least five signatures appear to match.⁷⁷ Even if all eight proved to reveal fraud, however, that would amount to an overall double voting rate of 0.0002%.⁷⁸
- In New York in 2002 and 2004, between 400 and 1,000 voters were alleged to have voted once in New York and once in Florida. These allegations were also prompted by a flawed attempt to match names and birthdates.⁷⁹ We are aware of public sources substantiating only two cases, yielding an overall documented fraud rate of 0.000009%.⁸⁰
- In Wisconsin in 2004, dozens of voters were alleged to have voted twice. After further investigation, the vast majority were affirmatively cleared, with some attributed to clerical errors and confusion caused by flawed attempts to match names and birthdates. There were 14 alleged reports of voters casting ballots both absentee and in person; at least 12 were caught, and the absentee ballot was not counted. There were no substantiated reports of any intentional double voting of which we are aware.⁸¹

Allegations of Dead Voters.

Allegations of “dead voters” are also popular, not least for the entertaining pop culture references to be found in the headlines: “Among Voters in New Jersey, G.O.P. Sees Dead People,”⁸² for example, or “Dead Man Voting.”⁸³ After further investigation, however, these allegedly dead voters often turn up perfectly healthy.

There are a handful of known cases in which documentation shows that votes have been cast in the names of voters who have died before the vote was submitted.⁸⁴

It is far more common, however, to see unfounded allegations of epidemic voting from beyond the grave, with a chuckle and a reference to Gov. Earl Long’s quip (“When I die — if I die — I want to be buried in Louisiana, so I can stay active in politics.”) or Rep. Charlie Rangel’s update (same idea, but takes place in Chicago).⁸⁵

Here, too, flawed matches of lists from one place (death records) to another (voter rolls) are often responsible for misinformation. Sometimes the interpretation is flawed: two list entries under the same name indicate different individuals.⁸⁶ Sometimes the lists themselves are flawed: as Hilde Stafford discovered in 2006, individuals who are in fact quite spry are occasionally listed as deceased on the Social Security Administration's master files.⁸⁷ And sometimes, because of clerical error by election workers or voters or both, an individual is marked as voting when she did not in fact cast a ballot, or is marked as voting under the wrong person's name.

For example, despite having died in 1997, Alan J. Mandel was alleged to have voted in 1998. On further investigation, Alan J. Mandell (two "l"s), who was very much alive and voting at the time, explained that local election workers simply checked the wrong name off of the list.⁸⁸ Indeed, a 2007 investigation of about 100 "dead voters" in Missouri revealed that every single purported case was properly attributed either to a matching error, a problem in the underlying data, or a clerical error by elections officials or voters.⁸⁹

In other circumstances, the match is accurate but reveals nothing illegal about the vote: the voter has died, yes, but after casting her ballot. In Maryland in 1995, for example, an exhaustive investigation revealed that of 89 alleged deceased voters, none were actually dead at the time the ballot was cast. The federal agent in charge of the investigation said that the nearest they came was when they "found one person who had voted then died a week after the election."⁹⁰

Exaggerated or unfounded allegations of fraud by dead voters include the following:

- In Georgia in 2000, 5,412 votes were alleged to have been cast by deceased voters over the past 20 years.⁹¹ The allegations were premised on a flawed match of voter rolls to death lists. A follow-up report clarified that only one instance had been substantiated, and this single instance was later found to have been an error: the example above, in which Alan J. Mandel was confused with Alan J. Mandell.⁹² No other evidence of fraudulent votes was reported.
- In Michigan in 2005, 132 votes were alleged to have been cast by deceased voters.⁹³ The allegations were premised on a flawed match of voter rolls to death lists. A follow-up investigation by the Secretary of State revealed that these alleged dead voters were actually absentee ballots mailed to voters who died before Election Day; 97 of these ballots were never voted, and 27 were voted before the voter passed away.⁹⁴ Even if the remaining eight cases all revealed substantiated fraud, that would amount to a rate of at most 0.0027%.⁹⁵
- In New Jersey in 2004, 4,755 deceased voters were alleged to have cast a ballot. The allegations were premised on a flawed match of voter rolls to death lists. No follow-up investigation publicly documented any substantiated cases of fraud of which we are aware, and there were no reports that any of these allegedly deceased voters voted in 2005.⁹⁶
- In New York in 2002 and 2004, 2,600 deceased voters were alleged to have cast a ballot, again based on a match of voter rolls to death lists. Journalists following up on seven cases found clerical errors and mistakes but no fraud, and no other evidence of fraud was reported.⁹⁷

Allegations of Fraudulent Addresses.

Those claiming voter fraud also point to allegations that voters have been registered at fraudulent addresses such as vacant lots, storage units, or government buildings. As with the allegations above, there are a few cases in which charges that votes have been improperly cast from illegitimate addresses have been substantiated.⁹⁸

More often, however, the allegations are either unsupported or further investigation reveals that the allegedly flawed addresses turn out to be legitimate.

These sorts of claims are often based on postcards that are returned undelivered or undeliverable — but the postcards are an unreliable indicator. Typos during the registration process, like the one listing Victor Moy at 8183 W. Thurston Avenue in Milwaukee instead of 8153,99 may cause mail to be misdirected. Or, like the post office box used by Raven Shaffer in Ohio, individuals may receive mail at an address different from the legal residence they list as their registration address.¹⁰⁰

Other unsupported claims are based on attempts to screen registration addresses against lists of vacant lots, or against zoning regulations to find locations dedicated to non-residential use. Here, too, typos may cause legitimate addresses to be flagged as suspicious.¹⁰¹ Or the underlying lists may be flawed: in Missouri in 2000, lots that were supposedly vacant actually held houses.¹⁰² Sometimes the lists are simply overly broad, and capture voters who list less traditional — but entirely legitimate — residences.

Barbara Taylor, for example, was among hundreds of Washington voters challenged in 2005 for this reason. While it is true that the address on her registration was the address of a public storage facility, Taylor — a manager for the storage company — “has lived in an apartment on the site for 12 years.”¹⁰³ Though her address appeared superficially questionable, her address was in fact entirely legitimate.

Finally, a variant of the above claims concern allegations that large numbers of votes are all tied to one address. There is, however, nothing inherently suspect about multiple votes from one address if multiple eligible voters live there, whether the address is a college dormitory or nursing home or any other group housing arrangement. In New Hampshire, for example, a citizen apparently became concerned because 88 individuals had registered with residences on property owned by Daniel Webster College; on further investigation, the 88 registrations were revealed to be from students at the college — and unsurprisingly, entirely legitimate.¹⁰⁴

Exaggerated or unfounded allegations of fraud by voters with invalid addresses include the following:

- In Missouri in 2000, 79 voters were registered from addresses alleged to be vacant lots, but further investigation found that properties classified as vacant in fact contained legitimate residences, and that at least one of the voters was apparently the victim of a typographical error.¹⁰⁵ We are aware of no public reports substantiating claims that any votes were cast by individuals fraudulently registered at invalid addresses.

- In New Hampshire in 2004, based on undelivered postcards sent after the election, citizens were alleged to have voted from invalid addresses. Many actually lived at the addresses claimed, but received their mail elsewhere. Others moved after the election but before the postcards arrived. We are aware of only two substantiated cases (including one domestic violence victim, who voted from an old address in order to avoid disclosing her current domicile), with two more under investigation. Even if all four revealed fraud, that would amount to an overall rate of 0.0006%.¹⁰⁶

- In Wisconsin in 2004, after an attempt to match voters' addresses to a postal service list, 1,242 votes in Milwaukee were alleged to be fraudulent; many of these allegations were later traced to data entry errors or to legitimate residences that were presumed to be business addresses.¹⁰⁷

5,800 additional Election Day registrants were sent undeliverable postcards, but many of these postcards were returned because the voters legitimately moved after the election.¹⁰⁸ We are aware of no substantiated reports of any votes cast by individuals fraudulently registered at invalid addresses.

Allegations of Voter Fraud by Persons with Felony Convictions.

Many close elections have also featured allegations that waves of ineligible people with felony convictions have deliberately overtaken the voting system. There are, however, only a handful of known cases in which people rendered ineligible by convictions cast ballots despite knowing that they were not permitted to do so.¹⁰⁹

More frequently — though still quite rare — individuals who are ineligible because of convictions have reportedly registered or voted without realizing that they were ineligible. In Washington in 2004, for example, there were reports of voting by ineligible persons with convictions, in substantial part because of significant confusion about the circumstances under which civil rights were taken away or restored.¹¹⁰ At the time, citizens convicted of a felony were disenfranchised both while in prison and after they had returned to the community on parole or probation. In order to regain the right to vote, these citizens had to complete their sentence — including repayment of all restitution, fees, and fines.¹¹¹

Confusion abounded. Many citizens with convictions thought they could vote again once they were released from probation.¹¹² Some individuals rendered ineligible by conviction were allegedly told by corrections officers that they could vote; other probationers were apparently mailed ballots they thought they could (indeed, should) cast.¹¹³ At least one county elections office provided mistaken information on its website.¹¹⁴

Similar confusion was not confined to Washington. A 2004 survey in New Jersey, for example, found that 43% of election offices got the law wrong; the error rate by election officials in New York was 38%.¹¹⁵ When more than a third of trained election officials do not know the rules, it is not hard to imagine that persons with convictions are also poorly informed. Moreover, given the ease with which poll book entries can be double-checked against lists of convictions to find ineligible voters, it seems unlikely that ineligible citizens would take the substantial risk of a return to prison for just one incremental vote. On the rare occasions when citizens rendered ineligible by conviction do vote, it is far more sensible to believe that they do so by mistake than that they do so with intent to deceive.

The few examples above concern actual votes — intentional or unintentional — cast by people who are ineligible because of a conviction. More common are allegations of such activity that prove unfounded. Such reports are often based on comparisons of voter rolls with lists of people who have been convicted. Yet these “matches” are subject to the same errors mentioned repeatedly above: typos, clerical errors, individuals who superficially appear to be the same person but are actually different. The notorious 2000 purge of purported felons in Florida is a good example: a system that found roughly similar names and birthdates on voter rolls and conviction records ended up disqualifying thousands of voters who were perfectly eligible to vote, but who were deemed ineligible by the “match.”¹¹⁶ For example, because of the inaccurate matching protocol, eligible citizen Matt Frost was prevented from voting because state officials incorrectly linked him with a similar alias of ineligible voter Shawn Chadwick.¹¹⁷

Even when the matching system is not to blame, allegations of ineligible voting may be inflated. As with at least some names on the 2000 Florida purge list, convictions may be mislabeled as disenfranchising felonies when in fact a voter has been convicted only of a misdemeanor.¹¹⁸ As in Washington in 2004, citizens may be accused of ineligible voting due to juvenile dispositions — which do not affect their voting rights.¹¹⁹ Or as with at least seven cases in Waukesha, Wisconsin, in 2004, accusations may fail to account for voters who are convicted after casting a legitimate vote.¹²⁰

Moreover, even when the individual in question has actually been convicted of an offense that renders him ineligible, few such voters are ineligible to vote indefinitely. Some, like Reverend Willie Dixon of Florida, have been pardoned, and their voting rights restored.¹²¹ Other convictions may be overturned on appeal. Still others, depending on the state, regain the franchise automatically or upon petition, after release from incarceration, probation, or parole. Allegations of fraud that look to convictions without accounting for the restoration of voting rights often miss the mark.¹²²

Exaggerated or unfounded allegations of fraud by persons rendered ineligible by conviction include the following:

- In Florida in 2000, a large-scale purge became justifiably notorious for its inaccurate, even haphazard, discarding of the rights of eligible citizens. Despite recognizing the flawed nature of the purge lists, however, reporters used similar lists to claim that 5,643 ineligible persons with convictions actually voted in 2000. These reports used slightly more rigorous match criteria than were used to create the purge lists, but still acknowledged that the underlying data included eligible citizens with misdemeanors, citizens with convictions after their valid vote, and convicted persons with names and birthdates that matched eligible citizen voters. It is true that some votes were cast by ineligible citizens, some of whom were told by election officials that they were eligible. We are not aware of any reports of citizens voting despite knowing that they were ineligible.¹²³
- In Wisconsin in 2004, after an attempt to match voters to Department of Corrections records, 376 people with allegedly disenfranchising convictions were said to have voted. A follow-up investigation revealed that several were found to be convicted only after they voted;¹²⁴ one was convicted of a misdemeanor,¹²⁵ and in another case, a woman’s vote was improperly recorded in her ineligible husband’s place.¹²⁶ Still another presented an identification card boldly labeled “OFFENDER,” but was not told that he might be ineligible.¹²⁷ We are aware of sources documenting seven cases in which the voter knowingly voted while ineligible, yielding a fraud rate of 0.0002%.¹²⁸

- In Washington in 2004, evidence submitted in vigorously prosecuted election contest proceedings showed 1,401 votes by individuals rendered ineligible due to convictions. Some of these voters were apparently misinformed by official county election information or corrections officers; most were apparently sent ballots in the mail by the state. We are not aware of any reports that any of these individuals voted knowing that they were ineligible.¹²⁹

Allegations of Voter Fraud by Noncitizens.

We are not aware of any documented cases in which individual noncitizens have either intentionally registered to vote or voted while knowing that they were ineligible. Given that the penalty (not only criminal prosecution, but deportation)¹³⁰ is so severe, and the payoff (one incremental vote) is so minimal for any individual voter, it makes sense that extremely few noncitizens would attempt to vote, knowing that doing so is illegal.

Although there are a few recorded examples in which noncitizens have apparently registered or voted, investigators have concluded that they were likely not aware that doing so was improper. In one highly publicized case, for example, noncitizens were given voter registration forms by a group helping them through the naturalization process, immediately after successfully completing citizenship interviews with federal officials and receiving letters beginning “Congratulations, your application for citizenship has been approved.”¹³¹ Though the actual swearing-in ceremonies were still up to 90 days away, these individuals most likely mistakenly thought it their obligation and privilege to complete the paperwork, and did not intentionally fabricate their citizenship status in front of federal officials who knew that they were noncitizens.¹³²

Far more common than these incidents of noncitizen voting are allegations of noncitizen voting that prove wholly unfounded. These claims are often premised on matching lists of voters from one place to another, but as with each of the examples above, upon closer inspection, the match process shows error. The interpretation may be flawed, as when two list entries under the same name indicate different individuals. Or the lists themselves may be flawed, with an individual marked due to a clerical error as voting when she did not in fact cast a ballot.

Government citizenship records — as the government itself acknowledges — are also replete with errors or incomplete information. Naturalization documentation may find its way into the government files slowly, or not at all, leaving outdated or inaccurate information for investigators looking for fraud. And this, in turn, leads to flawed accusations that noncitizens have been voting, when the voters in question have in fact become fully naturalized American citizens.

Exaggerated or unfounded allegations of fraud by noncitizens include the following:

- In Washington in 2005, an individual asked county offices to investigate the citizenship status of 1,668 registered voters based on their “foreign-sounding names.” There are no reports of which we are aware that any individual on the submitted list was actually a noncitizen.¹³³

- In Washington in 2004, documentation appears to show that two votes were cast in King County by noncitizens. There are no reports of which we are aware that either of these noncitizens knowingly voted illegally, although one did ask to rescind his vote shortly after the election. Given these votes, the rate of documented noncitizen votes — without proof of fraud — in King County was 0.0002%.¹³⁴
- In Milwaukee in 2001, journalists analyzed 370,000 voting records from 1992 to 2000, and found four instances in which voters' names matched a list of naturalized city residents, but appeared to have voted before their naturalization dates; there is no indication of which we are aware that any of these four knowingly voted illegally. Even if all four of the matched records accurately represented noncitizen votes, the rate of noncitizen voting among the city records examined would have been 0.001%.¹³⁵
- In Hawaii in 2000, 553 apparent noncitizens were alleged to have registered to vote. On further investigation, 144 documented that they had become citizens. At least 61 individuals affirmatively asked to cancel their registration; the others were stopped at the polls and specifically asked about their citizenship before voting. There are no reports of which we are aware that any noncitizen actually voted. To the extent that noncitizens were actually represented on the rolls, officials attributed the registrations to mistake rather than fraud.¹³⁶
- In Hawaii in 1998, four years after an INS investigation into more than 10,000 names identified fewer than twelve noncitizens whose names matched those on the voter rolls, the INS again investigated claims of extensive noncitizen voting. The agency examined 1,200 noncitizens suspected of voting, but found no evidence that any had voted. A separate proceeding uncovered three noncitizens who had indeed voted in 1998, and three others who were reported to be under further investigation. There are no reports of which we are aware that any noncitizens voted knowing that they were ineligible. But even if all six had voted, the overall noncitizen voting rate would have been 0.001%.¹³⁷
- In California in 1996, 924 noncitizens allegedly voted in Orange and Los Angeles Counties, including 624 allegedly ineligible voters identified by the Task Force of the U.S. House of Representatives investigating the Dornan/Sanchez election. The allegations were based largely on attempts to match immigration lists to voter rolls, but only 71 voters matched name, date of birth, and signature; other matches were less reliable. Most of the identified voters were processed by one nonprofit group registering individuals proceeding through the naturalization process; many were registered immediately after passing an INS citizenship interview, and after receiving a letter indicating that they had become naturalized. At least 372 of the voters were apparently officially sworn in before Election Day. There are no reports of which we are aware that any noncitizens registered or voted knowing that they were ineligible. Even assuming there were no matching errors, and leaving aside the critical question of intent, if all 552 remaining individuals were in fact noncitizens when they cast their votes, the overall noncitizen voting rate would have been 0.017%.¹³⁸

Allegations of Registration Fraud.

There have been several documented and widely publicized instances in which registration forms have been fraudulently completed and submitted. But it is extraordinarily difficult to find reported cases in which individuals have submitted registration forms in someone else's name in order to impersonate them at the polls. Furthermore, most reports of registration fraud do not actually claim that the fraud happens so that ineligible people can vote at the polls. Indeed, we are aware of no recent substantiated case in which registration fraud has resulted in fraudulent votes being cast.

Instead, when registration fraud is alleged, the allegations generally fall into one of four categories:

The first type of allegation concerns individuals intentionally submitting forms in the name of someone (or something) ineligible in order to have some fun or — more often — to make a point.¹³⁹ Most of the infamous stories of dogs on the rolls fall into this category, including a recent incident in Washington State.¹⁴⁰ Most of the time, these forms are discovered and investigated by local officials before they make it onto the rolls. There are no reports that we have discovered of votes actually cast in the names of such registrants.

The second type of allegation concerns “fraud” that is not actually fraud at all. This includes registration forms submitted by eligible voters, but with errors or omissions.¹⁴¹ Such mistakes are relatively common, but do not represent fraud. Similarly, there are many jurisdictions in which the registration rolls are inflated with the names of eligible voters who have moved or died or otherwise become ineligible.¹⁴² These lingering entries also do not represent fraud; furthermore, as states build and improve the statewide voter registration databases now required by federal law, it will become easier to remove ineligible voters from the rolls while maintaining safeguards for eligible registrants.

The third type of allegation concerns registration drive workers, who may be paid for their time or on the basis of how many forms they submit,¹⁴³ and who intentionally submit fraudulent forms. The allegations may involve forms submitted in the names of fictional voters, as in the case of “Jive Turkey,”¹⁴⁴ or with the names of actual voters but a false address or a forged signature.¹⁴⁵ Most of the cases of registration fraud that are prosecuted fall into this category.¹⁴⁶ If voter registration drives have enough time and are allowed by law to review the forms submitted by their workers, they can often catch these forms and draw them to the attention of local elections officials.¹⁴⁷

These forms actually defraud the voter registration drives, which compensate workers on the expectation that their time will be spent registering new and eligible citizens; the worker herself is interested not in defrauding the government, but in getting credit for work she didn't do.¹⁴⁸ When drives are able to flag these forms for elections officials, the forms are investigated, not processed, and the worker can be investigated and prosecuted. There are no reports that we have discovered of votes actually cast in the names of such registrants.

Finally, the fourth type of allegation involves individuals who change or manipulate the registration of an eligible voter to frustrate her ability to vote.¹⁴⁹ Like the deliberate destruction of forms,¹⁵⁰ these incidents are rare and most often committed by partisan actors. Most states criminalize the intentional destruction of registration forms or fraudulent submission of forms. Like the allegations of fraud by election officials, these incidents do not concern allegations of fraud by individual voters, and we do not address them in detail here.

Exaggerated or unfounded allegations of voter fraud due to fraudulent registration forms include the following:

- In Florida in 2005, a registration drive was alleged to be submitting thousands of fraudulent registration forms and withholding valid ones, with a box of 179 complete but unsubmitted forms produced as evidence. The charges later proved groundless, and the disgruntled former worker who produced the box was found to have defamed the drive. There are no reports of which we are aware that any votes were cast using any fraudulent registration connected to the drive.¹⁵¹
- In Georgia in 2004, 3,000 allegedly fraudulent registration forms — with the same handwriting and with numerous errors — were submitted by a registration drive. Procedures apparently meant to protect the forms from interference seemed to interfere with the group's ability to perform quality control on the forms that were submitted. There are no reports of which we are aware that any votes were improperly cast using the name of any fraudulent registration form.¹⁵²
- In Missouri, in a departure from clear Department of Justice policy, four individuals were federally indicted on the eve of the 2006 election for alleged registration fraud in Kansas City. At least 1,492 other allegedly questionable voter registration forms were submitted to St. Louis, prompting the Board of Elections for the City of St. Louis to send misleading notices to a wide swath of voters who had registered through the same group.¹⁵³

Yet the wrongdoers were an isolated few registration workers, and despite the skepticism of some that registration fraud occurs only to let ineligible people vote fraudulently, there are no reports of which we are aware that any votes were cast using any fraudulent registration connected to the drive.¹⁵⁴

Allegations of Voter Fraud by Dogs.

Popular media seem especially drawn to allegations that dogs are voting. These stories have a compelling “news of the bizarre” feel, and offer particular pleasure to punsters: “Prank Lands Voter in the Doghouse,”¹⁵⁵ “Woman Registers Her Dog to Vote; Prosecutors Growl.”¹⁵⁶ The fact, however, is that the voter rolls have not been overrun by canines. We are aware of only nine specific reports of dogs found on the voter rolls, including the registration card of “Ritzy Mekler” made infamous by Senator Kit Bond of Missouri.¹⁵⁷

At least six of the nine canine registrants were placed on the rolls by individuals trying to make a point about the fact that it is possible, if one risks prosecution, to place a dog on the voter rolls.¹⁵⁸ Which is to say, if people no longer registered dogs to show that dogs are on the rolls, dogs would no longer be on the rolls.

We are aware of only two cases — ever — involving ballots actually submitted in the name of a dog: the ballots cast by “Duncan MacDonald” in 2006 and 2007 (but labeled “VOID” and signed with a paw print),¹⁵⁹ and the ballot cast by “Raku Bowman” in 2003 in the Grass Roots Venice Neighborhood Council elections in Venice, California.¹⁶⁰ Only Bowman's vote — in a local election run by volunteers, rather than state or federal election officials — was counted. Moreover, in order to cast these votes, both owners had to go to significant lengths: swear falsely on a voter registration form, forge a signature there, forge proof of identity, swear falsely again on the absentee ballot request form, forge a signature there, swear falsely again on the absentee ballot envelope itself, and forge a signature there. In an election for federal candidates, that could subject a defendant to up to thirty years in prison on federal charges alone.

Allegations of Vote-Buying.

We also briefly mention allegations of vote-buying, which are often lumped together with “voter fraud,” though they do not usually involve allegations that the voters in question are ineligible. Instead, these incidents involve illegal agreements by eligible citizens to buy or sell their votes.

Vote-buying schemes may involve agreements to buy or sell votes for particular candidates, or they may simply involve payments for voting — candidate unspecified — in get-out-the-vote efforts targeted at communities thought more likely to support a particular candidate.¹⁶¹ Usually, the monetary value of the reward is fairly small: a small amount of cash, for example, or cigarettes, or food. And in virtually every case, a candidate or campaign staff are directly and centrally involved in brokering the illegal deal.

We mention such schemes specifically because they do still occur,¹⁶² and are often used to buttress claims that widespread fraud infects the election system.¹⁶³ However, for most purposes, it is necessary to distinguish vote-buying from the voter fraud that more typically captures the attention of the public.

Because the individuals involved in vote-buying schemes are almost always citizens who are eligible to vote, vote-buying cannot possibly be addressed by most of the remedies proposed to confront voter fraud: photo identification rules, restrictions on registration, and the like. In supporting the need for policies that address alleged fraud by ineligible voters, then, it is misleading to include vote-buying in the list of wrongdoing.

Allegations of Fraud by Election Officials.

Similarly, reporters and analysts should be wary of attempts to bootstrap fraud by election officials or other insiders into compendiums of alleged “voter fraud.” Election fraud by insiders has been an issue since Senators wore togas.

Sadly, there are still occasional reports of wrongdoing by those who are employed to safeguard the process. For example, in 2004, election judge Leander Brooks was convicted of casting at least twenty ballots in others’ names in 2002 in East St. Louis, Illinois; his cousin Michael Collins, a former city councilman, had been convicted of registering acquaintances from outside his precinct to vote fraudulently from a neighbor’s address in 1995.¹⁶⁴

Like the allegations of vote-buying above, fraud by election officials should be condemned, and documented acts of such fraud should be prosecuted. But also like the allegations above, such incidents should be clearly distinguished from voter fraud.

Most remedies aimed at preventing alleged fraud by ineligible voters depend on honest enforcement of the law by election officials. Conversely, if as above, election officials are willing to pervert the law, policies aimed at policing voters will not be able to stop insiders from corrupting the system.

VII. Appendix

Selected Case Studies.

Allegations of widespread fraud by malevolent voters are easy to make, but often prove to be inaccurate. The Brennan Center has analyzed public materials in some of the areas branded as notorious election fraud “hot spots,” finding that various election irregularities led to inflated claims of widespread fraud.

In many of these cases, proposals to require restrictive identification documents of voters at the polls were under debate at the time of the election — or were proposed as a result. The cries of “voter fraud” were often used to support the call for restrictive ID.

We examined each of the allegations of fraud by voters to uncover the truth behind the assertions. Further case studies are available at our website devoted to the topic, www.truthaboutfraud.org.

Missouri

In some ways, the recent hunt for voter fraud began in Missouri in the 2000 election, the crucible that proved formative for Attorney General John Ashcroft and Senator Kit Bond, among others. Yet despite all the frenzy, the allegations yielded only six substantiated cases of Missouri votes cast by ineligible voters, knowingly or unknowingly, except for those votes permitted by court order. The six cases were double votes by four voters—two across state lines and two within Missouri—amounting to an overall rate of 0.0003%. None of these problems could have been resolved by requiring photo ID at the polls.

New Jersey

Just before the 2005 election, partisan actors attempted to probe the accuracy of New Jersey’s voter rolls by comparing election records for 2004 with death records and with the rolls of other states. The allegations yielded only eight substantiated cases of individuals knowingly casting invalid votes that counted—eight voters who voted twice. Given the number of votes cast in these elections, this amounts to a rate of 0.0004%. None of these problems could have been resolved by requiring photo ID at the polls.

Wisconsin

The 2004 election was hotly contested in Wisconsin, and various irregularities led to inflated claims of widespread fraud. The allegations yielded only seven substantiated cases of individuals knowingly casting invalid votes that counted—all persons with felony convictions. This amounts to a rate of 0.0025% within Milwaukee and 0.0002% within the state as a whole. None of these problems could have been resolved by requiring photo ID at the polls.

Missouri

The 2000 election was hotly contested in Missouri, and various irregularities led to inflated claims of widespread fraud. Many of these fraud claims were later used to support the call for restrictive ID requirements. We examined each of the allegations of fraud by individual voters — the only sort that ID could possibly address — to uncover the truth behind the assertions.

The Allegations:

- Invalid addresses: 79 individuals listed as voting in St. Louis City were registered from addresses alleged to be vacant lots. Further investigation found that properties that were wrongly classified by the city assessor's office as vacant in fact contained legitimate residences. Only 14 voters were found to be listed as registered from vacant lots, at least one of whom was apparently victim of a typographical error, and three more of whom moved within St. Louis City and may not have been required to re-register with a new address before voting.¹⁶⁵

14 addresses in St. Louis City were allegedly “drop sites” where fraudulent registrations might have been processed.¹⁶⁶ The 14 alleged “drop sites” in St. Louis City were addresses that were determined to be locations other than apartment buildings, nursing homes, or recognizable group homes where more than eight people were registered at each location. Seven of these addresses were actually visited by reporters, and all seven visits revealed that more than eight people properly lived at the address noted.¹⁶⁷

- Ineligible by conviction: 62 individuals listed as voting in St. Louis City and County matched the name, date of birth, and Social Security number of individuals listed on federal court records of felony conviction, and 52 individuals listed as voting in St. Louis County matched the name and date of birth of individuals listed on county records of felony conviction. It is not clear whether there was any overlap between the list of 62 and the list of 52, nor is it clear whether any of the individuals had had their rights restored before the election. We are not aware of any public reported analysis of poll records to determine whether individuals listed as voting actually voted and were not listed as voting due to a clerical error or mistakenly listed instead of an eligible voter with the same name and birthdate.¹⁶⁸

- Double voters: 23 individuals listed as voting on the voter rolls maintained by St. Louis City and County matched the name, date of birth, and Social Security number of another individual listed as voting; 45 individuals matched the name and date of birth of another voter. We are not aware of any public reported analysis of these poll records to determine whether individuals listed as voting actually voted twice and were not listed as voting due to a clerical error or mistakenly confused with another eligible voter with the same name and birthdate.¹⁶⁹

Based on a computer match of names and dates of birth on voter rolls, 150 individuals from St. Louis — presumably including the individuals above — were listed as voting twice in 2000 or 2002, and 150 other individuals from across the rest of the state were alleged to have either voted twice within the state or once in Kansas and once in Missouri. The same analysis acknowledged that the “computer files contain many errors that show people voting who did not actually vote.”¹⁷⁰ Of 18 Kansas City cases that reporters followed up, 13 were shown to result from clerical errors, 2 were uncertain, and 3 appeared to show double voting in Missouri and Kansas — 2 in 2000 and 1 in 2002. (At least two of these were convicted in federal court.) One other case of double voting within Missouri in 2000, and one in 2002, were substantiated using poll records.¹⁷¹

- Dead voters: 14 votes in St. Louis City and County were cast in the names of allegedly dead people, based on a computer match of names, dates of birth, and Social Security numbers on the voting rolls against information in Department of Health records.¹⁷² It is not clear whether any of these individuals died after the election. We are not aware of any public reported analysis of poll records to determine whether individuals listed as voting actually voted and were not listed as voting due to a clerical error.¹⁷³

Additional Allegations of Irregularities Unconnected to Individual Voter Fraud:

- “Inactive” purge: In St. Louis, approximately 49,589 eligible voters were removed from the active voter rolls and placed on an “inactive list” after postcards allegedly sent to them were returned as undeliverable. At many polling places, the “inactive lists” were not made available, and these voters were allegedly unlawfully instructed that they could not vote at their regular precinct, but instead had to travel to the central city office to wait on lengthy lines to affirm their registered status, and then return to their original polling places to vote. Some voters were still on line at the central office when the polls closed, and were not able to return to their polling places to vote.¹⁷⁴
- Polling place time: In St. Louis, the polls were kept open by court order until 7:45pm, 45 minutes past the original closing time. The lead plaintiff requesting this order was allegedly deceased, although later review showed that the plaintiff’s name had been typed with an incorrect middle initial; the legal filings also stated that this plaintiff had been unable to vote when he had in fact voted. The effort to keep the polls open was alleged to have been conceived before Election Day. The delayed closing time allowed at least 100 voters to vote who otherwise would have arrived at the polls too late to cast a vote.¹⁷⁵
- Court order: At least 342 voters in St. Louis City and 891 voters in St. Louis County were allegedly improperly granted a court order allowing them to vote. The effort to seek court orders was also alleged to have been conceived before Election Day. Most of these voters allegedly gave insufficient reasons for obtaining a court order, although the report arriving at this conclusion stated an inaccurately high threshold for obtaining a court order.¹⁷⁶ 143 of these voters allegedly had not been registered by the voter registration deadline; it is not clear if any of the other voters were ineligible to vote.¹⁷⁷
- Improper election judges: 45 election judges in St. Louis City allegedly not registered to vote were later found to be validly registered; all were thought invalid because of typographical errors.¹⁷⁸
- Inflated voter rolls: St. Louis City had more names registered on the voting rolls than the voting-age population of the city, and 24,000 names were also listed as registered elsewhere in Missouri.¹⁷⁹
- Chain of custody: Ballot boxes were allegedly left unattended at 29 precincts.¹⁸⁰

The Rate of Substantiated Voter Fraud:

- The allegations of fraud related to the 2000 general election, in which 124,752 votes were cast in St. Louis City, 497,577 votes were cast in St. Louis County, and 2,361,586 votes were cast in all of Missouri.¹⁸¹

- There were 6 substantiated cases of Missouri votes cast by ineligible voters, knowingly or unknowingly, except for those votes permitted by court order. These six cases were double votes by four voters – two across state lines and two within Missouri. This amounts to a rate of 0.0003%. None of these problems could have been resolved by requiring photo ID at the polls.
- Even given allegations that were unsubstantiated, the rate of possible fraud remains low. The analysis above lays out the allegations, reasons to question each, and the facts that we now know. But assuming that all 278 of the remaining questionable allegations—including 14 voters with allegedly invalid addresses, 114 allegedly ineligible persons with felony convictions, 68 allegedly double voters (at two votes apiece), and 14 votes in the names of allegedly deceased individuals—in fact represent ineligible votes, that would amount to a rate of 0.045% within St. Louis City and County and 0.012% within the state as a whole. If all 14 votes in the names of allegedly deceased individuals in fact proved fraudulent and were cast in person, these votes—0.002% within St. Louis City and County and 0.0006% within the state as a whole—might possibly have been resolved by requiring photo ID at the polls.

Note: this analysis does not include 228 unsubstantiated cases of alleged double voting across the state reported by the Kansas City Star, because they did not distinguish between votes cast in 2000 and 2002. In the 2002 general election, 1,877,620 votes were cast in Missouri.¹⁸²

Coverage by Existing Law:

- Proper implementation of the federal Help America Vote Act (HAVA), which was passed after (and to some extent, because of) the 2000 election, would have addressed most of these allegations. HAVA requires states to create statewide electronic voter registration lists with each eligible voter listed uniquely to remove duplicate registrations, and to coordinate those computerized lists with agency records on death and conviction in order to remove ineligible voters. Although the obligation to maintain these cleaned lists predated HAVA, the computerized registration rolls — if implemented with suitable controls for accuracy — offer a new and efficient means to do so statewide. Like most states, Missouri did not have a statewide computerized database up and running in 2000, but now that it does, the database should allow the state to sharply reduce even the small number of alleged invalid votes due to allegedly improper registrations.

New Jersey

Just before the 2005 elections, partisan actors attempted to probe the accuracy of New Jersey's voter rolls by comparing them with death records and with the rolls of other states. The reports led to inflated claims of widespread fraud in the 2004 election, of the sort commonly used to support restrictive identification requirements for voters at the polls. We examined each of the allegations of fraud by individual voters—the only sort that ID could possibly address—to uncover the truth behind the assertions.

The Allegations:

- Dead voters: 4,755 votes were alleged to have been cast in the names of dead voters in 2004, based on an attempt to match the first and last name and date of birth from voting records to death records.¹⁸³ No follow-up investigation appears to have been published on the number of votes actually cast in the names of dead voters in 2004, if any. None of the allegedly dead voters actually voted in 2005.¹⁸⁴

- Double voters: 4,397 individuals allegedly voted twice in New Jersey, and 6,572 individuals allegedly voted both in New Jersey and in either New York, Pennsylvania, Florida, North Carolina, or South Carolina, based on an attempt to match the first and last name and date of birth from one set of voting records to another.¹⁸⁵ Analysis of the list of alleged double voters within New Jersey showed that 2,305 of the entries had different middle names or suffixes, or an error in the date of birth.¹⁸⁶ Data errors in Middlesex county, and the statistical likelihood of finding two different individuals with the same name and birthdate, call into question much of the remainder of the list.¹⁸⁷ Ultimately, the existence of eight double voters was substantiated through original signatures on poll book materials.¹⁸⁸

The Rate of Substantiated Voter Fraud:

- The allegations of fraud related to the 2004 general election, in which 3,611,691 votes were cast in New Jersey.¹⁸⁹
- There were eight substantiated cases of individuals knowingly casting invalid votes—eight voters voting twice. This amounts to a rate of 0.0004%. None of these problems could have been resolved by requiring photo ID at the polls.
- Even given allegations that were unsubstantiated, the rate of possible fraud remains low. The analysis above lays out the allegations, reasons to question each, and the facts that we know. But assuming that all 13,419 of the remaining cases in fact involved voter fraud—which is highly unlikely, given the methodological errors revealed in the study of double-voting—that would amount to a rate of 0.61%.

Coverage by Existing Law:

- The federal Help America Vote Act (HAVA) requires states to create statewide electronic voter registration lists, and to coordinate those computerized lists with agency records on death in order to remove ineligible voters. Although the obligation to remove deceased voters from the rolls predated HAVA, the computerized registration rolls — if implemented with suitable controls for accuracy—offer a new and efficient means to do so statewide. Like most states, New Jersey did not have a HAVA-ready statewide database up and running in 2004, but once it does, the database should allow the state both to eliminate duplicate registrations within the state and to cut down on the number of deceased citizens who are still on the rolls.

Wisconsin

The 2004 election was hotly contested in Wisconsin, and various irregularities led to inflated claims of widespread fraud. At the same time, Wisconsin citizens were debating a proposal to require restrictive identification of each voter at the polls, and the fraud claims were used to support the call for ID. We examined each of the allegations of fraud by individual voters—the only sort that ID could possibly address—to uncover the truth behind the assertions.

The Allegations:

- Invalid addresses: Based on an attempt to match voter roll entries to the U.S. Postal Service's database of street addresses, 37,180 people in Milwaukee were alleged to have registered from invalid addresses. Of these, 31,500 listed accurate street addresses, but had problems with an apartment number. Further review of the remaining allegedly invalid addresses revealed cases in which the list was corrupted; digits were dropped on some entries, making otherwise valid addresses appear fictitious. This review also showed typos turning valid addresses into invalid ones. Though reporters following up on the story could not locate 68 listed addresses, at least 400 addresses were affirmatively proven to be valid. The bipartisan Milwaukee Election Commission ultimately threw out a challenge lodged to 5,619 of the entries, citing insufficient evidence that the registrations were invalid. Still, poll workers were specifically instructed to ask challenged voters for proof of residency, so every voter on the list of 5,619 should have been asked for proof of proper residency.¹⁹⁰

1,242 Milwaukee votes were cast from allegedly invalid addresses, based on another computerized match; this match paired voter rolls with U.S. Postal Service and City of Milwaukee property lists, with spot checks of 40 specific addresses.¹⁹¹

A sample of 300 of the entries showed that about 20% of the invalid addresses were attributed to data entry errors (e.g., "3130 S. 15th Place" became "3130 S. 15th St.," and "S. 68th St." became "S. 63rd St."). At least two other addresses ostensibly deemed business locations were found to be valid residences after an individual spot-check. Furthermore, 75% of these votes were from Election Day registrants, who were required to show proof of residence at the polls.¹⁹²

- Faulty registration cards: In Milwaukee, 10,921 voter registration cards from Election Day voters were allegedly unable to be processed. This allegation turned out to be an error; in fact, 1,305 Election Day registration cards from Milwaukee could not be processed. 548 of these listed no address, and 48 cards listed no name, but voters had to show both proof of name and proof of residence to register on Election Day. 236 cards had missing or incomplete dates of birth, 28 had no signature, 141 listed addresses outside of the city limits, and 23 were deemed illegible. 155 cards were not processed because they had not been given a voter number by the city. It is unclear why the remaining 126 cards could not be processed.¹⁹³

3,600 address verification cards mailed using information entered from these Election Day registrations were returned as allegedly undeliverable. ¹⁹⁴ We are not aware of any further public investigation of these cards. ¹⁹⁵

2,200 address verification cards from outside of Milwaukee, mailed using information entered from Election Day registrations, were also returned as allegedly undeliverable.¹⁹⁶

313 of these were from Racine: 207 were returned because the voter moved after the election, and at least 24 addresses were entered incorrectly by election workers.¹⁹⁷

Of the 1,887 returned address verifications of Election Day registrations from elsewhere around the state, 1,198 were returned because the voter moved after the election or was temporarily absent when the card arrived; 610 showed a valid address but the individual could not be found there; 36 had an incorrect street number; 2 had an incorrect street name; 9 had a missing apartment number; 9 were sent to an address with no mailbox; 2 were sent to vacant addresses; and 21 were returned for some other reason.¹⁹⁸

- Ineligible by conviction: The organizers of one pre-election jailhouse absentee ballot drive conducted a records check on 400 inmates who had signed up, found 18 ineligible, and alerted election officials; no votes were cast by these ineligible persons.¹⁹⁹

376 individuals allegedly rendered ineligible by felony conviction cast ballots, based on an attempt to match voter rolls and information from the Department of Corrections.²⁰⁰

96 individuals listed as voting in Milwaukee matched name, address, and birthdate against Department of Correction records, and 182 individuals listed as voting matched only name and address. At least one appears to have been erroneously listed as voting; he is listed as voting but claims that he did not, while his wife is not listed as voting, but did cast a ballot. Another 98 people listed as voting elsewhere around the state matched name, address, and birthdate against Department of Correction records, but at least 7 were convicted after the election, and were eligible at the time they cast their ballot.²⁰¹

13 voters have been formally charged with fraudulently voting while ineligible; of these, 7 have been convicted, 1 voter was acquitted, 1 case was dismissed upon evidence that the voter was eligible when voting, 2 cases were dismissed for other reasons, and 2 cases were dismissed despite evidence that the voter was ineligible. In one of the latter cases, the voter provided his Department of Corrections identification card at the polls, which had "OFFENDER" printed in bold letters across the face, but was not told that he was ineligible to vote.²⁰²

3 others were documented as voting while ineligible but have not been charged. An additional voter documented as ineligible was found in 2006.²⁰³

- Double voters: A computer glitch in Milwaukee caused at least 314 voters who re-registered before or on Election Day to be listed twice on the rolls, with a notation of voting next to each listing. Each was given only a single ballot.²⁰⁴

83 people allegedly voted twice; 14 allegedly voted both absentee and in person, 9 allegedly voted in Milwaukee and other cities, 59 allegedly voted twice in Milwaukee, and 1 allegedly voted twice in Madison.²⁰⁵

Of the 59 voters alleged to have voted twice in Milwaukee, most registered twice but voted only once. 51 were cleared by investigators, 1 was acquitted at trial, 1 received no verdict at trial, and 1 was found incompetent to stand trial. Finally, another voter named Gloria Bell believes that she was confused with a woman named Gloria Bell-Piphus.²⁰⁶

Of the 9 voters alleged to have voted both in Milwaukee and in another city, all 9 were cleared of wrongdoing: clerical and scanning errors by poll workers accounted for 6 of the voters, 2 were fathers and sons alleged to be the same person, and 1 had a different middle name and birthdate from his alleged double.

Of the 14 voters alleged to have voted both absentee and in person, in at least 12 cases, after comparing absentee records to poll records, the absentee ballot was not counted.²⁰⁷

- Dead voters: 4 votes were cast in the names of allegedly dead people.²⁰⁸ These were all absentee ballots, cast by individuals who died within two weeks of the election; it is not clear whether the ballots were cast before the individuals died.²⁰⁹
- Impersonation: 1 vote was allegedly cast in the name of an individual who did not vote.²¹⁰ Further investigation of the alleged vote cast in the name of another was determined to be a clerical error by a poll worker.²¹¹
- Fictitious voters: 2 votes were allegedly cast in the name of an individual who could not be verified as an actual individual.²¹² These votes were cast in the name of Marquis F. Murff, who could not be verified by a reporter as an actual individual. We are not aware of any further public investigation.²¹³
- Underage voter: One ballot was cast by a 17-year-old voter, using his real birthdate.²¹⁴
- Noncitizen: One columnist reported that a ballot was allegedly cast by a Canadian legal permanent resident. We are not aware of any further public investigation.²¹⁵
- Faulty registration: Four individuals allegedly submitted false voter registration applications.²¹⁶ 2 Milwaukee residents were convicted for submitting false voter registration applications; 1 person alleged to have supervised two others who turned in false forms was also convicted, but that conviction was overturned.

The trial of one other individual accused of submitting false registration applications is still pending. No votes were alleged to have been cast under these registrations.²¹⁷

Additional Allegations of Irregularities Unconnected to Individual Voter Fraud:

- “Extra” ballots: In Milwaukee, there were allegedly 8,300 more ballots cast than individuals processed as voting; the gap was later narrowed to 4,609. The discrepancy was later attributed to administrative error in reconciling poll book logs with ballots, and at least one typographical error in reporting results.²¹⁸
- Election Day interference: In Milwaukee, tires on 20 get-out-the-vote vans were allegedly slashed.²¹⁹
- Uncounted ballots: 238 valid absentee ballots from Milwaukee were counted late.²²⁰
- Uncounted votes: 600 valid votes were allegedly not counted in Medford due to a computer error.²²¹
- Unprocessed registration cards: Eight boxes of valid registration cards were allegedly not processed in order to put voters on the rolls by the time individuals arrived at the polls.²²²

The Rate of Substantiated Voter Fraud:

- The allegations of voter fraud related to the 2004 general elections, in which 277,565 votes were cast in Milwaukee, and 2,997,007 votes were cast in all of Wisconsin.²²³
- There were 7 substantiated cases of individuals knowingly casting invalid votes—all persons with felony convictions. This amounts to a rate of 0.0025% within Milwaukee and 0.0002% within the state as a whole. None of these problems could have been resolved by requiring photo ID at the polls.
- There were 11 substantiated cases of votes cast by ineligible Milwaukee voters—all persons with felony convictions. There are 8 substantiated cases of votes cast by ineligible voters from other parts of the state — 2 persons with felony convictions, 1 foreign national, 1 17-year-old voter, and 4 absentee ballots cast by deceased voters. That amounts to a rate of 0.004% within Milwaukee and 0.0006% in the state as a whole. None of these problems could have been resolved by requiring photo ID at the polls.
- Even given allegations that were unsubstantiated, the rate of possible fraud remains low. The analysis above lays out the allegations, reasons to question each, and the facts that we now know. But assuming that all 6,877 of the remaining questionable allegations — including 1,150 voter registration cards not processed, 5,356 allegedly flawed addresses, 353 other allegedly ineligible persons with convictions, 8 allegedly double voters (for a total of 16 votes), and 2 votes from the allegedly fictitious individual — in fact represent ineligible votes, that would amount to a rate of 2.2% within Milwaukee and 0.2% within the state as a whole. None of these votes could have been resolved by requiring photo ID at the polls.

Coverage by Existing Law:

- The vast majority of these allegations would have been addressed by adequate implementation of existing law. Elections officials should have been able to correct incomplete or illegible registration cards on site; the requirement of proof of residence for Election Day registrants should have caught invalid addresses on Election Day. Addresses of voters registering before Election Day could have been carefully investigated before Election Day — by an investigation more thorough than a computer match, and attuned to the possibility of data entry errors. If the investigation revealed questions, as occurred here, the questioned voters could have been validly challenged by election officials, and asked to verify their residence; if an investigation revealed fraud rather than error or a valid change of residence, the case could be referred for prosecutorial follow-through. Similarly, as occurred here, absentee ballots should have been matched against poll records to determine if a duplicate had been cast.
- Proper implementation of the federal Help America Vote Act (HAVA) would have addressed most of the remaining allegations. HAVA requires states to create statewide electronic voter registration lists with each eligible voter listed uniquely to remove duplicate registrations, and to coordinate those computerized lists with agency records on death and conviction in order to remove ineligible voters. Although the obligation to maintain these cleaned lists predated HAVA, the computerized registration rolls — if implemented with suitable controls for accuracy — offer a new and efficient means to do so statewide. Like most states, Wisconsin did not have a HAVA-ready statewide database up and running in 2004, but once it does, the database should allow the state to sharply reduce even the small number of alleged invalid votes due to allegedly improper registrations.

16 Most proposals to require photo identification of voters do not address the absentee voting process, where fraud through forgery or undue influence, often directly implicating candidates or their close associates, is far more of a threat. 143 Many states now prohibit compensating registration workers per registration form submitted. See, e.g., Colo. Rev. Stat. § 1-2-703; Fla. Stat. § 104.012(3); Ga. Code § 21-2-602; Iowa Code § 48A.25; Ky. Rev. Stat. § 119.207; Mo. Ann. Stat. § 115.203; Nev. Rev. Stat. § 293.805; Ohio Rev. Code § 3599.111; 25 Pa. Cons. Stat. § 1713; S.D. Wolcott, Crime Watch: Female Deputies to be Honored, L.A. Times, Nov. 6, 2000, at B1 (woman registered her daughters and fictitious others).

146 This is not to say that most of the cases of election irregularity that are prosecuted have anything to do with registration fraud. Of the 95 cases brought by the Department of Justice's Ballot Access and Voting Integrity Initiative between October 2002 and September 2005, for example, 47 concerned alleged vote buying schemes, 21 concerned alleged noncitizen registration and/or voting, 11 concerned voting by people allegedly rendered ineligible because of conviction, 8 concerned alleged double votes, 3 concerned an attempt to jam phone lines of get-out-the-vote operations, 2 concerned allegedly fraudulent registrations, and 1 concerned ballot-box stuffing by an election judge. See U.S. Dept. of Justice, Criminal Division, Public Integrity Section, Election Fraud Prosecutions & Convictions, Ballot Access & Voting Integrity Initiative, October 2002 — September 2005 [hereinafter DOJ Election Fraud Prosecutions], at <http://www.truthaboutfraud.org/pdf/doj%20election%20fraud%20prosecutions.pdf>. As of October 2007, the government had secured convictions in 66% of these cases.

We note that none of the crimes prosecuted in this period could possibly have been prevented by requiring photo identification at the polls.

149 In California in 2005 and 2006, for example, one group registered voters into a political party either without the knowledge of, or against the wishes of, the voters themselves. ABOUT THE BRENNAN CENTER FOR JUSTICE

The Brennan Center for Justice at New York University School of Law is a non-partisan public policy and law institute that focuses on fundamental issues of democracy and justice. Our work ranges from voting rights to redistricting reform, from access to the courts to presidential power in the fight against terrorism. A singular institution—part think tank, part public interest law firm, part advocacy group—the Brennan Center combines scholarship, legislative and legal advocacy, and communications to win meaningful, measurable change in the public sector.

ABOUT THE BRENNAN CENTER'S
VOTING RIGHTS AND ELECTIONS PROJECT

The Voting Rights and Elections Project works to expand the franchise, to make it as simple as possible for every eligible American to vote, and to ensure that every vote cast is accurately recorded and counted. The Center's staff provides top-flight legal and policy assistance on a broad range of election administration issues, including voter registration systems, voting technology, voter identification, statewide voter registration list maintenance, and provisional ballots.

2004 Election Fraud Reading List

Evidence of Electoral Fraud in the 2004 U.S. Presidential Election
by Michael Keefer
15 November 2004

This reading list has been prepared with the aim of making a wide range of readings on the subject of the integrity—or the lack of integrity—of the recent U.S. presidential election readily available.

I have sought to facilitate analytical use of the texts listed here by dividing them into five groups under the following headings:

1. The Openness of New Voting Technologies to Fraud;
2. Allegations and Evidence of Fraud in Recent U.S. Elections;
3. Advance Warnings of Fraud in the 2004 Presidential Election;
4. Allegations and Evidence of Fraud in the 2004 Presidential Election;
5. Allegations and Evidence of a Cover-up of Electoral Fraud.

Some important writings which deal with more than one of these issues -- among them Bev Harris's ground-breaking book Black Box Voting, Andrew Gumbel's assessment of the threat to democracy posed by the new voting technologies, and Steven Freeman's analysis of exit poll discrepancies -- appear under more than one of the five headings.

Even at this early stage, less than two weeks after the presidential election, a growing accumulation of evidence points to the conclusion that the official vote tallies -- listed by The New York Times at were produced by a massive and sustained project of electoral fraud.

<http://www.nytimes.com/ref/elections2004/2004President.html>

9.19 The Distortion of Science for Political Gain

Union of Concerned Scientists: White House Distorts Research Data for Political Ends

More than 60 of the nation's top researchers, including 20 Nobel laureates, signed a report in late February charging that the Bush administration has misrepresented scientific findings -- including those by academic researchers -- to support its policies. The report, published by the Union of Concerned Scientists, also recounted unusual steps by the administration to block appointments of qualified scientists to advisory panels because the candidates opposed the president's policies.

In examining the charges made in the report of the Union of Concerned Scientists, an advocacy group best known for its work promoting nuclear disarmament, The Chronicle interviewed several academic researchers and looked at Bush-administration decisions on obesity and on workplace injury that were not covered in the report.

On those issues and others, including global climate change, both the UCS and other scientists interviewed by The Chronicle assert that the Bush administration has repeatedly stated that the existing research is uncertain or inadequate in order to justify not taking action to correct problems. They see the president's insistence on more research before making some decisions related to science as motivated primarily by his desire to protect business and industry from the costs and changes suggested by scientific findings.

Scientists are particularly worried by proposed federal guidelines under which peer-review panels would evaluate the scientific findings that support regulatory actions by federal agencies. The guidelines would encourage agencies to think twice before appointing scientists who had received research grants from those agencies. Critics say the plan could exclude top scientists who have supported regulations opposed by industry.

The Bush administration "has the right to make whatever policy they want, and we're not criticizing that," says David Michaels, a research professor of environmental occupational health at George Washington University, who signed the report. "But time and time again, the administration pretends the science supports their position."

<http://chronicle.com/free/v50/i26/26a01801.htm>

Bush Administration Distorts Science

The Bush administration has distorted scientific fact leading to policy decisions on the environment, health, biomedical research and nuclear weaponry, a group of about 60 scientists, including 20 Nobel laureates, said in a statement on Wednesday.

...

The scientists listed various policy issues as being unfairly influenced by the administration, including those concerning climate change, mercury emissions, reproductive health, lead poisoning in children, workplace safety and nuclear weapons. New regulations and laws are necessary to fix the situation, the statement says.

"We found a serious pattern of undermining science by the Bush administration, and it crosses disciplines, whether it's global climate change or reproductive health or mercury in the food chain or forestry -- the list goes on and on," said Kevin Knobloch, president of the Union of Concerned Scientists.

<http://www.wired.com/news/medtech/0,1286,62339,00.html>

Obscuring the Truth About Global Climate Change

Since taking office, the Bush administration has consistently sought to undermine the public's understanding of the view held by the vast majority of climate scientists that human-caused emissions of carbon dioxide and other heat-trapping gases are making a discernible contribution to global warming.

After coming to office, the administration asked the National Academy of Sciences (NAS) to review the findings of the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC) and provide further assessment of what climate science could say about this issue. The NAS panel rendered a strong opinion, which, in essence, confirmed that of the IPCC. The American Geophysical Union, the world's largest organization of earth scientists, has also released a strong statement describing human-caused disruptions of Earth's climate. Yet Bush administration spokespersons continue to contend that the uncertainties in climate projections and fossil fuel emissions are too great to warrant mandatory action to slow emissions.

In May 2002, President Bush expressed disdain for a State Department report to the United Nations that pointed to a clear human role in the accumulation of heat-trapping gases and detailed the likely negative consequences of climate change; the president called it "a report put out by the bureaucracy." In September 2002, the administration removed a section on climate change from the Environmental Protection Agency's (EPA) annual air pollution report,⁷ even though the climate issue had been discussed in the report for the preceding five years.

Then, in one well-documented case, the Bush administration blatantly tampered with the integrity of scientific analysis at a federal agency when, in June 2003, the White House tried to make a series of changes to the EPA's draft Report on the Environment.

Destruction of Public Lands

Cattle Star Redactica

In developing new proposed regulations for cattle grazing on public lands, the Bush administration intentionally obscured the damage grazing causes, according to two government scientists. Erick Campbell and Bill Brookes, both recently retired from the Bureau of Land Management, determined in an environmental impact statement that the new rules, which would increase grazing on 160 million acres of public land, would harm water resources and wildlife, including endangered species. But in the statement accompanying the newly released regulations, lo, the science has been transformed. The rules, which once would have had a "significant adverse impact," are now "beneficial to animals." (Well, cows are animals, we suppose.) They would restrain BLM staffers from acting quickly to limit grazing that's damaging land; lengthy studies would now be required instead. And public input on grazing decisions would no longer be mandated, merely allowed. While a BLM official calls the changes part of the agency's standard review process, Campbell and Brookes are dismayed. "They rewrote everything," says Campbell. "It's a crime."

Areas Once Immune to Manipulation

In August 2003, at the request of Rep. Henry A. Waxman, the Democratic staff of the Government Reform Committee in the U.S. House of Representatives assessed the treatment of science and scientists by the Bush Administration. The resulting report -- Politics and Science in the Bush Administration -- found numerous instances where the Administration has manipulated the scientific process and distorted or suppressed scientific findings. These actions go far beyond the typical shifts in policy that occur with a change in the political party occupying the White House. Thirteen years ago, former President George H.W. Bush stated that "[n]ow more than ever, on issues ranging from climate change to AIDS research . . . government relies on the impartial perspective of science for guidance." Today, President George W. Bush's Administration has skewed this impartial perspective, generating unprecedented criticism from the scientific community and even from prominent Republicans who once led federal agencies.

The Administration's political interference with science has led to misleading statements by the President, inaccurate responses to Congress, altered web sites, suppressed agency reports, erroneous international communications, and the gagging of scientists. The subjects involved span a broad range, but they share a common attribute: the beneficiaries of the scientific distortions are important supporters of the President, including social conservatives and powerful industry groups.

Visit the Committee on Government Reform Minority Office for the latest news on the ongoing interference with science by the Bush Administration.

Deck Stacked Against Scientists Who Disagree with Policy

By Kristen Philipkoski

Feb, 03, 2004

Under the guise of promoting sound science, the Bush administration is advancing a policy that could make it more difficult for federal agencies to protect health and the environment, U.S. scientists say.

A White House Office of Management and Budget, or OMB, bulletin (PDF) drafted in August 2003 would allow the government to hand-pick scientists to second-guess scientific research, opponents say. The text of the bulletin says its purpose would be to ensure that all research affecting federal regulations, such as environmental or health advisories, would be thoroughly peer reviewed by unbiased researchers.

But scientists feel the government is commandeering a term that is near and dear to their hearts.

Peer review is the backbone of all serious science. It's a process by which top experts in a given field examine research for flaws, and often send it back to researchers for more work before it's disseminated to the public. But scientists say the White House version of peer review would allow the government to stack review committees in favor of the government and industry.

"It wouldn't be peer review as we're used to," said William Schlesinger, president of the Ecological Society of America, which represents 8,000 scientists in academia, government and industry.

The OMB bulletin would require that peer reviewers be "independent of the agency" involved when it comes to "significant regulatory information." Experts receiving funding from the agency involved, who have performed multiple peer reviews for that agency in recent years or just one review on the same topic, would be eliminated as potential reviewers.

That would eliminate the top experts in a given field, scientists said in letters responding to the bulletin.

Bush's Lysenkoism and the Distortion of Intelligence

by Winston Smith

'Lysenkoism' is a vague term for a complex and fuzzy phenomenon. Roughly and for my purposes here, to engage in Lysekoism is to distort science in order to bring it into line with political orthodoxy.

(A) It is well-known (though not well enough known) that the Bush administration is Lysenkoist, though it isn't often put in those terms. This administration has suppressed or distorted scientific conclusions about - among many other topics - global warming, the effectiveness of abstinence-only sex education, drilling in the ANWR, and air quality in Manhattan after 9/11 in order to force science to conform (or appear to conform) to the administration's antecedently-accepted political beliefs. Henry Waxman's Politics and Science website is an invaluable resource for information on the political distortion of science in the Bush administration.

(B) It is also reasonably clear that the Bush administration distorted evidence about Iraq's WMDs and its links to al Qaeda in the run up to the Iraq war. This case is made persuasively in several places, most recently in a report by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, "WMD in Iraq: Evidence and Implications."

What is usually overlooked, however, is that A and B are merely two instances of the same general phenomenon. Intelligence gathering and analysis is a kind of science. It is in particular a kind of social science, aiming, like so many other kinds of social science, to discern the beliefs, intentions and actions of certain groups of people. Of course intelligence agencies often study groups that prefer to conceal their beliefs and intentions from us and that want to hurt us; but, although this adds a certain practical element of urgency to the equation, it doesn't change anything fundamental: intelligence gathering and analysis, when done correctly, is in large part a kind of science, even if a more practical and less theoretical kind of science, more like the science of nutrition than astrophysics. And, of course, Lysenkoism itself is simply a particular instance of an even more general phenomenon we could call logical preposterism--starting with your conclusion and evaluating evidence as good or bad depending on whether it supports this antecedently-accepted conclusion. Reasoning this way is preposterous in the literal sense of putting what is supposed to come last (the conclusion) first; in fact, it isn't really reasoning at all, but, rather, rationalization.

In seeking to manipulate and distort the findings of our intelligence agencies about Iraq, the Bush Administration was merely doing what it has done since it took office - dogmatically distorting and suppressing evidence in the service of advancing conclusions arrived at for political reasons, and putting political pressure on experts to go along with the deception.

What happened in the build-up to the Iraq war should have come as no surprise to those who had been observing the Administration's general attitude to science and rational inquiry. In this, the postmodern presidency, belief need no longer conform to fact; on the contrary, facts are flexible things which must be made to conform to inflexible opinion. T. D. Lysenko has risen from the grave.

9.20 Tommy Thompson: Corruption Trumps Truth

Bush Administration's Health and Human Services Secretary Blocks The New CDC Recommendations on Acceptable Exposure to Lead in Young Children by Kicking Respected Scientists Off His Committee

The Committee's charge is to assess scientific data on lead and recommend changes to CDC policy to prevent childhood lead poisoning. The Committee also advises CDC on its blood lead level limit standard for children. In the summer of 2002, just weeks before the Committee was due to begin its latest review of scientific data to determine if a revision of the federal lead-poisoning standard was necessary, the Bush Administration stepped in, drastically changing the composition of the Committee.

Anticipating that the current committee would likely rule in favor of lowering the level of concern for elevated blood lead, Tommy Thompson, secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS), removed respected pediatric lead experts from the panel, and rejected the nominations of scientists with established expertise in the health effects associated with childhood lead poisoning.

Newly vacant seats were then filled by individuals with direct ties to the lead industry, clear financial conflicts of interest, and limited expertise on the issue of childhood lead poisoning. The resulting shift in the composition of the panel contributed to the CDC's recommendation not to lower the level of concern for elevations of blood lead below 10 $\mu\text{g}/\text{dL}$, even as the Center acknowledged research that has confirmed serious, permanent cognitive and academic defects at blood lead levels below 10 $\mu\text{g}/\text{dL}$ (CDC CLPPP 2004).

Toxic: The Lead Industry Gets Its Turn

by Jonathan Cohn
The New Republic

You didn't have to be a fortune-teller to see that the October meeting of the Advisory Committee on Childhood Lead Poisoning Prevention was going to be more controversial than usual. The panel, which advises the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC), had been gearing up for a few months to consider whether the federal standard for lead poisoning, set in 1991, should be even tougher. The answer was likely to be yes, given new research linking even modest lead exposure to developmental problems in children.

But, just a few weeks before the meeting, the Bush administration shook up the advisory committee's membership. When it came time to fill a group of vacancies on the panel this year, Secretary of Health and Human Services (HHS) Tommy Thompson rejected several nominees recommended by the staff scientists at the CDC in favor of five people who seemed likely to look upon further tightening of lead regulations skeptically, if not to oppose it outright.

One of the nominees had repeatedly stated that the current standard -- endorsed by everybody from the National Academy of Sciences to the American Academy of Pediatrics--was too strict. Another had stated that children could tolerate lead levels seven times the current standard without suffering cognitive harm. Even more disturbing, at least two of the new appointees had direct financial ties to the lead industry: One was a consultant whose clients included a prominent lead-smelting company fighting a lawsuit over pollution in Washington state. Another, a pediatric toxicologist from Oklahoma, had been a paid defense witness in several liability suits against lead-paint companies.

9.21 Proposed National ID Cards Would Introduce Two Classes of American Citizen

ChoicePoint at the Forefront Again?

In the growing library of books dissecting how and why the Sept. 11 attacks happened, perhaps none offers a more exhaustive account of the government's problems verifying people's identities than the 723-page After (Simon & Schuster, 2003), penned by attorney and former journalist Steven Brill, the founder of media commentary magazine Brill's Content.

In the epilogue to After, in which he proposes ways to prevent another Sept. 11, Brill writes that government and the private sector should implement "some kind of credible but voluntary nationally accepted identification card," which would give its holders access to fast lanes at airline security checkpoints, public buildings and sporting and performance arenas. No more waiting in line for lengthy body searches. Pre-screened card holders would be deemed nonthreatening.

Following the release of the book, Brill founded Verified Identity Card Inc. The first people he called, Brill says now, were Derek Smith and Jim Zimbardi of ChoicePoint [the company which produced the Florida "felon purge list" it knew to be inaccurate in 2000, and thereby propelled George Bush illegitimately into the US Presidency]. They agreed to join forces.

ChoicePoint wants to be able to check card applicants' names against the government's terrorist watch lists, to which ChoicePoint currently has access when working with federal agencies. TransCore, which manufactures the E-Z Pass device that motorists use when zipping through electronic tollbooths, also joined the consortium, as did the Washington-based Civitas Group, a homeland security venture capital firm whose members include Sandy Berger, President Clinton's national security adviser.

Brill sees his card -- which may not be a new card but simply a chip embedded in the holder's credit card -- as an invention of necessity. Checking everyone who boards a plane or enters a large office building, like Rockefeller Center in New York, where Brill keeps his offices, wastes time and money, he says.

The government shouldn't try implementing its own card system, he argues, because most places people frequent are privately owned. Businesses are better-suited to this task, and can do it more effectively, he argues.

Checking everyone also creates needless redundancy. Brill recalls the day that Berger -- whom he calls "a close friend of mine" -- came to Brill's offices to discuss the card project, but got stuck in a security line in the lobby. By the nature of his former job, Berger received the highest security clearance, Brill says. Yet, he waited in line behind a deli employee bearing the sandwiches Berger and Brill were about to eat.

The Brill-ChoicePoint card would ensure Berger didn't have to wait like that again. But it apparently would also create two new classes of people: Trusted and untrusted. Asked if that's the case, Brill says, "I wouldn't say trusted versus untrusted. I'd say, trusted versus not-yet-trusted."

ChoicePoint will distinguish between the two. This is familiar territory. As Smith wrote, information lets its owners grant people privileges and rights within society. There's no precedent for companies -- or government -- assuming this authority on the massive scale that a national identity card or many of ChoicePoint's security strategies envision.

Brill writes in After that the government should "push the debate" about these programs. But the debate isn't occurring on a large scale. There's barely a vocabulary for it.

Privacy and civil liberties advocates have battled the government for years over alleged violations of privacy laws and the Fourth Amendment. But those statutes never foresaw that privately run corporations would have more power to know the details of people's lives than government.

Bush administration officials stress that privacy sits at the center of all of their homeland security initiatives. But they repeatedly warn of the imminent threat of terrorism, and depict likely attackers as shadowy and difficult to understand.

ChoicePoint has found its niche discerning what is hard to grasp. And for that reason, the company and its data will grow more and more valuable to the government.

Department of Homeland Security to OUTSOURCE REAL ID

National ID Card Scheme To Be Run By Big Data

Thereby Bypassing Constitutional Constraints

WASHINGTON, DC (11 January 2007). The Department of Homeland Security plans to outsource REAL ID implementation to third-party data aggregators, according to official DHS documents.

The Department of Homeland Security has finished their proposed regulations for implementing the Real ID Act and has sent them to the Office of Management and Budget for approval. The publication of DHS's REAL ID regulations will follow shortly. The compliance guidelines are almost one year overdue.

According to a still-secret several hundred-page dossier sent last week by DHS to the Office of Management and Budget, DHS considered three ways to implement the REAL ID Act:

Plan A: Order the individual states to find a way of communicating data to one another. This idea was given short shrift by DHS, who dismissed it out of hand.

Plan B: Have DHS build a centralized database for the states to query before issuing REAL ID-compliant drivers licenses. This idea was also rejected.

Plan C: Have a private data aggregator act as the central database. This is the plan advocated by DHS. The plan calls for the outsourcing of all drivers license and ID card checks to a private corporation, who would then charge the states for each check performed.

DHS head Michael Chertoff personally ordered this option to be chosen, according to a senior administration source.

What does this all mean? Quite simply, this is the outsourcing of our Constitutional rights. It means that all privacy protections on our drivers license data will be removed once the DMV sends your data to the private corporation.

If it's possible to create a scheme worse than a national ID card, this is it: a privatized National ID card. The citizens of every state will not only be at the mercy of a company like ChoicePoint or Acxiom to 'approve' their identity, but will have no privacy protections whatsoever on that data.

Your sensitive drivers license data can be bought and sold along with everything else these companies sell, such as your credit information. The federal government can then gain access to this information without having to comply with any laws, such as the Privacy Act.

Americans Under Constant Surveillance/All Associations Trackable and Compilable

People who are easily and constantly tracked by a central authority are not free people.

Moreover, when everyone is tracked, their associations are tracked as well. In 1965, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) refused to give the State of Georgia a list of Georgia members for fear that the people listed would be harassed or harmed. The U.S. Supreme Court backed the NAACP, arguing that we are free to associate without being tracked and watched.

The U.S. Courts and Congress have repeatedly recognized that people under constant surveillance are not free.

<http://www.cpsr.org/issues/privacy/natidfaq>

The Cards Are Coming

In a vote that largely divided along party lines, the U.S. House of Representatives approved a Republican-backed measure that would compel states to design their driver's licenses by 2008 to comply with federal antiterrorist standards. Federal employees would reject licenses or identity cards that don't comply, which could curb Americans' access to everything from airplanes to national parks and some courthouses.

The congressional maneuvering takes place as governments are growing more interested in implanting technology in ID cards to make them smarter and more secure. The U.S. State Department soon will begin issuing passports with radio frequency identification, or RFID, chips embedded in them, and Virginia may become the first state to glue RFID tags into all its driver's licenses.

"Supporters claim it is not a national ID because it is voluntary," Rep. Ron Paul of Texas, one of the eight Republicans to object to the measure, said during the floor debate this week. "However, any state that opts out will automatically make nonpersons out of its citizens. They will not be able to fly or to take a train."

Frequently Asked Questions: About Identity Cards

This report provides an analysis of the key aspects of identity (ID) cards and related technologies. It has been prepared by Privacy International in the wake of widespread concern across the world about the implications of modern ID systems. Our intention here is to discuss the evidence at an international level and to promote debate about the claims made about such card systems.

Hackers Clone E-Passports

by Kim Zetter

A German computer security consultant has shown that he can clone the electronic passports that the United States and other countries are beginning to distribute this year.

The controversial e-passports contain radio frequency ID, or RFID, chips that the U.S. State Department and others say will help thwart document forgery. But Lukas Grunwald, a security consultant with DN-Systems in Germany and an RFID expert, says the data in the chips is easy to copy.

9.22 Mandatory GPS Tracking in American Motor Vehicles

"Another Step on the Way to a State Not Even George Orwell Would Have Envisioned"

Where You're Driving! Right this Very Minute!
December 24, 2005

Merry Christmas! Santa knows if you've been bad or good. The U.S. Department of Transportation wants to know where you're driving. Where you're driving, right this very minute, tracking you in real-time using GPS. If the GPS signal is obstructed, your car's engine will turn off, Citizen!

The Department of Transportation claims: this will allow taxes to be calibrated to road usage. Of course, a gasoline tax already does that.

But there's much more than just taxes at stake. DOT won't restrict government access to the data. Of course, cops never misuse government databases for personal stalking. And the government never singles out non-criminals for tracking. And government employees never use government data to blackmail or harass enemies. And besides, you have nothing to hide: you're as innocent as a fifteen year old girl! You never park near a strip club, a gay bar, a gun show, a mosque, or a political demonstration, right? Right? Well, you won't now, Citizen!

Don't worry citizen! You'll like being tracked by GPS; DOT plans to spend your tax dollars buying editorials to tell you you do! And real-time GPS tracking is much shinier than old-school Russian internal passports or Apartheid-era passbooks or other paper documents!

E-Tracking: Coming to a DMV Close to You

By Declan McCullagh
December 5, 2005,

Trust federal bureaucrats to take a good idea and transform it into a frightening proposal to track Americans wherever they drive.

The U.S. Department of Transportation has been handing millions of dollars to state governments for GPS-tracking pilot projects designed to track vehicles wherever they go. So far, Washington state and Oregon have received fat federal checks to figure out how to levy these "mileage-based road user fees."

Now electronic tracking and taxing may be coming to a DMV near you. The Office of Transportation Policy Studies, part of the Federal Highway Administration, is about to announce another round of grants totaling some $11 million. A spokeswoman on Friday said the office is "shooting for the end of the year" for the announcement, and more money is expected for GPS (Global Positioning System) tracking efforts.

In principle, the idea of what bureaucrats like to call "value pricing" for cars makes sound economic sense. No policy bans police from automatically sending out speeding tickets based on what the GPS data say.

Airlines and hotels have long charged less for off-peak use. Toll roads would be more efficient--in particular, less congested--if they could follow the same model and charge virtually nothing in the middle of the night but high prices during rush hour.

That price structure would encourage drivers to take public transportation, use alternate routes, or leave earlier or later in the day.

The problem, though, is that these "road user fee" systems are being designed and built in a way that strips drivers of their privacy and invites constant surveillance by police, the FBI and the Department of Homeland Security.

Zero privacy protections

Details of the tracking systems vary. But the general idea is that a small GPS device, which knows its location by receiving satellite signals, is placed inside the vehicle.

Some GPS trackers constantly communicate their location back to the state DMV, while others record the location information for later retrieval. (In the Oregon pilot project, it's beamed out wirelessly when the driver pulls into a gas station.)

The problem, though, is that no privacy protections exist. No restrictions prevent police from continually monitoring, without a court order, the whereabouts of every vehicle on the road.

One study prepared for the Transportation Department predicts a PR success. "Less than 7 percent of the respondents expressed concerns about recording their vehicle's movements," it says.

That whiff of victory, coupled with a windfall of new GPS-enabled tax dollars, has emboldened DMV bureaucrats. A proposal from the Oregon DMV, also funded by the Transportation Department, says that such a tracking system should be mandatory for all "newly purchased vehicles and newly registered vehicles."

9.23 Tracking Implants in the Bodies of Americans

RFID Central: Clearing House for Privacy Issues and News

<http://www.spychips.com/>

Subdermal RFID Chip Provokes Furor

Well, it's already been widely reported, but we reckon it's Vulture Central's turn to chip in its two cents' worth to the subdermal RFID chip debate.

To summarise, US cybercorporation Applied Digital Solutions has developed the so-called "VeriChip", a "miniaturised, implantable radio frequency identification device (RFID) that has the potential to be used in a variety of personal identification, security, financial, and potential healthcare applications."

Sounds good. Here's the full gen from the company: "About the size of a grain of rice, each VeriChip product contains a unique verification number that is captured by briefly passing a proprietary scanner over the VeriChip. The standard location of the microchip is in the triceps area between the elbow and the shoulder of the right arm. The brief outpatient 'chipping' procedure lasts just a few minutes and involves only local anesthetic followed by quick, painless insertion of the VeriChip. Once inserted just under the skin, the VeriChip is inconspicuous to the naked eye. A small amount of radio frequency energy passes from the scanner energizing the dormant VeriChip, which then emits a radio frequency signal transmitting the verification number."

The aforementioned financial benefits to humanity come in the form of "VeriPay," which uses the chip for cash and credit transactions. This is not the first time RFID transaction solutions have been mooted, but there is, of course, a security issue. At the recent ID World 2003 (good title -- well done) in Paris, Applied Digital Solutions CEO Scott R Silverman addressed the possibility of someone mislaying their RNID "credit card:"

"VeriPay's unique, under-the-skin format offers a much more secure, tamper-proof, and loss-proof solution. VeriPay brings to consumers the benefits of fast and reliable RFID technology along with the security of a subdermal format."

There's that word 'benefit' again. In fact, there is no apparent benefit to the consumer from this RFID application. Someone's business will benefit, but you'll be walking around with a chip in your arm carrying personal and/or financial information which can be scanned without your knowledge.

Proposal to Implant Tracking Chips in Immigrants

Scott Silverman, Chairman of the Board of VeriChip Corporation, has proposed implanting the company's RFID tracking tags in immigrant and guest workers. He made the statement on national television on May 16.

Silverman was being interviewed on "Fox & Friends." Responding to the Bush administration's call to know "who is in our country and why they are here," he proposed using VeriChip RFID implants to register workers at the border, and then verify their identities in the workplace. He added, "We have talked to many people in Washington about using it...."

The VeriChip is a very small Radio Frequency Identification (RFID) tag about the size of a large grain of rice. It can be injected directly into the body; a special coating on the casing helps the VeriChip bond with living tissue and stay in place. A special RFID reader broadcasts a signal, and the antenna in the VeriChip draws power from the signal and sends its data. The VeriChip is a passive RFID tag; since it does not require a battery, it has a virtually unlimited life span.

RFID tags have long been used to identify animals in a variety of settings; livestock, laboratory animals and pets have been "chipped" for decades.

"The Conservative Voice"

Privacy Under Attack -- The Spychips Story by Rob Hood

Corporations now share buyer information like never before to gain knowledge of what consumers are most interested in. The method by which all of this takes place, including how we do our banking and grocery shopping is about to change. Earlier this year I came across a book on Amazon called Spychips by Katherine Albrecht and Liz McIntyre. The book features need to know information about the way technology is changing not only our personal lives, but how it changes the way corporations do business and about how we purchase things. I personally recommend the book to everyone regardless of religious or political status.

As many of you may read my columns, you know me a strict conservative Christian who most often than not opposes anything to do with the ACLU, the UN, EU, or the American liberals. However, my personal disagreements end here with the spychips story. With this article I am putting aside my personal religious and political stances to ask everyone, Christian or not, conservative and liberal, Democrat and Republican to realize what is at stake with Radio Frequency Identification or simply RFID.

Recently I have contacted Liz McIntyre, the co-author of Spychips and have asked her some basic questions about this RFID Technology and what it means to the average American. Here is the interview (Excerpt):

ROB HOOD: What first made you made you get involved in research of RFID technology and the Verichip?

LIZ McINTYRE: I found out about the technology while researching patent documents. I had stumbled upon a scheme to target grocery store shoppers with coupons based on their historical purchases whether or not they presented a supermarket loyalty card. I figured the best way to learn the mechanics of the coupon system was to look at the associated patents. While doing that research, I found a cache of scandalous documents outlining ways that RFID could be used to track people and create an inescapable surveillance grid. Many of these blueprints relied on using RFID in ways that would be invisible to the public. I felt a responsibility to share my findings with the world in hopes of heading off this planned future.

ROB HOOD: What inspired you and Katherine Albrecht to write Spychips?

LIZ McINTYRE: We had to write "Spychips" after we realized how major corporations and government agencies were planning to broadly deploy RFID technology despite consumer concerns. The industry's own studies showed that 78 percent of people surveyed around the world objected to the technology on privacy grounds once they knew what it was and how it could be used against them.

One very influential document for me was an IBM patent application titled "Identification and Tracking of Persons Using RFID-tagged Items."(U.S. Patent Application #20020165758)

Renew Now: The Chip You Don't Want in Your Passport

The implications of being scanned anywhere by anyone without your knowledge.

by Bruce Schneier

If you have a passport, now is the time to renew it -- even if it's not set to expire anytime soon.

If you don't have a passport and think you might need one, now is the time to get it.

In many countries, including the United States, passports will soon be equipped with RFID chips. And you don't want one of these chips in your passport.

RFID stands for "radio-frequency identification." Passports with RFID chips store an electronic copy of the passport information: your name, a digitized picture, etc. And in the future, the chip might store fingerprints or digital visas from various countries.

By itself, this is no problem. But RFID chips don't have to be plugged in to a reader to operate. Like the chips used for automatic toll collection on roads or automatic fare collection on subways, these chips operate via proximity.

The risk to you is the possibility of surreptitious access: Your passport information might be read without your knowledge or consent by a government trying to track your movements, a criminal trying to steal your identity or someone just curious about your citizenship.

RFID Tech Failure: Verichip Hacked and Cloned

Demo: Cloning a Verichip

In brief: Verichip markets their product for access control. This means that you could have a chip implanted, and then your front door would unlock when your shoulder got close to the reader. Let us imagine that you did this; then, I could sit next to you on the subway, and read your chip's ID. This takes less than a second. At this point I can let myself in to your house, by replaying that ID. So now you have to change your ID; but as far as I know, you cannot do this without surgery.

All of this relates to an article that Annalee Newitz wrote for Wired. I would not have looked at these parts otherwise; the Verichip is built with no attempt at security, and is therefore not very special to clone. The designers of this product must be aware that an attack like I outline below is possible. But, Reuters quoted 'VeriChip spokesman' John Procter, who said that:

'We can't verify what they [Annalee and I] may or may not have done.... We haven't seen any first-hand evidence other than what's been reported in the media.' (Sat Jul 22, 2006)

This is just silly. The Verichip is a repurposed dog tag; there is no reason (counterfeit house pets?) why it would have been designed with any security features, and in fact it was not. Their own technical staff—or failing that, the technical staff of the company that sells them the tags—can tell them this, with or without me.

(And while I used my proxmarkii, there's an easier way, if you want to do it yourself.)

I will briefly describe the steps that I went through to duplicate an ID-only RFID tag using my proxmarkii device. We will be cloning a Verichip, which should not rationally make any of this more interesting but does. [Demonstration follows.]

RFID Chips: Hacking Demo Shows Threat to Databases

Melanie Rieback, a Ph.D. student at the Vrije Universiteit in Amsterdam, gave a live demonstration of how a hacker could deploy a single rogue RFID tag and infect associated databases at the Fourth Annual IEEE Conference on Pervasive Computing and Communications held in Pisa, Italy, March 15.

"Let's hope this puts the breaks on the irrational exuberance of Wal-Mart, Procter & Gamble, the Department of Homeland Security, and everyone else hell bent on tracking everything and everyone with this technology," say privacy advocates Katherine Albrecht and Liz McIntyre, co authors of

"Spychips: How Major Corporations and Government Plan to Track Your Every Move with RFID."

Radio Frequency IDentification (RFID) is a controversial technology that uses tiny microchips to track items from a distance. These RFID microchips have earned the nickname "spychips" because each contains a unique identification number, like a Social Security number for things, that can be read silently and invisibly by radio waves. Security experts have theorized that RFID would be targeted by hackers, but until now, most considered the limited memory on the tags insufficient to deliver such attacks.

Rieback backs up her demonstration with details about exactly how a virus could propagate in RFID systems in a paper aptly titled "Is Your Cat Infected with a Computer Virus?"

The paper opens with a scenario in which a vet's database seems to be erasing data from pet tags and finally freezes, displaying the message "All your pet are belong to us." (This is a nod to the Internet joke "All your base are belong to us.")

This damage could start with one attacker writing malicious code onto his cat's microchip and exposing it to the vet's system, she claims. But that's just the start. Her university's press release about the discovery points out how such malicious code could infect retail databases and even RFID-based airport baggage systems, leading to more serious consequences, like a terrorist debilitating a baggage database in order to slip in a lethal suitcase:

"A malicious individual could put an infected RFID tag on his suitcase (or someone else's suitcase). The bag will be scanned when approaching a Y-junction, to determine which direction it should go. However the mere act of scanning could infect the airport's baggage database, and as a result, all bags checked in after could receive infected baggage labels.

As these bags move to other airports, they would be rescanned -- and within 24 hours, hundreds of airports could be infected worldwide. A smuggler or terrorist using this technique could hide baggage from airline and government officials."

The university researchers recommend that developers incorporate countermeasures to "help reduce the threat of RFID viruses." They point out that these measures "take time, people, and money to implement" and urge RFID developers to take action before their software is widely deployed.

"We've long contended that RFID will put all of us at risk," says McIntyre. "This is a wake-up call to RFID proponents who are recklessly rushing the technology into the marketplace before the serious societal consequences of tracking everyday objects and people with this technology can be fully explored."

9.24 The Right Wing's Academic Hit List

Targeted by Conservatives for Teaching Philosophy House bill aimed to restrain academic scholars with legal threats

by Jacqueline Marcus

In the Florida legislature, House Republicans, on the Choice and Innovation Committee, recently voted to pass a bill that threatens to restrain academic scholars. The law would allow students to sue teachers for beliefs that do not concur with conservative perspectives. If, for example, professors argue that evolution is a scientific fact instead of a theory, and if they don't devote equal time to creationism, under this bill, initiated by conservative David Horowitz's campaign, students can sue the professor for being biased.

<http://www.commondreams.org/views05/0328-30.htm>

David Horowitz and the Attack on Independent Thought by Robert W. McChesney

David Horowitz's new book, "The Professors: The 101 Most Dangerous Academics in America," was published in early February to considerable fanfare encouraged by a tidal wave of promotion from the right-wing echo chamber. This is the same echo chamber that made "swift boat" a household word in September 2004. The book itself is sloppy and unimpressive, an apparent rush job.

The criticism of me, for example, consisted of two out-of-context quotes from articles where I criticize the news media and the Bush Administration. This is presented as prima facie evidence that I am a dreadful teacher who uses the classroom to harass students to adopt my political views, my campus-wide, student-elected teaching award notwithstanding. By the same "logic," quotations could be taken from many professors in America, and nearly all conservatives, to establish that they propagandize in the classroom. By Horowitz's evidentiary standards, Harvard's Stephan Thernstrom, who endorses The Professors on its cover, should be ridden out of academia as a narrow-minded bigot who abuses students who disagree with his pointed views.

In short, the book is clueless about how classroom teaching actually works; it would astound him to learn that many professors with strong political views – of whatever stripe – go to great lengths to provide an open classroom. The people Horowitz vilifies in his book know exactly what it is like to hold unpopular positions -- to be attacked as "dangerous" for going against the dominant interests of society -- and we tend to have considerable empathy for those who disagree with our political views in our own classrooms.

In fact, that explains why Horowitz's lengthy and much-publicized campaign to locate conservative students who have been harassed in the classroom by left-wing professors has produced few, if any, credible witnesses. But, as I will argue, this is a ruse, so that lack of evidence means no more to Horowitz than the lack of WMD did to Bush and Cheney as they planned the invasion of Iraq.

The entire premise of the book is flawed. If Horowitz believes, for example, that publicly supported universities have an obligation to have faculties that represent the range of U.S. political opinion, and that it currently tilts too far to the left, he should follow the logic to its obvious resting place. Generals and military officers are far more important to the functioning of a government -- and, as history shows in depressingly frequent detail, a much greater threat to democratic governance -- than anthropology professors. In the United States the military is enormous, it is entirely funded by taxpayers, and the officer corps is significantly right-wing Republican. There is hardly a liberal Democrat in the bunch, and I dare say probably not a single soul to the left of the Clinton-Kerry center of the Democracy party.

That means tens of millions of Americans have no political allies directing the most powerful military in human history, while the hard right feels like it has died and gone to heaven when it visits the officers' quarters on Election Day. If Horowitz is going on some sort of rampage about getting political balance in important publicly funded professions, he can only be taken seriously if he starts at the Pentagon. When he has established how to do it there we can proceed to the campuses.

But the point of Horowitz's book is not to make a coherent principled critique of academia and suggest reforms to solve the problem. Were that the case, Horowitz would be obsessed with the rabidly pro-market bias in most economics and business schools -- and more than a few political science departments. In these classes and departments, students who are pro-labor union, critical of so-called "free trade" deals like NAFTA, and in favor of progressive taxation, living wage ordinances, strict environmental regulations and aggressive social spending are made to feel like their positions have little intellectual merit. They are ostracized. Yet Horowitz has no concern for these students, or for their rights. Screw them.

Horowitz's mission is clear: to attack critical work in the academy, especially critical work that does not restrict itself to the classroom, but sees intellectuals as having a necessary public role. Visible public outreach is A-OK for Milton Friedman, Stephan Thernstrom, the neo-conservative crowd, and denizens of the right, but strictly off-limits for liberals and the left.

For these reasons I would imagine that principled conservatives will run from this book faster than they would run away from a line-up for a voluntary IRS audit. But the book is important and requires a response that goes beyond pointing out its sloppiness and incoherence; we need to put what Horowitz is doing in a broader context. In my view, the best way to make sense of the book and what it represents is to see it as part of the broad attack on the autonomy and integrity of institutions and individuals who conduct independent and critical thought. It is this type of independent and uncorrupted inquiry -- work that is not under the thumb of powerful political or commercial interests -- that is mandatory if viable self-government is to succeed. The space for this type of inquiry has to be fought for and preserved, and it is always considered with a certain amount of suspicion by those in power, who prefer minimal public interference with their exercise of power.

Indeed, it is revealing that Horowitz uses the term "dangerous" as a pejorative in his book's subtitle. Dangerous professors are those with ideas with which Horowitz disagrees. This is a ludicrously opportunistic and undemocratic framing. The entire premise of a viable democratic public sphere is that what some perceive as "dangerous" ideas be protected, even encouraged, and permitted to be thrown into debate. Especially, above all else, in universities.

In our society the two institutions commissioned to provide the substance of a democratic public sphere, as a place for critical inquiry, are the news media and academia.

Hence, to get a better sense of what is happening today with the attack on universities, consider what has happened with U.S. journalism. Back in the early 1970s professional journalism was at its peak. Journalists had relative autonomy from the demands of owners and advertisers and relatively lavish budgets. I do not wish to exaggerate the quality of professional journalism even at its peak; local news media tended to ignore the foibles of powerful local bigshots and all news media relied far too much on official sources, especially in coverage of foreign policy. Indeed much of my career has been spent documenting the limitations of professional journalism, even at its best. But on balance what it provided in the 1960s and 1970s looks awfully good through 2006 eyes.

Since the 1970s the autonomy, resources and critical wiggle room of professional journalism has come under attack on two fronts. First, as media ownership consolidated corporate owners began to think the idea of professional journalism made a lot less sense. After all, corporations aren't charities, and why should their shareholders bankroll a public service? So newsrooms have faced serious cutbacks in resources for investigative, political and international coverage. In its stead far less expensive and politically trivial celebrity coverage has risen in prominence. Commercial values play an increasingly visible role in what passes for journalism today.

The second front in the war on journalism came from the political right. To the political right, it was mandatory to make journalism more sympathetic to right-wing politics if the right was going to win political power. A very high percentage of right-wing funding went to various means of pushing the news media to the right. The overarching theme was that the media had a strident liberal bias that required journalist to be softer on Republicans and tougher on Democrats if they wished to be fair. The campaign has been a rousing success. One need only look at the weak-kneed press coverage of Bush's scandals and foibles, and imagine how a President Clinton or Gore or Kerry would have fared if he had done similar deeds, to see the effect.

While these two attacks on journalism were independent of each other for the most part, they had the same effect: reduce the power and autonomy of journalists and make journalism more fearful of antagonizing the political right.

Universities and news media share a certain ideological importance as I have already noted. But as institutions they have quite different traditions. News media have been the province of profit-driven firms for the most part, whereas universities are non-profit, often public, institutions. Yet the attack on universities has followed the same pattern as the attack on journalism. The dominant issue on campuses for the past two decades has been the incessant commercialization of universities, from marketing of classes to corporate funding for research and activities. Increasingly our major universities are linked to commercial institutions and commercial values, which work to undermine, even eliminate, much of the public service ethos of these institutions. Now the distance is further to travel with universities than with media, because they begin as non-profit institutions, but the direction is unmistakable. And the destination is nowhere anyone should want universities to be. It is the great crisis facing universities today, and about this crisis people like David Horowitz have nothing to say.

This brings us to Horowitz's attack on "dangerous" professors, those faculty like myself who dare to hold political opinions Horowitz disagrees with and which he would like to see banished. This is taken directly from the playbook for the right-wing attack on "liberal" journalists. The point is to intimidate dissident voices, to make them temper their words in their classrooms, and be very careful about what they do when they venture off-campus.

Right-wing faculty are free to shout their views from the mountaintop -- after all, they are the oppressed minority merely trying to balance the dominant left, much like the blowhards at Fox News -- while left-wing faculty are supposed to shut up and go with the flow if they wish to be regarded as legitimate professionals and keep their jobs. As I discussed at the outset, it is a thoroughly unprincipled exercise with a crude political agenda. Combined with the commercial restructuring of universities the goal is to make intellectual life as ineffectual as our journalism has become.

It is a prospect that is unacceptable and must be opposed, in both media and higher education. It is a battle for the soul of our nation, and the future of our polity.

A Conservative "Hit List" Targets AIDS Researchers

In the fall of 2003 Margaret R. Weeks, Ph.D., got a call from her project officer at the National Institute on Drug Abuse (NIDA). Weeks, an anthropologist and the associate director of the Institute for Community Research in Hartford could hear the stress in her project officer's voice. The National Institutes of Health (NIH) needed an immediate report on her study that recruits drug users to spread a message about how to prevent HIV / AIDS.

"We were two and a half years into a four-year study. We didn't have findings," Weeks told the audience at AIDS Science Day in April, describing her response. She said, 'Give me anything you can.' "

Weeks and her project, which is affiliated with the Center for Interdisciplinary Research on AIDS based at the School of Public Health, were on what came to be known as the "hit list" of about 200 federally funded studies deemed by the conservative Traditional Values Coalition to be "prurient," "smarmy" and having "little or no bearing on public health." The list found its way to Congress, which demanded explanations. Elias A. Zerhouni, M.D., director of the NIH, looked into the studies and went back to Congress with a vigorous defense.

The project Weeks is leading recruits active drug users and trains them to become peer health advocates who can introduce harm reduction measures into drug use sites. Weeks was one of four panelists at AIDS Science Day to discuss the implications of this list.

Michael H. Merson, M.D., dean of public health and moderator of the panel, said the list made him think back to the 1950s and another politician with a list. "As someone who has his name on this list, I immediately recalled the words of Senator Joseph McCarthy," he said. Merson appeared on the list as principal investigator of studies on drug use in high-risk settings and AIDS in China.

Panelist Judith Auerbach, vice president for public policy at the American Foundation for AIDS Research (amfAR), placed the "hit list" in the context of other assaults on science. She noted that the Union of Concerned Scientists issued a report in February that cited examples of what it called the administration's distortion of science, and scores of scientists, including 20 Nobel laureates, issued a statement accusing the administration of misrepresenting scientific findings.

Silence in Class

University professors denounced for anti-Americanism; schoolteachers suspended for their politics; students encouraged to report on their tutors. Are US campuses in the grip of a witch-hunt of progressives, or is academic life just too liberal?

By Gary Younge

Tuesday April 4, 2006
The Guardian

After the screenwriter Walter Bernstein was placed on the blacklist during the McCarthyite era he said his life "seemed to move in ever-decreasing circles." "Few of my friends dropped away but the list of acquaintances diminished," he wrote in Inside Out, a memoir of the blacklist. "I appeared contaminated and they did not want to risk infection. They avoided me, not calling as they had in the past, not responding to my calls, being nervously distant if we met in public places."

As chair of African American studies in Yale, Paul Gilroy had a similar experience recently after he spoke at a university-sponsored teach-in on the Iraq war. "I think the morality of cluster bombs, of uranium-tipped bombs, [of] daisy cutters are shaped by an imperial double standard that values American lives more," he said. "[The war seems motivated by] a desire to enact revenge for the attacks on the World Trade Centre and the Pentagon ... [It's important] to speculate about the relation between this war and the geopolitical interests of Israel."

"I thought I was being extremely mealy-mouthed, but I was accused of advocating conspiracy theories," says Gilroy, who is now the Anthony Giddens professor of Social Theory at the London School of Economics.

Scot Silverstein, who was once on the faculty at Yale, saw a piece in the student paper about Gilroy's contribution. He wrote to the Wall Street Journal comparing Gilroy to Hitler and claiming his words illustrated the "moral psychosis and perhaps psychological sadism that appears to have infected leftist academia." The Journal published the letter. Gilroy found himself posted on Discoverthenetworks.org, a website dedicated to exposing radical professors. The principle accusation was that he "believes the US fabricated the threat posed by Saddam Hussein".

Then the emails started coming to him and his colleagues, denouncing him. "Only one person said anything," says Gilroy. "Otherwise, nobody looked me in the eye. There was something about the way it never came up that made me realise how nervous and apprehensive they were."

Few would argue there are direct parallels between the current assaults on liberals in academe and McCarthyism. Unlike the McCarthy era, most threats to academic freedom -- real or perceived -- do not, yet, involve the state. Nor are they buttressed by widespread popular support, as anticommunism was during the 50s. But in other ways, argues Ellen Schrecker, author of Many Are the Crimes -- McCarthyism in America, comparisons are apt.

"In some respects it's more dangerous," she says. "McCarthyism dealt mainly with off-campus political activities. Now they focus on what is going on in the classroom. It's very dangerous because it's reaching into the core academic functions of the university, particularly in Middle-Eastern studies."

Either way, a growing number of apparently isolated incidents suggests a mood which is, if nothing else, determined, relentless and aimed openly at progressives in academe.

Earlier this year, Fox news commentator Sean Hannity urged students to record "leftwing propaganda" by professors so he could broadcast it on his show. On the web there is Campus Watch, "monitoring Middle East studies on campus"; Edwatch, "Education for a free nation"; and Parents Against Bad Books in School.

In mid January, the Bruin Alumni association offered students $100 to tape leftwing professors at the University of California Los Angeles. The association effectively had one dedicated member, 24-year-old Republican Andrew Jones. It also had one dedicated aim: "Exposing UCLA's most radical professors" who "[proselytise] their extreme views in the classroom".

Shortly after the $100 offer was made, Jones mounted a website, uclaprofs.com, which compiled the Dirty 30 - a hit list of those he considered the most egregious, leftwing offenders. Top of the list was Peter McLaren, a professor at the UCLA's graduate school of education. Jones branded McLaren a "monster." "Everything that flows from Peter McLaren's mouth and pen is deeply, inextricably radical," wrote Jones. "In keeping with the left's identity politics he has been a friend to the gay community."

Six weeks after Jones released his list, two Los Angeles county sheriffs arrived unannounced at Professor Miguel Tinker-Salas's office at Pomona College and started asking questions. Tinker-Salas, a Latin American history professor, was born in Venezuela and is a vocal critic of US policy in the region. The sheriffs, part of a federal anti-terrorism task force, told him that he was not the subject of an investigation.

Then, for the next 25 minutes they quizzed him on whether he had been influenced in any way by or had contact with the Venezuelan government, on the leadership within the local Venezuelan community, the consulate and the embassy. Then they questioned his students about the content of his classes, examined the cartoons on his door. "They cast the Venezuelan community as a threat," says Tinker-Salas. "I think they were fishing to see if I had any information they could use."

Pomona's president, David Oxtoby, says he was "extremely concerned about the chilling effect this kind of intrusive government interest could have on free scholarly and political discourse."

Last year, some students at the Department of Middle Eastern and Asian Languages and Cultures at Columbia University ran a campaign against alleged anti-Israeli bias among professors, criticising the university as a place where pro-Israeli students were intimidated and faculty members were prejudiced. A faculty committee appointed by Columbia concluded that there had been no serious misconduct.

These issues are not confined to university campuses: it is also happening in schools. Since February, the normally sleepy, wealthy district of Upper St Clair in Pennsylvania has been riven with arguments over its curriculum after the local school board banned the International Baccalaureate (IB), the global educational programme, for being an "un-American" marxist and anti-Christian. During their election campaign, the Republicans of Upper St Clair referred to the IB, which is offered in 122 countries and whose student intake has risen by 73% worldwide in the past five years, as though it was part of an international communist conspiracy, suspicious of a curriculum that had been "developed in a foreign country" (Switzerland). "Our country was founded on Judeo-Christian values and we have to be careful about what values our children are taught," said one Republican board member. Similar campaigns have also sprung up recently at school boards in Minnesota and Virginia.

But it has primarily been universities that have been on the frontline. And on the other side of the trenches has been the rightwing firebrand David Horowitz. Horowitz, who had Jones on his payroll but fired him after the taping controversy, was raised by communist parents and was himself a marxist as a teenager. He is involved with Campus Watch, Jihad Watch, Professors Watch and Media Watch; he was also connected to discoverthenetworks.org, which targeted Gilroy. A few years ago he founded a group, Students for Academic Freedom, which boasts chapters promoting his agenda on more than 150 campuses. The movement monitors slights or insults that students say they have suffered and provides an online complaint form. Students are advised to write down "the date, class and name of the professor," get witnesses, "accumulate a list of incidents or quotes", and lodge a complaint.

Over the past three years Horowitz has led the call for an academic bill of rights in several states. The bills would allow students to opt out of any part of a course they felt was "personally offensive" and force American universities to adopt quotas for conservative professors as well as monitor the political inclinations of their staff.

The bill has been debated in 23 states, including six this year. In July, Pennsylvania approved legislation calling on 14 state-affiliated colleges to free their campuses from the "imposition of ideological orthodoxy." Meanwhile, House Republicans have included a provision in the Higher Education Act which calls on publicly funded colleges to ensure a diversity of ideas in class -- code for countering the alleged liberal bias in classrooms.

"The aim of the movement isn't really to achieve legislation," says Horowitz. "It's supposed to act as a cattle prod, to make legislators and universities aware. The ratio of leftwing professors in Berkeley and Stanford is seven to one and nine to one. You can't get hired if you're a conservative in American universities."

Reliable empirical, as opposed to anecdotal, evidence to back up Horowitz's claim of political imbalance is patchy but rarely contested. The most detailed study, conducted by California economist Daniel Klein and Swedish scientist Charlotta Stern, did reveal a significant Democratic bias which varied depending on the course they taught. It showed that 30 times as many anthropologists and sociologists voted Democrat as Republican, while for those teaching economics the ratio plummeted to three to one.

But these results gave only a partial account of campus life. Limiting their research to the social sciences and the humanities excluded a substantial portion of the university experience.

According to the Princeton Review, four of the top 10 most popular subjects -- business administration and management, biology, nursing and computer science -- are not in the social sciences or humanities. Republicans are probably more inclined to find a home in some of these disciplines.

In any case, most academics do not deny that there is a progressive, liberal bias in academe. "Of course," says Todd Gitlin, a professor of journalism and sociology at the Columbia School of Journalism. "There's a lot of conservatives in oil. But there aren't a lot of conservatives planning on studying sociology."

And while liberals may be more numerous, argues Schrecker, a professor of history at Yeshiva University in New York, that does not necessarily mean they are more powerful. "Progressive academe is like the ninth ward of New Orleans before the levees break -- neither secure nor particularly safe. It's one of the few areas left with some kind of progressive culture."

That, rather than protection of free expression on campus, is precisely why it remains a target for the right, they say.

Many believe that this current cycle has intensified as a result of the official response to 9/11. Two months after the terrorist attacks, the conservative American Council of Trustees and Alumni (ACTA), founded by Lynne Cheney in 1995, branded colleges and universities the "weak link in America's response" to the terrorist attacks and called on lecturers and professors to defend western civilisation.

In a report entitled Defending Civilization: how our universities are failing America and what can be done about it, ACTA president Jerry Martin and vice-president Anne D Neal, wrote: "While faculty should be passionately defended in their right to academic freedom, that does not exempt them from criticism. The fact is: academe is the only section of American society that is distinctly divided in its response to the attacks on America."

[A bizarre statement in light of the fact that a New York Times/CBS News poll conducted in October of 2006 found that the size of the group of Americans who still believe the "Official Government Story" of the "Attack on America" is down to 16% of the population. And this despite steady suppression of issues pertaining to the evidence of government complicity and cover-up (like this poll, for instance) and the constant efforts in the mainstream media to enforce the dismissive definition of "Conspiracy Buff/Nut/Theorist" on anyone bold enough to express skepticism in a public forum.]

Horowitz's Academic Hit List

By Robert Jensen

In his self-promotional mass emailings from which no inbox is safe, David Horowitz, right-wing pensioner of Richard Scaife Mellon [Among the financiers of PNAC], hyped his latest book about threats to America's youth from leftist professors.

The ad for 'The Professors -- The 101 Most Dangerous Academics in America' describes me as: 'Texas Journalism Professor Robert Jensen, who rabidly hates the United States, and recently told his students, "The United States has lost the war in Iraq and that's a good thing."

I'm glad Horowitz got my name right (people often misspell it 'Jenson'). But everything else is distortion, and that one sentence teaches much about the reactionary right's disingenuous rhetorical strategy.

First, I'm not rabid, in personal or political style. I'm a sedate, non-descript middle-aged academic who tries to approach political and moral questions rationally. I articulate principles, provide evidence about how those principles are often undermined by powerful institutions, and offer logical conclusions about how citizens should respond. I encourage people to disagree with my principles, contest my evidence, and question my logic -- all appropriate activities in a university where students are being trained to think for themselves, and in a nominally democratic society where citizens should to do the same.

Second, I offer such critiques without hate. Sometimes my assessments are harsh, such as in evaluating George W. Bush's invasion of Iraq and concluding the attack was unlawful and, therefore, our president is guilty of crimes against peace and should be prosecuted. Similarly harsh was the judgment that Bill Clinton's insistence on maintaining the harsh economic embargo on Iraq in the 1990s resulted in the deaths of hundreds of thousands of innocents and, therefore, Clinton was a moral monster who was unfit to govern. None of this has to do with hating either man, but instead with assessments and judgments we should be making.

Third, these critiques are not of the United States, but of specific policies and policymakers. No nation is a monolith with a single set of interests or political positions, and it's nonsensical to claim that harsh critique constitutes rejection of an entire nation.

Why would anyone suggest that I rabidly hate the United States? It's easier to defame opponents using emotionally charged language than engage on real issues. Accuse them of being irrational and hateful. Ignore the substance of the claims and just sling mud. By even minimal standards of intellectual or political discourse it's not terribly honorable, but it often works.

Beyond these junkyard dog tactics, Horowitz's email also makes one crucial factual error. I did write that the U.S. losing the Iraq war was a good thing -- not in celebration of death and destruction, of course, but because the defeat temporarily restrains policymakers in their dangerous attempts to extend the U.S. empire. But that was the first sentence of an opinion piece I published in various newspapers in 2004, not a statement to students. The distinction is important.

Horowitz and similar critics argue that professors like me inappropriately politicize the classroom, forcing captive student audiences to listen to radical rants. No doubt there are professors who rant -- from the left, right and center; there's a lot of bad teaching in universities.

But I'm constantly attacked by people who have no knowledge of -- and as far as I can tell, no interest in learning about -- how I teach. Because they hear me express strong opinions at political rallies or read my newspaper opinion pieces, they assume I treat my classroom like a pulpit and students as targets for conversion.

I teach journalism, and in the course of that teaching I regularly discuss how journalists cover controversial topics; it's hard to imagine teaching responsibly without doing that. When appropriate, I have talked in class about how journalists cover war -- explaining that many people around the world believe the U.S. invasion of Iraq violated international law, observing that U.S. journalists in the corporate commercial media rarely write about that, and suggesting reasons for the omission.

There's always a politics to teaching; the choices professors make about what readings to assign and how to approach a subject are influenced by their politics -- left, right, or center. But that does not mean teaching is nothing but politics.

No one knows that better than professors who hold views challenging the conventional wisdom, those of us who don't rabidly hate the United States but do passionately love learning and the promise of an open, independent university.

Teachers as Eunuchs and Odalisques:

The Not So Stealth Attack on Public Education by John F. Borowski

Georgia, along with states such as Minnesota, Missouri, Montana, Ohio and Texas is looking to challenge the scientific study of evolution. The late President Reagan (as a presidential nominee) endorsed the teaching of creationism anywhere evolution was being taught. The Supreme Court in 1987 dealt a lethal blow to those who suggested creationism is taught along side evolution. The case challenged Louisiana's "Creationism Act" with the high court ruling the law was "designed either to promote the theory of creation science that embodies a particular religious tenet or to prohibit the teaching of a scientific theory disfavored by certain religious sects." Foiled on that front, critics of evolution are seeking to simply remove it from science textbooks. What will be next: the teaching of environmental principles because it brings into question another deity close to these charlatan's hearts: profit at all cost?

I, like most science teachers, provide scientific data, letting the "chips fall where they may." When a student asks for my opinion, I suggest that they construct their own formulas based on sound science. Sadly, because of ecological illiteracy, angry parents steeped in misconception and woefully afraid for open dialogue in a classroom besiege teachers. Enflaming the situation are the likes of President Bush and his cronies who slam public education on a regular basis. Recently, a parent asked me if I taught the "other side" of deforestation? I replied there is no scientific "other side" to deforestation: just like there is no other side to child abuse, rape or spousal crime: or cheating students of the truth.

BYU Professor Steven Jones is Removed from His Classes for His 9/11 Research

"BYU Places '9/11 Truth' Professor on Paid Leave

Deseret Morning News | Tad Walch | September 8 2006

Brigham Young University placed physics professor Steven Jones on paid leave Thursday while it reviews his involvement in the so-called "9/11 truth movement" that accuses unnamed government agencies of orchestrating the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the World Trade Center.

Steven Jones BYU will conduct an official review of Jones' actions before determining a course of action, university spokeswoman Carri Jenkins said.

Such a review is rare for a professor with "continuing status" at BYU, where Jones has taught since 1985.

Jones became a celebrity among 9/11 conspiracy-theory groups after he wrote a paper titled... "Why Indeed Did the World Trade Center Buildings Collapse?"

The paper was published two weeks ago in the book "9/11 and American Empire: Intellectuals Speak Out" and lays out Jones' hypothesis that the three towers fell because of pre-positioned demolition charges — not because of the planes that hit two of the towers.

Professor Jones Elects to Retire from BYU

10/20/2006

Prof. Steven Jones elects to retire from BYU

Category: 9/11 News :

Author: Brian (9:40 pm)

Friends and Colleagues!

BYU issued a press release today -- I have elected to take early retirement from BYU. I don't have the actual release -- it will be in local papers tomorrow and may be on the BYU web site now.

I feel that this is a good move for me. I have been contacted by another school about joining their faculty, and may do so -- but no decision on that yet. I think it will work out for the best. I assure you all that I will continue in my research on 9/11 issues, and speaking out -- should have more time for these activities in fact.

I feel good about this -- not angry with BYU, moving on and happy with it overall.

Thanks for all your support, especially to those who signed the petition at st911.org in my behalf.

My sincere thanks to all my friends in the 9/11 truth community world-wide; we have a great, growing community of intelligent, caring people. We can do this!

Sincerely,

Steven E. Jones

Professor Jones: A Position Statement

Letter to the Editor:

I stand firmly against the war in Iraq and any war of aggression.

I support scientific scrutiny of the events of 9/11/2001, a day which will live in infamy. I speak as a private citizen of the United States.

"In a democracy we can renounce war and proclaim peace. There is opportunity for dissent. Many have been speaking out and doing so emphatically. That is their privilege. That is their right, so long as they do so legally... We can give our opinions on the merits of the situation as we see it..." (Pres. Gordon B. Hinckley, LDS General Conference, 6 April 2003.)

Wholeheartedly agreeing, I am exercising that right and that privilege. "A team of American and Iraqi public health researchers has estimated that 600,000 civilians have died in violence across Iraq since the 2003 American invasion," (New York Times, 11 Oct. 2006). I renounce these killings in the Middle Eastern wars.

We must insist on complete answers to questions about what really happened on September 11th, why there were no air defenses that day, and why we have gone to war in the Middle East. These issues transcend party politics. These yearnings for understanding of 9/11 and the wars that followed take us to the core of our heritage as Americans -- I support the Constitution of the United States. I am very concerned about those elected officials who would engage in pre-emptive war rather than "common defense" to "repel invasions" (Article I), compromise our rights against torture and cruel punishments (8th Amendment), take away the right of habeas corpus (Article I), and diminish the freedom to speak out without fear of reprisals (1st Amendment).

Two structural engineering professors in Switzerland have recently spoken out as I have also done, declaring that explosives were with "utmost probability" responsible for the collapse of World Trade Center 7 on September 11th. "WTC7 was with the utmost probability brought down by explosives", said one. [Tages-Anzeiger, 9/9/2006]

After seeing the collapse of World Trade Center 7 (see wt7.net), many instinctively want to know why this 47-story skyscraper, which was never hit by a plane, collapsed completely seven hours after the WTC Towers had collapsed. How could this happen? The 9/11 Commission report fails to mention the collapse of WTC7. Federal laboratories have not officially answered yet. FEMA explains how fire might initiate a collapse, then admits, "Our best hypothesis has only a low probability of occurrence." Is it a crime, then, to consider an alternative hypothesis, that explosives were used?

I invite you to study this matter for yourself. Please read the peer-reviewed articles published here: www.Journalof911Studies.com. This Journal is supported by the Scholars for 9/11 Truth, which I co-chair, and considers the "official theory" of what happened on 9/11 as well as alternative explanations. One of my scientific papers on 9/11 issues is published in this Journal (as well as in a book edited by Professors David Ray Griffin and Peter Scott.)

The paper therein by Joseph Firmage explores evidences that US intelligence knew in advance that the hijackers were coming and that the attacks were "allowed to happen," to justify wars in the Middle East. At least ten nations are on record as having warned the current administration that terrorist attacks were imminent, shortly before 9/11.

If another "9/11-like event" is "allowed to happen" in the near future, do you not suppose that it will be blamed this time on Iran or Syria, followed by a swift and deadly attack on the country blamed? Can you not imagine that a military draft will follow next, with college students constrained to enter the military, and handed rifles to go and kill people in the Middle East, by the tens of thousands?

Because of my concern for college-age students I have taught and loved for decades, I am motivated to speak out emphatically against what I judge – after thorough study and reflection – to be terrible wars, wars of aggression, founded on deceptions.

9.27 Yahoo, MSN, AOL Gave Search Data To Bush Administration Lawyers

The Justice Department is hoping to use the information to revive an anti-porn law that was rejected by the U.S. Supreme Court.

By Antone Gonsalves
TechWeb News
Jan 19, 2006 03:03 PM

Three of four major search engines subpoenaed by the Bush administration have acknowledged that they handed over search data in the government's efforts to revive an anti-porn law that was rejected by the U.S. Supreme Court.

Microsoft Corp., which owns MSN, Yahoo Inc. and America Online Inc. said they sent data to the government, but insisted no personal information on users was given to government attorneys. The exception among major search engines was Google Inc., which said it would "vigorously" fight the government's requests.

<http://www.informationweek.com/news/showArticle.jhtml?articleID=177102061>

DoJ Search Requests: Google Said No; Yahoo, AOL, MSN Yes

Update: Earlier today, I asked a Justice Department spokesperson which search engines other than Google received requests to provide search records. The answer: Yahoo, AOL, and MSN were also asked to supply search records information, and all complied. Google did not, and that is why the DoJ asked a federal judge on Wednesday to order the company to do so.

Another fact to consider as you sift through news coverage: Justice is not requesting this data in the course of a criminal investigation, but in order to defend its argument that the Child Online Protection Act is constitutionally sound.

It seems apparent that Google objected to the request not for privacy reasons, but on grounds that the request was too broad and burdensome. Privacy advocates I spoke to today, including attorney Sherwin Siy at EPIC, say while the DoJ's request would not identify individual users, the scope and nature of this request sets a troubling precedent. Today, they argue, only search strings and urls; tomorrow, perhaps, the IP addresses of all users who typed in "Osama Bin Laden."

Google Records Subpoena Raises Privacy Fears by Maria Godoy

The Justice Department has requested records for millions of searches made on Google, AOL and other popular search engines in an effort to bolster its case for an online pornography law. The subpoena is for broad data on search habits, not personal information. But the request has raised alarms among industry observers and civil libertarians who wonder what kind of data search engines have about their users -- and what other, more sensitive data the government may seek next.

Google, Microsoft's MSN, Yahoo and AOL received subpoenas for a random sampling of millions of Internet addresses cataloged in their databases, as well as for records for potentially billions of searches made over a one-week period. Only Google refused to comply. The Justice Department wants to use the data to support its argument that Web-filtering software doesn't work.

Sensenbrenner Proposal: Cough Up Internet Users' Online Data -- Or Go to Jail

A prominent Republican on Capitol Hill has prepared legislation that would rewrite Internet privacy rules by requiring that logs of Americans' online activities be stored, CNET News.com has learned.

The proposal comes just weeks after Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Internet service providers should retain records of user activities for a "reasonable amount of time," a move that represented a dramatic shift in the Bush administration's views on privacy.

What's new: Legislation is being prepared that would rewrite Internet privacy rules by requiring that logs of Americans' online activities be stored.

Bottom line: The legislation would create a federal felony targeted at bloggers, search engines, e-mail service providers and many other Web sites that might "facilitate" access to unlawful pornography.

Wisconsin Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner, the chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, is proposing that ISPs be required to record information about Americans' online activities so that police can more easily "conduct criminal investigations." Executives at companies that fail to comply would be fined and imprisoned for up to one year.

Mueller: "Terrorists" and Sexual Predators Use the Same M. O.

FBI Director Robert Mueller on Tuesday called on Internet service providers to record their customers' online activities, a move that anticipates a fierce debate over privacy and law enforcement in Washington next year. "Terrorists coordinate their plans cloaked in the anonymity of the Internet, as do violent sexual predators prowling chat rooms," Mueller said in a speech at the International Association of Chiefs of Police conference in Boston.

ISP snooping time line

In events that were first reported by CNET News.com, Bush administration officials have said Internet providers must keep track of what Americans are doing online.

June 2005: Justice Department officials quietly propose data retention rules.

December 2005: European Parliament votes for data retention of up to two years.

April 14, 2006: Data retention proposals surface in Colorado and the U.S. Congress.

April 20, 2006: Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says data retention "must be addressed."

April 28, 2006: Rep. Diana DeGette proposes data retention amendment.

May 16, 2006: Rep. James Sensenbrenner drafts data retention legislation--but backs away from it two days later.

May 26, 2006: Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller meet with Internet and telecommunications companies.

June 27, 2006: Rep. Joe Barton, chair of a House committee, calls new child protection legislation "highest priority."

"All too often, we find that before we can catch these offenders, Internet service providers have unwittingly deleted the very records that would help us identify these offenders and protect future victims," Mueller said. "We must find a balance between the legitimate need for privacy and law enforcement's clear need for access."

The speech to the law enforcement group, which approved a resolution on the topic earlier in the day, echoes other calls from Bush administration officials to force private firms to record information about customers. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, for instance, told Congress last month that "this is a national problem that requires federal legislation."

Justice Department officials admit privately that data retention legislation is controversial enough that there wasn't time to ease it through the U.S. Congress before politicians left to campaign for re-election. Instead, the idea is expected to surface in early 2007, and one Democratic politician has already promised legislation.

Law enforcement groups claim that by the time they contact Internet service providers, customers' records may have been deleted in the routine course of business. Industry representatives, however, say that if police respond to tips promptly instead of dawdling, it would be difficult to imagine any investigation that would be imperiled.

It's not clear exactly what a data retention law would require. One proposal would go beyond Internet providers and require registrars, the companies that sell domain names, to maintain records too. And during private meetings with industry officials, FBI and Justice Department representatives have cited the desirability of also forcing search engines to keep logs--a proposal that could gain additional law enforcement support after AOL showed how useful such records could be in investigations.

Pornography Invoked as a Cover for "The War on Terror?"

U.S. Wants Companies to Keep Web Usage Records

The director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Robert S. Mueller III, and Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales held a meeting in Washington last Friday where they offered a general proposal on record-keeping to a group of senior executives from Internet companies, said Brian Roehrkasse, a spokesman for the department. The meeting included representatives from America Online, Microsoft, Google, Verizon and Comcast.

The attorney general has appointed a task force of department officials to explore the issue, and that group is holding another meeting with a broader group of Internet executives today, Mr. Roehrkasse said. The department also met yesterday with a group of privacy experts.

The Justice Department is not asking the Internet companies to give it data about users, but rather to retain information that could be subpoenaed through existing laws and procedures, Mr. Roehrkasse said.

While initial proposals were vague, executives from companies that attended the meeting said they gathered that the department was interested in records that would allow them to identify which individuals visited certain Web sites and possibly conducted searches using certain terms.

An executive of one Internet provider that was represented at the first meeting said Mr. Gonzales began the discussion by showing slides of child pornography from the Internet. But later, one participant asked Mr. Mueller why he was interested in the Internet records. The executive said Mr. Mueller's reply was, "We want this for terrorism."

'Terrorism' Invoked in Internet Snooping Proposal

by Declan McCullagh

Global Research, June 1, 2006

CNET News.com

In a radical departure from earlier statements, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has said that requiring Internet service providers to save records of their customers' online activities is necessary in the fight against 'terrorism,' CNET News.com has learned.

Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller privately met with representatives of AOL, Comcast, Google, Microsoft and Verizon last week and said that Internet providers--and perhaps search engines--must retain data for two years to aid in anti-terrorism prosecutions, according to multiple sources familiar with the discussion who spoke on condition of anonymity on Tuesday.

"We want this for terrorism," Gonzales said, according to one person familiar with the discussion.

Gonzales' earlier position had only emphasized how mandatory data retention would help thwart child exploitation.

In a speech last month at the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, Gonzales said that Internet providers must retain records to aid investigations of criminals "abusing kids and sending images of the abuse around the world through the Internet."

If data retention becomes viewed primarily as an anti-terrorism measure, recent legal and political spats could complicate the Justice Department's efforts to make it standard practice.

Especially after recent reports that AT&T has opened its databases to the National Security Agency, Internet and telecommunications executives have become skittish about appearing to be cooperating too closely with the federal government's surveillance efforts.

In addition, the positive publicity that Google received during its legal dispute with the Justice Department over search terms has demonstrated to Internet companies the benefits of objecting to government requests on privacy grounds.

"A monumental data trove is a crazy thing from a privacy perspective," said one person familiar with Friday's discussions. "It's crazy that the U.S. government is going to retain more data than the Chinese government does."

Cheney-Rumsfeld Surveillance Plans Date Back to 1980s

Commentary/Analysis, Peter Dale Scott,
New America Media, Jan 03, 2006

Editor's Note: Illegal eavesdropping and illegal detentions of U.S. citizens marks a revival of presidential powers curtailed since Watergate, and likely grew out of a secret Reagan-era program that planned to suspend the U.S. Constitution in the event of a national emergency.

Revelations that the National Security Agency (NSA) has engaged in warrantless eavesdropping in violation of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act prompted President Bush to admit last month that in 2002 he directly authorized the activity in the wake of 9/11.

But there are reasons to suspect that the illegal eavesdropping, and the related program of illegal detentions of U.S. citizens as well as foreign nationals, began earlier. Both may be part of what Vice President Dick Cheney has called the Bush administration's restoration of "the legitimate authority of the presidency" -- practices exercised by Nixon that were outlawed after Watergate.

In the 1980s Richard Cheney and Donald Rumsfeld discussed just such emergency surveillance and detention powers in a super-secret program that planned for what was euphemistically called "Continuity of Government" (COG) in the event of a nuclear disaster.

At the time, Cheney was a Wyoming congressman, while Rumsfeld, who had been defense secretary under President Ford, was a businessman and CEO of the drug company G.D. Searle. Overall responsibility for the program had been assigned to Vice President George H.W. Bush, "with Lt. Col. Oliver North... as the National Security Council action officer," according to James Bamford in his book, "A Pretext for War."

These men planned for suspension of the Constitution, not just after nuclear attack, but for any "national security emergency," which they defined in Executive Order 12656 of 1988 as: "Any occurrence, including natural disaster, military attack, technological or other emergency, that seriously degrades or seriously threatens the national security of the United States." Clearly 9/11 would meet this definition.

As developed in the mid-1980s by Oliver North in the White House, the plans called for not just the surveillance but the potential detention of large numbers of American citizens. During the Iran-Contra hearings, North was asked about his work on "a contingency plan in the event of emergency, that would suspend the American constitution." The chairman, Democratic Senator Inouye, ruled that this was a "highly sensitive and classified" matter, not to be dealt with in an open hearing.

The supporting agency for the planning and implementation was the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA). FEMA was headed for much of the 1980s by Louis Giuffrida, whose COG plans for massive detention became so extreme that even President Reagan's then Attorney General, William French Smith, raised objections.

Smith eventually left Washington, while COG continued to evolve. And in May 2001 Cheney and FEMA were reunited: President George W. Bush appointed Cheney to head a terrorism task force and created a new office within FEMA to assist him. In effect, Bush was authorizing a resumption of the kind of planning that Cheney and FEMA had conducted under the heading of COG.

Press accounts at the time claimed that the Cheney terrorism task force accomplished little and that Cheney himself spent the entire month of August in a remote location in Wyoming. But this may have just been the appearance of withdrawal; as author James Mann points out in "The Rise of the Vulcans: The History of Bush's War Cabinet," Cheney had regularly gone off to undisclosed locations in the 1980s as part of his secret COG planning.

As to the actual role of Bush, Cheney and FEMA on 9/11 itself, much remains unclear. But all sources agree that a central order at 10 a.m. from Bush to Cheney contained three provisions, of which the most important was, according to the 9/11 Commission Report, "the implementation of continuity of government measures."

The measures called for the immediate evacuation of key personnel from Washington. Both Cheney and Rumsfeld refused to leave, but Deputy Defense Secretary Paul Wolfowitz was helicoptered to a bunker headquarters inside a mountain. Cheney also ordered key congressional personnel, including House Speaker Dennis Hastert, to be flown out of Washington, along with several cabinet members.

During Cheney's later disappearance from public view for a long period after the attack, he too was working from a COG base -- "Site R," the so-called "Underground Pentagon" on the Maryland-Pennsylvania border, according to Bamford.

Many actions of the Bush presidency resemble not only what Nixon did in the 1970s, but what Cheney and Rumsfeld had planned to restore under COG in the 1980s in the case of an attack. Prominent among these have been the detention of so-called "enemy combatants," including U.S. citizens, and placing them in special camps. Now as before, a policy of detentions outside the Constitution has been accompanied by a program of extra-constitutional surveillance to determine who will be detained.

As Cheney told reporters on his return last month from Pakistan, "Watergate and a lot of things around Watergate and Vietnam, both during the '70s served, I think, to erode the authority" of the president. But he defended as necessary for national security the aggressive program he helped shape under President Bush, which includes warrantless surveillance and extrajudicial imprisonment -- in effect, a new Imperial Presidency.

At least two Democrats in Congress have suggested that Bush could be impeached for his illegal surveillance activities. The chances of impeachment may depend on whether Congress can prove that planning for this, like planning for the Iraq War, began well before 9/11.

Halliburton/KBR awarded Homeland Security Contract Worth up to $385M

By Katherine Hunt

Detention Centers:

“..... in the event of an emergency influx of immigrants -- or to support the rapid development of new programs”

SAN FRANCISCO (MarketWatch) -- KBR, the engineering and construction subsidiary of Halliburton Co, said Tuesday it has been awarded a contingency contract from the Department of Homeland Security to supports [sic] its Immigration and Customs Enforcement facilities in the event of an emergency. The maximum total value of the contract is $385 million and consists of a 1-year base period with four 1-year options. KBR held the previous ICE contract from 2000 through 2005. The contract, which is effective immediately, provides for establishing temporary detention and processing capabilities to expand existing ICE Detention and Removal Operations Program facilities in the event of an emergency influx of immigrants into the U.S., or to support the rapid development of new programs, KBR said. The contract may also provide migrant detention support to other government organizations in the event of an immigration emergency, as well as the development of a plan to react to a national emergency, such as a natural disaster, the company said.

Dissent, Freedoms, Privacy Under Sustained Assault by Bush

A new provision in the USA Patriot Act bill would allow authorities to arrest demonstrators on felony charges at any "special event of national significance" if they are caught breaching a security perimeter. The measure would extend the power of the Secret Service, allowing agents to arrest people who enter an arbitrarily defined restricted area at an event, even when the President or any other official protected by the Secret Service isn't present. No hearings are planned on the provision.

"The new provision will empower the Secret Service to declare any area at any given time the site of an event of 'national significance' in order to arrest people expressing unwelcome political ideas and charge them with a felony," said Jody Grae Haug, co-chair of the Green Party of the United States and founder of the Nonviolent Peacekeeper Pool in Seattle. "It'll crush the kind of civil protest that was necessary to advance the civil rights movement. The purpose of the new Patriot Act provision is not security, but intimidation and suppression of political speech."

On January 24, Halliburton subsidiary KBR announced that the Department of Homeland Security's U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement component has awarded KBR a five-year $385 million contract to build and maintain detention centers to deal with "an emergency influx of immigrants, or to support the rapid development of new programs" -- possibly in response to political unrest.

"In recent years, peaceful protesters against global trade authorities and against the war on Iraq have increasingly found themselves detained for over 24 hours without charge. We know that FEMA has sought bids from major real estate and engineering firms to construct giant internment facilities, ostensibly to deal with disasters and attacks on the U.S. But evidence that FEMA also claims the power to detain political protesters goes back to the Iran-Contra hearings in the 1980s. The American people should recognize these developments as ominous in the era of endless 'war on terror', military occupation of Iraq, and a likely U.S. military attack on Iran," said Sundiata Tellem, co-chair of the Green Party Black Caucus.

Greens noted that some leaders in Congress, including Democrats, are already backing down from holding President Bush accountable for his illegal order for domestic spying without warrant or congressional oversight.

"These threats to our freedoms and to the rule of law are more dire than at any time in U.S. history, because of surveillance technology, training of civilian police forces in military tactics as ordered by President Clinton in the mid 1990s, and the control of media by conglomerates that benefit from such policies. The Green Party has already called for impeachment of President Bush and Vice President Cheney for various crimes and abuses of power. But it will take a very loud 'No!' from the American people and a concerted effort to remove the Bush regime from power if we're going to regain our rights and freedoms," said Marc Sanson, co-chair of the Green Party and former director of the Heartland Peace Center in Springfield, Illinois.

Detention Camp Jitters

by Maureen Farrell

"Recent pronouncements from the Bush Administration and national security initiatives put in place in the Reagan era could see internment camps and martial law in the United States."
-- The Sydney Morning Herald, July 27, 2002

In 1984, the Rex-84 readiness exercise program was conducted by 34 federal departments and agencies, reportedly as an exercise to handle an influx of illegal aliens crossing the Mexican/U.S. border. Brought to Americans' attention during the Iran-contra hearings, the exercise, which was conducted alongside another drill, "Night Train 84," also tested military readiness to round up and detain citizens in case of massive civil unrest.

None of that ever happened, of course, and in many respects, it seems silly to even mention it. After all, other Reagan-era initiatives, like the Armageddon exercises Dick Cheney and Donald Rumsfeld participated in, are far more interesting. Then, too, despite a brief moment of sunlight in the 1970s (when Congress, according to former President and CIA director George H.W. Bush, "unleashed a bunch of untutored little jerks out there"), emergency detention plans had been in place since the 1950s, without incident. Americans have not been herded into camps since World War II, so why worry about it now?

For some, the answer comes in the form of yet another government contract awarded to Halliburton subsidiary, Kellogg, Brown & Root to build "temporary detention facilities" in case of an "immigration emergency." Reminiscent of Rex 84, which was conducted on the premise of preparing for "an influx of immigrants," there is reason to believe that hoards of poor, tired immigrants are not the true concern. As Tom Hennessy of the Press-Telegram recently pointed out, "there already are thousands of beds in place at various U.S. locations for the purpose of housing illegal immigrants." So what else might these centers be used for?

Given predictions that another terror attack is all but certain, it seems far more likely that the centers would be used for post-911-type detentions of immigrants rather than a sudden deluge. "Almost certainly this is preparation for a roundup after the next 9/11 for Mid-Easterners, Muslims and possibly dissenters," Daniel Ellsberg remarked. "They've already done this on a smaller scale, with the 'special registration' detentions of immigrant men from Muslim countries, and with Guantanamo." As it turns out, immigrants aren't the only concern. As a news brief in the Atlanta Journal-Constitution explains:

The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers has awarded a contract worth up to $385 million for building temporary immigration detention centers to Halliburton subsidiary Kellogg Brown & Root. KBR would build the centers for the Homeland Security Department in case of an unexpected influx of immigrants or to house people after a natural disaster or for new programs that require additional detention space, the company said.

Which brings us to the KBR spokesman's final statement regarding "new programs that require additional detention space." What might these new programs be? Do they have anything to do with the post-9/11 suggestions for forced quarantines or internment camps? Will America's new "secret laws" come into play? Might these "new programs" have anything to do with the contingencies Oliver North prepared for? Inquiring minds want to know.

In 1987, the Miami Herald gave us a glimpse of what the lead counsel for the Senate Iran-contra committee called a "secret government-within-a-government" and alerted readers to standby legislation, which, as columnist Jack Anderson had previously warned, was meant to "suspend the Constitution and the Bill of Rights." Even so, when a memo from the Director of Resource Management for the Department of the Army emerged, discussing "civilian inmate labor camps" to be built on Army installations, only conspiracy buffs on the far fringes of the Internet paid it any mind.

In 1998, World Net Daily's Geoff Metcalf addressed such "classic right wing paranoia," trying not to sound paranoid himself. "For several years now I have been getting all sorts of wild reports about 'Government Internment Camps,' he wrote, before disclosing two reasons he began sensing substance behind the rumors: 1) The labor camp memo was authentic, he said and 2) A U.S. congressman substantiated such claims. "The truth is yes -- you do have these standby provisions, and the plans are here ... whereby you could, in the name of stopping terrorism ... evoke the military and arrest Americans and put them in detention camps," Rep. Henry Gonzalez said in an interview.

What we do know, however, thanks to the Sydney Morning Herald's investigation into Reagan-era initiatives, alongside documents leaked to the Miami Herald in 1987, is that when Col. Oliver North helped draft contingency plans in the early 80s, one of the reasons cited for possible martial law and internment was "national opposition to a U.S. military invasion abroad" -- a scenario which would become more likely with additional wars and in the event of the return of the draft.

...
With the military stretched to the breaking point, questions of conscription and subsequent draft-dodging are hardly far-fetched, but the very act of protesting, in and of itself, could become a federal offense. Though conservative columnist William Safire was one of the first to warn of Mr. Bush's "dictatorial powers," and editorials across the country have since voiced similar concerns, few are picking up on attempts to criminalize dissent -- an observation made by former White House counsel John Dean as early as Oct. 2001, who wrote that, thanks to the hastily passed Patriot Act, the "right to dissent" is in jeopardy, with protesters possibly considered "terrorists."

Dean considered this an "unintended consequence" of the new anti-terror legislation, but the Oakland Tribune later reported that California's anti-terrorism intelligence center was already "blurring the line between terrorism and political dissent" and National Lawyers Guild president Michael Avery said that the Bush administration was "trying to criminalize dissent, characterize protesters as terrorists and trying to intimidate and marginalize those opposed to its policies." After a New York state jury refused to convict four Catholic antiwar activists for protesting at a U.S. military recruiting office in 2005, the federal government stepped in, filing charges including "conspiracy to impede an officer of the United States," which could send each protester to prison for up to six years.

ENDGAME: 10-Year U.S. Strategic Plan For Detention Camps
Revives Proposals From Oliver North

News Analysis/Commentary, Peter Dale Scott,
New America Media, Feb 21, 2006

Editor's Note: A recently announced contract for a Halliburton subsidiary to build immigrant detention facilities is part of a longer-term Homeland Security plan titled ENDGAME, which sets as its goal the removal of "all removable aliens" and "potential terrorists." Scott is author of "Drugs, Oil, and War: The United States in Afghanistan, Colombia, and Indochina" (Rowman & Littlefield, 2003). He is completing a book on "The Road to 9/11." Visit his Web site at <http://www.peterdalescott.net>.

The Halliburton subsidiary KBR (formerly Brown and Root) announced on Jan. 24 that it had been awarded a $385 million contingency contract by the Department of Homeland Security to build detention camps. Two weeks later, on Feb. 6, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff announced that the Fiscal Year 2007 federal budget would allocate over $400 million to add 6,700 additional detention beds (an increase of 32 percent over 2006). This $400 million allocation is more than a four-fold increase over the FY 2006 budget, which provided only $90 million for the same purpose.

Both the contract and the budget allocation are in partial fulfillment of an ambitious 10-year Homeland Security strategic plan, code-named ENDGAME, authorized in 2003. According to a 49-page Homeland Security document on the plan, ENDGAME expands "a mission first articulated in the Alien and Sedition Acts of 1798." Its goal is the capability to "remove all removable aliens," including "illegal economic migrants, aliens who have committed criminal acts, asylum-seekers (required to be retained by law) or potential terrorists."

There is no question that the Bush administration is under considerable political pressure to increase the detentions of illegal immigrants, especially from across the Mexican border. Confrontations along the border are increasingly violent, often involving the drug traffic.

But the problem of illegal immigration cannot be separated from other Bush administration policies: principally the retreat from traditional American programs designed to combat poverty in Latin America. In Florida last week, Democratic Party leader Howard Dean attacked the new federal budget for its almost 30 percent cut in development aid to Latin America and the Caribbean.

In truth, both parties have virtually abandoned the John F. Kennedy vision of an Alliance for Progress in Latin America. Kennedy's hope was that, by raising the standard of living of Latin America's poor, there would be less pressure on them to emigrate to the United States.

That vision foundered when successive administrations, both Democratic and Republican, contributed to the overthrow of democratically elected governments in Brazil, Chile and elsewhere, replacing them with oppressive dictatorships.

Since about 1970, the policies of the U.S.-dominated International Monetary Fund have also aggravated the problem of poverty in the rest of the world, especially Latin America. U.S. programs abroad, like programs at home, are now designed principally around the concept of security -- above all for oil installations and pipelines.

In consequence, the United States is being redefined as a vast gated community, hoping to isolate itself by force from its poverty-stricken neighbors. Inside the U.S. fortress sit 2.1 million prisoners, a greater percentage of the population than in any other nation. ENDGAME's crash program is designed to house additional detainees who have not been convicted of crimes.

Significantly, both the KBR contract and the ENDGAME plan are open-ended. The contract calls for a response to "an emergency influx of immigrants, or to support the rapid development of new programs" in the event of other emergencies, such as "a natural disaster." "New programs" is of course a term with no precise limitation. So, in the current administration, is ENDGAME's goal of removing "potential terrorists."

It is relevant that in 2002, Attorney General John Ashcroft announced his desire to see camps for U.S. citizens deemed to be "enemy combatants." On Feb. 17 of this year, in a speech to the Council on Foreign Relations, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld spoke of the harm being done to the country's security, not just by the enemy, but also by what he called "news informers" who needed to be combated in "a contest of wills." Two days earlier, citing speeches critical of Bush by Al Gore, John Kerry, and Howard Dean, conservative columnist Ben Shapiro called for "legislation to prosecute such sedition."

Since 9/11 the Bush administration has implemented a number of inter-related programs, which had been planned for secretly in the 1980s under President Reagan. These so-called "Continuity of Government" or COG proposals included vastly expanded detention capabilities, warrantless eavesdropping and detention, and preparations for greater use of martial law.

Prominent among the secret planners of this program in the 1980s were then-Congressman Dick Cheney and Donald Rumsfeld, who at the time was in private business as CEO of the drug company G.D. Searle.

The principal desk officer for the program was Oliver North, until he was forced to resign in 1986 over Iran-Contra.

When planes crashed into the World Trade Center on Sept. 11, 2001, Vice President Cheney's response, after consulting President Bush, was to implement a classified "Continuity of Government" plan for the first time, according to the 9/11 Commission report. As the Washington Post later explained, the order "dispatched a shadow government of about 100 senior civilian managers to live and work secretly outside Washington, activating for the first time long-standing plans."

What these managers in this shadow government worked on has never been reported. But it is significant that the group that prepared ENDGAME was, as the Homeland Security document puts it, "chartered in September 2001." For ENDGAME's goal of a capacious detention capability is remarkably similar to Oliver North's controversial Rex-84 "readiness exercise" for COG in 1984. This called for the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) to round up and detain 400,000 imaginary "refugees," in the context of "uncontrolled population movements" over the Mexican border into the United States.

North's exercise, which reportedly contemplated possible suspension of the United States Constitution, led to questions being asked during the Iran-Contra Hearings. One concern then was that North's plans for expanded internment and detention facilities would not be confined to "refugees" alone.

Oliver North represented a minority element in the Reagan administration, which soon distanced itself from both the man and his proposals. But that minority associated with COG planning, which included Dick Cheney, appear to be in control of the U.S. government today.

Bush's Mysterious "New Programs"

By Nat Parry, Consortium News. Posted February 23, 2006.

Not that George W. Bush needs much encouragement, but Sen. Lindsey Graham suggested to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales a new target for the administration's domestic operations -- Fifth Columnists, supposedly disloyal Americans who sympathize and collaborate with the enemy.

"The administration has not only the right, but the duty, in my opinion, to pursue Fifth Column movements," Graham, R-S.C., told Gonzales during Senate Judiciary Committee hearings on Feb. 6.

"I stand by this president's ability, inherent to being commander in chief, to find out about Fifth Column movements, and I don't think you need a warrant to do that," Graham added, volunteering to work with the administration to draft guidelines for how best to neutralize this alleged threat.

"Senator," a smiling Gonzales responded, "the president already said we'd be happy to listen to your ideas."

In less paranoid times, Graham's comments might be viewed by many Americans as a Republican trying to have it both ways -- ingratiating himself to an administration of his own party while seeking some credit from Washington centrists for suggesting Congress should have at least a tiny say in how Bush runs the War on Terror.

But recent developments suggest that the Bush administration may already be contemplating what to do with Americans who are deemed insufficiently loyal or who disseminate information that may be considered helpful to the enemy. Top U.S. officials have cited the need to challenge news that undercuts Bush's actions as a key front in defeating the terrorists, who are aided by "news informers," in the words of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

Detention centers

Plus, there was that curious development in January when the Army Corps of Engineers awarded Halliburton subsidiary Kellogg Brown & Root a $385 million contract to construct detention centers somewhere in the United States, to deal with "an emergency influx of immigrants into the U.S., or to support the rapid development of new programs," KBR said.

Later, the New York Times reported that "KBR would build the centers for the Homeland Security Department for an unexpected influx of immigrants, to house people in the event of a natural disaster or for new programs that require additional detention space."

Like most news stories on the KBR contract, the Times focused on concerns about Halliburton's reputation for bilking U.S. taxpayers by overcharging for sub-par services. "It's hard to believe that the administration has decided to entrust Halliburton with even more taxpayer dollars," remarked Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif.

Less attention centered on the phrase "rapid development of new programs" and what kind of programs would require a major expansion of detention centers, each capable of holding 5,000 people. Jamie Zuieback, a spokeswoman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement, declined to elaborate on what these "new programs" might be.

Civilian Inmate Labor Program

There also was another little-noticed item posted at the U.S. Army website, about the Pentagon's Civilian Inmate Labor Program. This program "provides Army policy and guidance for establishing civilian inmate labor programs and civilian prison camps on Army installations."

<http://www.alternet.org/rights/32647/>

The Pentagon's Civilian Inmate Labor Program

(The Army document, first drafted in 1997, underwent a "rapid action revision" on Jan. 14, 2005. The revision provides a "template for developing agreements" between the Army and corrections facilities for the use of civilian inmate labor on Army installations.)

9.29 Posse Comitatus: Remembering Why

by Alan Bock
October 1, 2005

[NOTE: This piece by Alan Bock was written a full year before the law was attacked.]

President Bush, showing in full bloom the instincts that make it clear that whatever he is politically he is not a conservative of the traditional limited-government or Constitutionalist variety, has lofted a trial balloon to promote the idea of having the military play a more extensive, earlier and perhaps even primary role in handling future disasters. The fact that he has mentioned it more than once, and that press secretary Scott McClellan has discussed both that idea and the idea of bypassing governors when disaster strikes, suggests that the notion is not just something that popped into his head on the spur of the moment.

The president (like most presidents but to an exaggerated degree) almost always seeks to expand and enhance the power of the national government when an opportunity presents itself in which such power grabs can seem like a relatively logical response. We see a pattern explained most thoroughly by Robert Higgs in his now-classic (at least in certain circles) book, Crisis and Leviathan.

At least during the 20th century Higgs discusses, federal power has expanded during times of crisis — mostly wars but also economic emergencies like the Great Depression — when such expansion seemed at least tolerable, even plausible, to most Americans. When a war or crisis ended, gestures were made toward returning to a constitutional republican form of governance by offloading some of the "emergency" powers. But some of the extraordinary powers remained in place and became not only permanent, but part of the status quo that seemed "normal" to most Americans once they got used to it -- or simply the way things are for younger people or those without much sense of history.

Thus over the course of the century not only has the power of the central government expanded exponentially, but a central government whose power and prerogatives the founders would not recognize, and which would frighten most of them, has come to seem just the way things are -- indeed, the very definition of "freedom and democracy" that most Americans assume we have and which is the best and freest form of government possible. So more power for the feds has become the "natural" first-reach instinct of almost every national politician of either major party in the face of a perceived crisis (even a crisis arguably caused or at least contributed to by bloated government, as I have argued both 9/11 and Katrina were).

MILITARIZING SOCIETY

The ongoing recognition of denizens of the state apparatus that, as Randolph Bourne recognized so memorably during World War I, that "war is the health of the state" has ensured that we have had a plenitude of military conflicts during the century just past. The habit of declaring "war" on such long-term and perhaps insoluble problems as poverty and government-disapproved drug use has not only compounded the trend, it has contributed to an ongoing militarization of society.

Whenever you see a police response to a major (or minor) criminal incident these days, the gendarmes assembled don't look like the friendly cop on the beat some of us remember from (possibly) more innocent days. They look like armored warriors, even the imperial "storm troopers" of the Star Wars movies, with their body armor, automatic weapons, shields, and tight formations. No wonder some neighborhoods in America feel more like occupied territory than like places where the people rule themselves.

In a crisis like the aftermath of Katrina in New Orleans, the presence of troops can seem comforting. Even though it is now widely acknowledged that many of the early stories about murders, rapes and gang violence in the Superdome and convention center were outright false, it was a stressful time. Violence, hunger, fear and uncertainty, compounded by lack of food and water and the knowledge that everything you owned was probably destroyed, were commonplace. So any number of Americans, including many of those stranded or trapped, welcomed the people in military uniforms.

And so Americans became a little more accustomed to seeing people on the streets with military uniforms and automatic weapons or imposing vehicles, and beginning to process that presence as not only normal but perhaps even comforting.

This doesn't mean we'll be pushed into a military dictatorship the day after tomorrow. But it makes the prospect just a bit more thinkable.

It would behoove Americans, then, to remember or learn why we have a Posse Comitatus law and how it has served to protect American freedoms and our constitutional order.

POWER OF THE COUNTY

Posse Comitatus is a Latin term meaning "power of the county." Black's Law Dictionary defines it this: "Posse Comitatus: the power or force of the county. The entire population of a county above the age of fifteen, which a sheriff may summon to his assistance in certain cases as to aid him in keeping the peace, in pursuing and arresting felons, etc. Besides the old English common law of which Black was probably the prime exponent, Americans catch a whiff of the Old West in the concept. Sheriffs in real history probably didn't gather a posse to go after bad guys as often as happened in Hollywood movies. But it happened.

The idea that every able-bodied person is ultimately responsible for keeping peace, that it is not solely the task of designated professionals, especially when something approaching a crisis is imminent, is not only part of our heritage as Americans. It is a bedrock of republican liberty, not just in America but wherever it has been reasonably successful.

The Posse Comitatus law was passed in 1878, not only in response to some of the abuses committed by federal troops during the Reconstruction period in the South after the Civil War, but more specifically after many suspected that federal troops influenced the election of 1876, in which Rutherford B. Hayes was chosen by the Electoral College and federal troops ran some polling places in the South. Specifically, Hayes won the disputed electoral votes of South Carolina, Louisiana and Florida, states where President U.S. Grant had sent troops as a posse comitatus by federal marshals at the polls if deemed necessary.

I've read some about that election but don't have a settled view as to whether it was really stolen or not. But the use of federal troops in an election, the most central event in any democracy, bothered even many in Congress who didn't think it was stolen (or perhaps welcomed the theft). The Posse Comitatus Act was enacted in 1878. It reads as follows (as revised in 1956):

"Whoever, except in cases and under circumstances expressly authorized by the Constitution or Act of Congress, willfully uses any part of the Army or Air Force as a posse comitatus or otherwise to execute the laws shall be fined under this title or imprisoned for not more than two years, or both."

A regulation by the Department of Defense includes the Navy and the Marine Corps as bound by the act. The Coast Guard, which until the creation of the Department of Homeland Security was under the Department of Transportation, has always had some domestic law enforcement responsibilities, even though it has some quasi-military functions as well.

NO MILITARY LAW ENFORCEMENT

What the act does is to ensure that the military is not used for domestic law enforcement. This is an important safeguard for individual liberty and citizens' rights. When military forces are used to enforce domestic laws on citizens, the danger of a military or military-dominated dictatorship is not necessarily inevitable. But it is a constant danger.

The fact that the law was passed in 1878 does not necessarily mean that it was only then that U.S. citizens abruptly discovered the potential dangers of military domination. The attitudes of the colonists who eventually broke away from Great Britain was profoundly influenced by the fact that the British quartered troops forcefully in the homes of civilians and that the military often operated independently of civilian authorities. The Declaration of Independence also attacked the very idea of keeping of a standing army in time of peace.

The Articles of Confederation restricted the raising of armies and navies and reserved the appointment of officers below the rank of general to the states, thus limiting the power of the central government. The constitution mandated civilian control of the military, in part by making a civilian, the president, the commander-in-chief, and in part through governmental structures. It restricts military appropriations to two years and empowered Congress to regulate the armed forces. Some aspects of the Bill of Rights, including the Fourth Amendment protection against unwarranted search and seizure, were also inspired by abuses by the British military during the colonial period.

Prior to the Civil War, many Americans opposed having a standing army at all, as Arthur Ekirch's too-little-known book, Civilian and Military: A History of the Anti-Militarist Tradition in the United States documents in detail. However, as this paper shows, authorities gradually began to use the military domestically. The Fugitive Slave Act of 1850 permitted federal marshals to call on the military to help return slaves to their "owners." In Kansas, federal troops were used to quell disorder between pro-slavery and anti-slavery mobs. The heavy military presence in the South after the war increased distaste for military rule over civilians. The use of the military to guard polling stations in the election of 1876 was something of a final straw.

DIFFERENT MISSIONS

All this makes sense in a government of laws. Military people, as any of them will be pleased to inform you, are trained to kill people and break things. Within the confines of strategy and tactics, that's how you win wars. Civilian law enforcement officers are expected not only to go after bad guys, but to remember that they are considered innocent until proven guilty and to respect their rights -- including rights like Miranda warnings that have been added since the Posse Comitatus Act was passed. They are different kinds of jobs -- both difficult and with their own subtleties, but decidedly different.

Nobody has been convicted under the PCA and few have been prosecuted, but it has protected our liberties nonetheless. The downside of this, however, is that there is very little case law to help courts interpret the law. The little existing case law, however, suggests that the law is flexible enough to permit the use of the military in times of riot or natural disaster. At first the test was active-versus-passive, that is the military could furnish equipment and supplies but couldn't actively police Americans. In 1975 a somewhat looser test emerged, whether "military personnel subjected ... citizens to the exercise of military power which was regulatory, proscriptive, or compulsory in nature."

Prohibiting the military from engaging in civilian law enforcement not only protects us from the admittedly probably remote danger of a military dictatorship, it also protects the effectiveness and integrity of the military. If the military were asked on a regular basis to engage in civilian law enforcement (or even disaster relief) it would soften the warrior mentality and take resources and training time from the primary mission of being ready to fight an actual war. Weakening the Posse Comitatus Act, as has been suggested before by politicians of both parties, would almost certainly reduce the respect citizens have for the military, which has gradually increased since the act was passed, not coincidentally in my view.

Posse Comitatus is a Latin phrase that sounds obscure to most people, so it might not seem like a big thing to amend the act to make it easier to deploy the military in essentially civilian duties. But it is a big thing. The president's call to consider changes so far seems to have had little resonance, as have earlier calls. But the president is a stubborn man who sometimes confuses stubbornness with integrity or commitment to principle. It behooves those of us who prefer that this country not be governed too much like a banana republic to appreciate the Posse Comitatus Act, communicate its importance to others, and be on the alert for more concrete efforts to change it.

Bush Guts Posse Comitatus, Grabs National Guard!

by Major Danby

Wed Oct 18, 2006 at 06:10:33 PM PDT

I'm not really all that much of a states' rights guy. I fall more on the "strong federal government" side of the spectrum. So when someone like me starts screaming about a massive sneak attack on federalism, you might want to pay attention.

If I told you that Congress was considering passing a law that gives the President - this President -- the power, in the event of any "disaster, accident, or catastrophe" that he deems to require it, to:

- Ø Involuntarily take National Guard troops from State A and
- Ø Require them to work in State B for up to a year,
- Ø In law enforcement rather than just traditional areas like disaster relief,
- Ø Over the objection of both state's governors

Would you believe it? Probably not. And you'd be right. Congress is not considering such a bill.

IT ALREADY PASSED SUCH A BILL THREE WEEKS AGO!

Follow me over the jump. Read it, weep, and prepare to pass on the word -- and to act.

It's important that we understand what the Bush Administration has done here, because they've done it in a sneaky, underhanded, and almost invisible way. We need to start with some basic concepts. I am indebted to two diaries by Cedwyn (here and here) and a previous diary by Rusty1776, as well as sources such as Sen. Patrick Leahy, whom I quote in my previous diary on this subject, and to a great blog post by Sarah R. Carter on her father's Senate campaign website.

The National Guard:

First, and most basically, because it confuses some people: each state (and territory, and D.C., but we'll ignore those for this discussion) has its own "National Guard." As with the concept of "federalism," which refers to the power that the states retain despite the existence of a federal government, this name can be misleading. The National Guard belongs to the states, not to the Federal Government, except with the governor's agreement or under certain specified conditions. The National Guard is the Governor's muscle.

The Posse Comitatus Act:

"Whoever, except in cases and under circumstances expressly authorized by the Constitution or Act of Congress, willfully uses any part of the Army or Air Force as a posse comitatus or otherwise to execute the laws shall be fined under this title or imprisoned not more than two years, or both."

What that means is that the federal government can't use federal troops -- or federalized state troops (which is what this outrage is about) -- as a national law enforcement posse to enforce the law, except under certain exceptions. You probably already know the term for putting an area under military law enforcement control: it's called "martial law." Now, a Governor can declare martial law in an emergency under terms that vary by state. You saw an example of that when Gov. Blanco declared martial law in parts of Louisiana during Hurricane Katrina. But a President can only federalize troops for such use under exceptions specified by law. Where do you find those?

The Insurrection Act:

You find them in the Insurrection Act. This was invoked, for example, in Arkansas in the 1950s when President Eisenhower controversially nationalized the Arkansas National Guard over the objections of that state's Governor and directed them to enforce the law ending mandatory school segregation. He argued that the state's refusal to follow the federal law constituted an insurrection against the federal government.

Well, OK, you might say, I can see giving the power to nationalize a state's National Guard in that situation, even if the governor objects. They were defying federal law. That's not such a bad exception.

Right. But guess what just got amended? This small exception is now a gaping hole.

Here's what happened.

You can see my previous diary for Sen. Patrick Leahy's September 19 statement on what the legislation then before Congress would do. The Fiscal Year 2007 Defense Authorization Bill was envisioned as a bill that would strengthen the National Guard. With a sick sense of irony, the Bush Administration gutted this provision and replaced it with a "body snatcher" provision that represented "a sizable step toward weakening states' authority over their Guard units." The provision "mak[es] it easier for the President to declare martial law, stripping state governors of part of their authority over state National Guard units in domestic emergencies."

Here's an explanation for what this law does; the citation for which I'm omitting:

When the President invokes section 333 of chapter 15, he may involuntarily call to active duty members of the reserve components (not more than 200,000 Select Reserve and Individual Ready Reserve, of whom not more than 30,000 may be Individual Ready Reserve) for up to 365 days to conduct law enforcement activities in a disaster, accident, or catastrophe area and, if such incident involves a terrorist or WMD threat or attack, other response activities. In addition, the President may involuntarily call to active duty members of the reserve components to provide supplies, services, and equipment to persons affected by the disaster, accident, or catastrophe. As soon as practicable after invoking section 333 of chapter 15, the President must notify Congress of his determination to exercise this authority. However, within 24 hours of involuntarily calling to active duty members of the reserve components, the President must submit to Congress a report, in writing, setting forth the circumstances necessitating this action and describing the anticipated use of these members.

Alberto Gonzales could drive a tank through the vague language you see up there.

They did this in a very subtle way. It's hard to notice unless you're looking for it.

Section 522 (House section 511):

- Ø Extends from 270 days to 365 days the period for which the Selected Reserve and Individual Ready Reserve may be involuntarily called to active duty.

Section 1076 (Senate section 1042):

- Ø Amends the "Insurrection Act" (i.e., Chapter 15 of title 10, U.S. Code) by:
 - § Changing the title of chapter 15 of title 10, U.S. Code) from "Insurrection" to "Enforcement of the Laws to Restore Public Order;"
 - § Changing the title of section 333 of chapter 15 from "Interference with State and Federal Law" to "Major Public Emergencies; Interference with State and Federal Law;"
 - § Clarifying the President's authority, under section 33 of chapter 15, to use the armed forces, including the National Guard in Federal service, without a request from a State governor, to restore order and enforce Federal laws in cases where, as a result of a terrorist attack, epidemic, or natural disaster, public order has broken down; and
 - § Including those who are obstructing the laws to the existing requirement for the President to issue a proclamation ordering insurgents to disperse and retire peaceably to their abodes within a limited time.
- Ø Amends Chapter 152 of title 10, U.S. Code, to authorize, with certain limitations, the President, in any situation he determines to exercise the authority provided in section 333 of chapter 15, to direct the Secretary of Defense to provide supplies, services, and equipment (e.g., food, water, utilities, transportation, search and rescue, medical care, and other assistance necessary to save lives and property) to persons affected by the incident.
- Ø Amends section 12304 of title 10, U.S. Code, eliminating the limitation imposed on the President's authority to involuntarily call to active duty members of the reserve components to perform law enforcement and other duties in response to serious natural or man-made disasters, accidents, or catastrophes to only those incidents involving terrorist or weapons of mass destruction threats or attacks.

So now the President can send troops from Tennessee to quash what he deems a threat to civil order in Oregon, even if the governors of Tennessee and Oregon both object.

This, by the way, is how the Chinese -- whose approach to government and party building Bush seems so much to admire -- broke up the protests in Tienanmen Square. They brought in troops from the provinces who knew nothing about what the protest was about, but knew that if they were ordered to shoot, they had to shoot.

Such small changes to the law. Such a huge result. Imposition of federal martial law, using state troops, over the objection of the states.

What can you do?

You can make noise.

No - you can make a LOT OF NOISE.

Write letters to the editor. Call your representatives in Congress and make them pledge to rescind these changes. Call the offices of Senator Harry Reid's and Rep. Nancy Pelosi.

This is an issue on which the most rock-ribbed conservatives, the most ardent populists, the staunchest libertarians, and the most committed liberals ought to be able to agree.

Even non-Democrats are looking for any excuse now to reject Bush and his fawning supporters. This is as big and fat an excuse as one could want. Bush and his flying monkeys are politically weakened now. We can beat them.

We can't give this measure of power to the President. Power corrupts.

And we can't give this measure of power to THIS President, who is already corrupted.

Our Founding Fathers anticipated and dreaded this moment. Their last line of defense is you. It's your Constitution. Make some noise.

A LOT OF NOISE.

- (1) Call Members of Congress AND Governors . Most of them still don't know that they were bamboozled like this because they don't know that the "Reserve" legally includes the National Guard.
- (2) Call any members of the National Guard you know, and their families.
- (3) Let's put this on Redstate, etc. On these sorts of Federalism questions, the decent ones among them can be our allies. This may be enough to shake them away from Bush and his enablers, just this once.

2006: On the Eve of the Midterm Elections, PCA Nullified

Recently, Congress passed a controversial bill which grants the President the right to commandeer Federal or even state National Guard Troops and use them inside the United States. This bill, entitled the John Warner Defense Appropriation Act for Fiscal Year 2007 (H.R. 5122.ENR), contains a provision, (Section 1076) which allows the President to:

“...employ the armed forces, including the National Guard in Federal service, to...

1. restore public order and enforce the laws of the United States when, as a result of a natural disaster, epidemic, or other serious public health emergency, terrorist attack or incident, or other condition in any State or possession of the United States..., where the President determines that,...domestic violence has occurred to such an extent that the constituted authorities of the State or possession are incapable of maintaining public order;
2. suppress, in a State, any insurrection, domestic violence, unlawful combination, or conspiracy...” [3]

Senator Patrick Leahy and others have condemned Section 1076 because it effectively nullifies the Posse Comitatus Act and the Insurrection Act (10 U.S.C. 331-335) and gives the President the legal ability to define under what conditions martial law may be declared. [4]

H.R.5122 was signed into law by President Bush on October 17, 2006, and will take effect October 1, 2007 (unless an earlier effective date is established by regulation). "On the same day, Bush signed the Military Commissions Act of 2006, which abolishes the legal protection of habeas corpus, authorizes the president to detain and jail anyone (even US citizens) without charge and subject them to harsh interrogation that may or may not involve torture." [5]

Note: H.R.5122 was introduced in the U.S. House of Representatives on April 6, 2006, as H.R.5122 by Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-CA). On May 5, 2006, Rep. Tom Cole (R-OK) introduced another version of the bill, H.Res.806, followed by H.Res.811 on May 11, 2006, and H.Res.1062 on September 29, 2006. In the U.S. Senate, Sen. John Warner introduced S.2507 on April 4, 2006, followed by S.2766 on May 9, 2006, and S.2766 on May 9, 2006. Section 1076 appears only in the final signed version of the bill (Public Law No: 109-364, October 17, 2006): Title X--General Provisions, Sec. 1076, Use of Armed Forces in major public emergencies. The Congressional Record (Page H8151 and Page H8152) shows Section 1076 as amended September 29, 2006, in the U.S. House of Representatives as a change to Section 333 of title 10, United States Code.

Bush Moves Toward Martial Law

Written by Frank Morales
Thursday, 26 October 2006

President Bush has signed into law a provision which, according to Senator Patrick Leahy (D-Vermont), will actually encourage the President to declare federal martial law (1). It does so by revising the Insurrection Act, a set of laws that limits the President's ability to deploy troops within the United States. The Insurrection Act (10 U.S.C.331 -335) has historically, along with the Posse Comitatus Act (18 U.S.C.1385), helped to enforce strict prohibitions on military involvement in domestic law enforcement. With one cloaked swipe of his pen, Bush is seeking to undo those prohibitions.

Public Law 109-364, or the "John Warner Defense Authorization Act of 2007" (H.R.5122) (2), which was signed by the commander in chief on October 17th, 2006, in a private Oval Office ceremony, allows the President to declare a "public emergency" and station troops anywhere in America and take control of state-based National Guard units without the consent of the governor or local authorities, in order to "suppress public disorder."

President Bush seized this unprecedented power on the very same day that he signed the equally odious Military Commissions Act of 2006. In a sense, the two laws complement one another. One allows for torture and detention abroad, while the other seeks to enforce acquiescence at home, preparing to order the military onto the streets of America. Remember, the term for putting an area under military law enforcement control is precise; the term is "martial law."

Section 1076 of the massive Authorization Act, which grants the Pentagon another $500-plus-billion for its ill-advised adventures, is entitled, "Use of the Armed Forces in Major Public Emergencies." Section 333, "Major public emergencies; interference with State and Federal law" states that "the President may employ the armed forces, including the National Guard in Federal service, to restore public order and enforce the laws of the United States when, as a result of a natural disaster, epidemic, or other serious public health emergency, terrorist attack or incident, or other condition in any State or possession of the United States, the President determines that domestic violence has occurred to such an extent that the constituted authorities of the State or possession are incapable of ("refuse" or "fail" in) maintaining public order, "in order to suppress, in any State, any insurrection, domestic violence, unlawful combination, or conspiracy."

For the current President, "enforcement of the laws to restore public order" means to commandeer guardsmen from any state, over the objections of local governmental, military and local police entities; ship them off to another state; conscript them in a law enforcement mode; and set them loose against "disorderly" citizenry -- protesters, possibly, or those who object to forced vaccinations and quarantines in the event of a bio-terror event.

The law also facilitates militarized police round-ups and detention of protesters, so called "illegal aliens," "potential terrorists" and other "undesirables" for detention in facilities already contracted for and under construction by Halliburton. That's right. Under the cover of a trumped-up "immigration emergency" and the frenzied militarization of the southern border, detention camps are being constructed right under our noses, camps designed for anyone who resists the foreign and domestic agenda of the Bush administration.

An article on "recent contract awards" in a recent issue of the slick, insider "Journal of Counterterrorism & Homeland Security International" reported that "global engineering and technical services powerhouse KBR [Kellogg, Brown & Root] announced in January 2006 that its Government and Infrastructure division was awarded an Indefinite Delivery/Indefinite Quantity (IDIQ) contract to support U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) facilities in the event of an emergency." "With a maximum total value of $385 million over a five year term," the report notes, "the contract is to be executed by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers," "for establishing temporary detention and processing capabilities to augment existing ICE Detention and Removal Operations (DRO) -- in the event of an emergency influx of immigrants into the U.S., or to support the rapid development of new programs."

The report points out that "KBR is the engineering and construction subsidiary of Halliburton." (3) So, in addition to authorizing another $532.8 billion for the Pentagon, including a $70-billion "supplemental provision" which covers the cost of the ongoing, mad military maneuvers in Iraq, Afghanistan, and other places, the new law, signed by the president in a private White House ceremony, further collapses the historic divide between the police and the military: a tell-tale sign of a rapidly consolidating police state in America, all accomplished amidst ongoing U.S. imperial pretensions of global domination, sold to an "emergency managed" and seemingly willfully gullible public as a "global war on terrorism."

Make no mistake about it: the de-facto repeal of the Posse Comitatus Act (PCA) is an ominous assault on American democratic tradition and jurisprudence. The 1878 Act, which reads, "Whoever, except in cases and under circumstances expressly authorized by the Constitution or Act of Congress, willfully uses any part of the Army or Air Force as a posse comitatus or otherwise to execute the laws shall be fined under this title or imprisoned not more than two years, or both," is the only U.S. criminal statute that outlaws military operations directed against the American people under the cover of 'law enforcement.'

As such, it has been the best protection we've had against the power-hungry intentions of an unscrupulous and reckless executive, an executive intent on using force to enforce its will.

Unfortunately, this past week, the president dealt posse comitatus, along with American democracy, a near fatal blow. Consequently, it will take an aroused citizenry to undo the damage wrought by this horrendous act, part and parcel, as we have seen, of a long train of abuses and outrages perpetrated by this authoritarian administration.

Despite the unprecedented and shocking nature of this act, there has been no outcry in the American media, and little reaction from our elected officials in Congress. On September 19th, a lone Senator Patrick Leahy (D-Vermont) noted that 2007's Defense Authorization Act contained a "widely opposed provision to allow the President more control over the National Guard [adopting] changes to the Insurrection Act, which will make it easier for this or any future President to use the military to restore domestic order WITHOUT the consent of the nation's governors."

Senator Leahy went on to stress that, "we certainly do not need to make it easier for Presidents to declare martial law. Invoking the Insurrection Act and using the military for law enforcement activities goes against some of the central tenets of our democracy. One can easily envision governors and mayors in charge of an emergency having to constantly look over their shoulders while someone who has never visited their communities gives the orders."

A few weeks later, on the 29th of September, Leahy entered into the Congressional Record that he had "grave reservations about certain provisions of the fiscal Year 2007 Defense Authorization Bill Conference Report," the language of which, he said, "subverts solid, longstanding posse comitatus statutes that limit the military's involvement in law enforcement, thereby making it easier for the President to declare martial law." This had been "slipped in," Leahy said, "as a rider with little study," while "other congressional committees with jurisdiction over these matters had no chance to comment, let alone hold hearings on, these proposals."

In a telling bit of understatement, the Senator from Vermont noted that "the implications of changing the (Posse Comitatus) Act are enormous." "There is good reason," he said, "for the constructive friction in existing law when it comes to martial law declarations. Using the military for law enforcement goes against one of the founding tenets of our democracy. We fail our Constitution, neglecting the rights of the States, when we make it easier for the President to declare martial law and trample on local and state sovereignty."

Senator Leahy's final ruminations: "Since hearing word a couple of weeks ago that this outcome was likely, I have wondered how Congress could have gotten to this point. It seems the changes to the Insurrection Act have survived the Conference because the Pentagon and the White House want it."

The historic and ominous re-writing of the Insurrection Act, accomplished in the dead of night, which gives Bush the legal authority to declare martial law, is now an accomplished fact.

The Pentagon, as one might expect, plays an even more direct role in martial law operations. Title XIV of the new law, entitled, "Homeland Defense Technology Transfer Legislative Provisions," authorizes "the Secretary of Defense to create a Homeland Defense Technology Transfer Consortium to improve the effectiveness of the Department of Defense (DOD) processes for identifying and deploying relevant DOD technology to federal, State, and local first responders."

In other words, the law facilitates the "transfer" of the newest in so-called "crowd control" technology and other weaponry designed to suppress dissent from the Pentagon to local militarized police units. The new law builds on and further codifies earlier "technology transfer" agreements, specifically the 1995 DOD-Justice Department memorandum of agreement achieved back during the Clinton-Reno regime.(4)

It has become clear in recent months that a critical mass of the American people have seen through the lies of the Bush administration; with the president's polls at an historic low, growing resistance to the war Iraq, and the Democrats likely to take back the Congress in mid-term elections, the Bush administration is on the ropes. And so it is particularly worrying that President Bush has seen fit, at this juncture to, in effect, declare himself dictator.

General Tommy Franks on the Repeal of US Constitution

"Franks' scenario goes much further. He is the first high-ranking official to openly speculate that the Constitution could be scrapped in favor of a military form of government."

The URL of this article is: <http://globalresearch.ca/articles/EDW311A.html>

The Criminalization of the State

by Michel Chossudovsky
23 November 2003

In the wake of the Iraq war, 18 Iraqis and 2 Jordanians introduced a class action law suit in a Brussels Court against General Franks, Commander of the US Armed Forces in Iraq.

Based on the law of "universal jurisdiction," characteristic of Belgian law concerning genocide and war crimes, General Franks was identified:

"for ordering war crimes and for not preventing others from committing them or for providing protection to the perpetrators."

The law suit does not solely implicate General Franks, who was obeying orders from higher up: Under the war agenda, high ranking officials of the Bush administration, members of the military, the US Congress and the Judiciary have been granted the authority not only to commit criminal acts, but also to designate those opposed to these criminal acts as "enemies of the State."

In other words, the "Criminalization of the State", is when war criminals legitimately occupy positions of authority, which enable them to decide "who are the criminals", when in fact they are criminals.

Franks' statement no doubt reflects a consensus within the Military as to how events ought to unfold. It is clear in his mind that the "war on terrorism" provides a justification for repealing the Rule of Law, ultimately with a view to preserving civil liberties.

Franks' interview suggests that an Al Qaeda sponsored terrorist attack will be used as a "trigger mechanism" for a military coup d'état in America. Franks is alluding to a so-called "Pearl Harbor type event" which would be used as a justification for declaring a State of emergency, leading to the establishment of a military government.

In many regards, the militarisation of civilian State institutions is already functional under the facade of a bogus democracy.

General Franks has nonetheless identified with cynical accuracy the precise scenario whereby military rule will be established:

"a terrorist, massive, casualty-producing event [will occur] somewhere in the Western world – it may be in the United States of America – that causes our population to question our own Constitution and to begin to militarize our country in order to avoid a repeat of another mass, casualty-producing event."

This statement from an individual who was actively involved in military and intelligence planning at the highest levels, suggests that the "militarisation of our country" is an ongoing operational assumption. It is part of the broader "Washington consensus". It identifies the Bush administration's "roadmap" of war and Homeland Defense. Needless to say, it is also an integral part of the neoliberal agenda.

The "terrorist massive casualty-producing event" is presented by General Franks as a crucial political turning point. The resulting crisis and social turmoil are intended to facilitate a major shift in US political, social and institutional structures.

In the words of David Rockefeller:

"We are on the verge of global transformation. All we need is the right major crisis and the nations will accept the New World Order."

A similar statement was made by Zbigniew Brzezinski in the Grand Chessboard:

"As America becomes an increasingly multicultural society, it may find it more difficult to fashion a consensus on foreign policy issues, except in the circumstances of a truly massive and widely perceived direct external threat."

The NeoCons' Project for the New American Century (PNAC), published in September 2000, barely two months before the presidential elections, called for:

"some catastrophic and catalyzing event, like a new Pearl Harbor."

See:

<http://www.globalresearch.ca/articles/NAC304A.html>

What is terrifying in General Franks' statement is that it accurately reflects official US foreign policy. It comes from a man who obeys orders emanating from the military command structure.

In other words, his statement accurately reveals the Pentagon's frame of mind. Moreover, it comes from a military man who speaks with a profound sense of conviction, who firmly believes in the righteousness of war as a means to safeguarding democratic values.

In other words, the military actors and politicians are totally blinded by the "war on terrorism" dogma. Truth is falsehood and falsehood is truth. Realities are turned upside down. Acts of war are heralded as "humanitarian interventions" geared towards upholding democracy. Military occupation and the killing of civilians are presented as "peace-keeping operations." The repeal of democracy is portrayed by General Franks as a means to providing "domestic security" and upholding civil liberties.

Needless to say: any attempt by antiwar critics to reveal these "inconsistencies" or "unanswered questions" would -- under General Frank's scenario -- be defined as a "criminal act." In other words, those who are investigating "the war on terrorism" and the military, political and economic actors behind the New World Order, with a view to establishing the truth, are categorized as "Enemies of the State," and consequently as criminals:

"The 'war on terrorism' is the cover for the war on dissent."

Gen. Franks Doubts Constitution Will Survive WMD Attack

John O. Edwards, NewsMax.com
Friday, Nov. 21, 2003

Gen. Tommy Franks says that if the United States is hit with a weapon of mass destruction that inflicts large casualties, the Constitution will likely be discarded in favor of a military form of government.

Franks, who successfully led the U.S. military operation to liberate Iraq, expressed his worries in an extensive interview he gave to the men's lifestyle magazine Cigar Aficionado.

In the magazine's December edition, the former commander of the military's Central Command warned that if terrorists succeeded in using a weapon of mass destruction (WMD) against the U.S. or one of our allies, it would likely have catastrophic consequences for our cherished republican form of government.

Discussing the hypothetical dangers posed to the U.S. in the wake of Sept. 11, Franks said that "the worst thing that could happen" is if terrorists acquire and then use a biological, chemical or nuclear weapon that inflicts heavy casualties.

If that happens, Franks said, "... the Western world, the free world, loses what it cherishes most, and that is freedom and liberty we've seen for a couple of hundred years in this grand experiment that we call democracy."

Franks then offered “in a practical sense” what he thinks would happen in the aftermath of such an attack.

“It means the potential of a weapon of mass destruction and a terrorist, massive, casualty-producing event somewhere in the Western world – it may be in the United States of America – that causes our population to question our own Constitution and to begin to militarize our country in order to avoid a repeat of another mass, casualty-producing event. Which in fact, then begins to unravel the fabric of our Constitution. Two steps, very, very important.”

Franks didn’t speculate about how soon such an event might take place.

Already, critics of the U.S. Patriot Act, rushed through Congress in the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks, have argued that the law aims to curtail civil liberties and sets a dangerous precedent.

But Franks’ scenario goes much further. He is the first high-ranking official to openly speculate that the Constitution could be scrapped in favor of a military form of government.

The usually camera-shy Franks retired from U.S. Central Command, known in Pentagon lingo as CentCom, in August 2003, after serving nearly four decades in the Army.

Franks earned three Purple Hearts for combat wounds and three Bronze Stars for valor. Known as a “soldier’s general,” Franks made his mark as a top commander during the U.S.’s successful Operation Desert Storm, which liberated Kuwait in 1991. He was in charge of CentCom when Osama bin Laden’s al-Qaeda attacked the United States on Sept. 11.

Franks said that within hours of the attacks, he was given orders to prepare to root out the Taliban in Afghanistan and to capture bin Laden.

10.1 False Flag Operations

BOOK: Operation Gladio and Terrorism in Western Europe

by Daniele Ganser, 2005

The CIA and the British secret service MI6, in collaboration with the military alliance NATO and European military secret services set up a network of clandestine anticommunist armies in Western Europe after World War II. The secret soldiers were trained on remote islands in the Mediterranean and in unorthodox warfare centers in England and in the United States by the Green Berets and SAS Special Forces. The network was armed with explosives, machine guns and high-tech communication equipment hidden in underground bunkers and secret arms caches in forests and mountain meadows. In some countries, the secret army linked up with right-wing terrorists who in a secret war engaged in political manipulation, harassment of left wing parties, massacres, coup d'etats and torture.

Codenamed "Gladio" ('the sword'), the Italian secret army was exposed in 1990 by Italian Prime Minister Giulio Andreotti to the Italian Senate, whereupon the press spoke of the "the best kept, and most damaging, political-military secret since World War II" (Observer, 18. November 1990) and observed that "The story seems straight from the pages of a political thriller." (The Times, November 19, 1990). Ever since, so-called 'stay-behind' armies of NATO have also been discovered in France, Spain, Portugal, Germany, Belgium, the Netherlands, Luxemburg, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Finland, Switzerland, Austria, Greece and Turkey. They were internationally coordinated by the Pentagon and NATO and had their last known meeting in the NATO-linked Allied Clandestine Committee (ACC) in Brussels in October 1990.

BOOK: The War on Truth

by Nafeez Ahmed, 2005

In The War on Truth -- Nafeez Ahmed provides the most comprehensive and controversial critique of the government's official version of what happened on 9/11. In this extensive new analysis, Ahmed doubles the data and investigates the worldwide web of terrorist networks across space and time. Deconstructing the findings of the 9/11 Commission Report and the Joint Congressional Inquiry, he exposes disturbing liaisons between American, British and European intelligence services and al-Qaeda operatives in the Balkans, Caucasus, North Africa, Middle East, Central Asia and Asia-Pacific -- liaisons linked not only to 9/11, but also to prior terrorist attacks including the 1993 World Trade Center bombing and the 1998 US embassy bombings.

Against this background, Ahmed accomplishes the most detailed and wide-ranging study to date of the powerful vested interests and intrigues responsible for the collapse of US national security in the years and months leading to 9/11.

Government documents, whistleblower testimony, and the findings of official inquiries are scrutinized to trace the innermost workings of the intelligence community, revealing precisely which government policies and operations facilitated the 9/11 intelligence failure, and pinpointing the specific agencies, individuals and decisions that emasculated the US air defense system. Finally, Ahmed unlocks the underlying geostrategy of the War on Terror -- the culmination of a decades-long plan to secure and expand an increasingly unstable system. For anyone who remains uneasy about government policies on, and after, 9/11, The War on Truth is an invaluable resource that will radically alter perceptions of international terrorism, national security, and the clandestine machinery of Western power.

"Nafeez Ahmed's understanding of the post 9/11 power game, its lies, illusions and dangers, is no less than brilliant. Everyone should read this wise and powerfully illuminating book." -- John Pilger

"The new book by Nafeez Ahmed, based on very extensive and deep research, is by far the best on the 9/11 syndrome. Articulating and documenting what many feel, and empowering them into action, the book will have an impact on entrenched US empire elites unwilling and unable to take it on. Votes of thanks to Ahmed, and to Interlink!" -- Johan Galtung

False Flag Operations: Origins of the Term

A false flag operation is simply an action in which the perpetrator intends for the blame (or credit) to be placed on a different party. The term originally comes from the naval concept of flying another country's flag to deceive and confuse other ships.

Here we are concerned mostly with false flag terrorism -- terror by states, organizations, and agencies which is meant to be pinned on others in order to influence policy, public opinion, or military aggression.

False flag operations are a classic tool of deception and espionage. Intelligence agencies are usually linked to most false flag terrorism.

False flag terror by a state upon its own population can be a powerful tool of control. False flag operations can range from intentional provocation or "letting things happen," all the way up to outright orchestration.

Probably the most basic motive for a false flag incident would be to frame the enemy for an act of aggression or barbarism in order to justify a supposed "defensive" response. It is essentially a way of making it appear that the other side "threw the first punch."

Many of the most prominent conflicts of the twentieth century were initiated, and gained the necessary public support, based on false incidents, intelligence, and journalism. The public does not generally support war unless provided a relatively just cause. At present diverse populations worldwide recognize that few wars if any have been justified.

With weapons being a primary world industry and one of the most profitable, we can be certain that conflict will be promoted or not averted by corporations with cooperative governments and individuals seeking profit and market dominance.

While we don't claim that all the events in this section are 100% confirmed false flag operations, there is compelling evidence in each case that the official story is incomplete and the identity of the true perpetrators/facilitators is in doubt.

- Ø 1605 -- The infamous Guy Fawkes plot to blow up the English Parliament. Actually an institutional false flag plot used as a pretext for war with Spain. Official history still repeats this deception.
- Ø 1898 -- The sinking of the USS Maine in Havana harbor was immediately pinned on the Spanish and the rallying call became, "Remember the Maine! To hell with Spain." William Randolph-Hearst [Forebear of company which now publishes Popular Mechanics] enflamed anti-Spanish sentiment in his papers by claiming definitively that it was a Spanish plot. No reliable evidence was ever produced linking Spain to the event. It is now widely believed that the event was a mechanical failure or false flag operation.
- Ø 1933 -- The Reichstag Fire allows the Nazis to crack down on their opposition and take power. A naked cowering Dutch communist, Martin Van der Lubbe, is found on the scene and the Nazis immediately claim that the fire is a communist plot.

“The exact sequence of events will never be known, but Nazi storm troopers under the direction of Hermann Göring were also involved in torching the place. They had befriended the arsonist and may have known or even encouraged him to burn the Reichstag that night. The storm troopers, led by SA leader Karl Ernst, used the underground tunnel that connected Göring’s residence with the cellar in the Reichstag. They entered the building, scattered gasoline and incendiaries, then hurried back through the tunnel.”

- Ø After World War II, Operation Gladio was a “stay behind” operation by NATO, CIA, and MI6 to counter communist/leftist influence in Europe. These state-sponsored “secret armies” used false flag terrorism against their populations in order to frame left wing groups, influence elections, and justify increased “security.”

Gladio has been confirmed by various governments and condemned by the European Parliament.

- Ø 1954 -- The Lavon Affair, a “scandal over a failed Israeli covert operation in Egypt known as Operation Suzannah, in which U.S. and U.K. targets in Egypt were bombed and evidence left implicating the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood; a textbook example of a false flag operation.”

False Flags: A Brief History of US Government Directed and Fomented Terror

World Trade Center Bombing 1993:

"One of the largest acts of domestic terrorism in U.S. history was the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center in New York. As it turned out, the FBI was fully aware of the bomb plot before the attack took place. The Muslim group involved had been infiltrated by Emad Salem, a former Egyptian intelligence agent who was hired by the FBI and ultimately paid $1 million. The FBI even provided the Egyptian with a timer for the bomb, prompting the Chicago Tribune to publish a report headlined, "FBI Tipster Said He Built NY Bomb" (Tribune, Dec. 15, 1993).

The Maine Bombing, 1898:

February 15, 1898, an explosion destroyed the American battleship Maine in Havana Harbor and helped propel the United States into a war with Spain. The USS Maine that sultry Tuesday night contained 350 crew and officers. At 9:40 p.m. the ship's forward end abruptly lifted itself from the water. Along the pier, passersby could hear a rumbling explosion. Within seconds, another eruption--this one deafening and massive--splintered the bow, sending anything that wasn't battened down, and most that was, flying more than 200 feet into the air.... In all, 266 of the 350 men aboard the Maine were killed.

The American press was quick to point to an external explosion -- a mine or torpedo -- as the cause of the tragedy. An official U.S. investigation agreed. On April 25, 1898, Congress formally declared war on Spain.

By summer's end, Spain had ceded Cuba, along with the Philippines, Puerto Rico and Guam, to the United States.

In 1976, Adm. Hyman Rickover of the U.S. Navy mounted yet another investigation into the cause of the Maine disaster. His team of experts found that the ship's demise was self-inflicted.

The Lusitania, 1915:

The Lusitania was a British cargo and passenger ship that was torpedoed and sank due to German submarine activity in May of 1915, just shy of ten years after she began her trans-Atlantic journeying. She was used to ferry goods and people between England and the United States. The Lusitania was very popular because of her speed and luxurious accommodations. She was considered "the acme of comfort," and deemed a "floating palace" by her passengers (Simpson 7).

As World War I escalated and German submarines took a prevalent role in the seas; Lusitania set out from New York on May 1, 1915, with the intent of delivering material to England in spite of threats of sinking by German authorities.

Six days later, on May 7, 1915, the Lusitania took a solid hit whose sound was described by passengers as a "peal of thunder," a "dull thud-like sound," or "like a million-ton hammer hitting a steel boiler a hundred feet high and a hundred feet long" (Hickey and Smith 184-185). Though they did not explode, water rushed into the first and second boiler rooms and caused the boat to shake from side to side. She then rose a little before a second massive explosion took her down into the sea.

The exact cause of the second explosion is a point of contention. The Lusitania shows evidence that she may have been torpedoed a second or even a third time-- but the second, most destructive, explosion may not have been caused by a German torpedo, but rather may have come from inside the ship. The reason behind this speculation is that the Lusitania's cargo can be called into question.

She had originally said she would take, along with her passengers, platinum, bullion, diamonds and various other precious stones, but these things were never found and port records do not list them either. She is believed to have instead carried, under the guise of bales of fur and cheese boxes, 3-inch shells and millions of rounds of rifle ammunition. If true, these materials comprised "a contraband and explosive cargo which was forbidden by American law and... should never have been placed on a passenger liner" (Simpson 157-158).

The torpedoes completed the destruction of the ship by their own power or they were aided by internal ammunition explosions. The ship sank within twenty minutes of when she was hit and took with her 1,201 people - and left only 764 to be saved by those who responded to her SOS (Simpson 9). Many American lives were lost as a result of the sinking, and because the Lusitania was never officially in government service, the United States believed the attack on her "was contrary to international law and the conventions of all civilized nations" (Simpson 8-9).

The sinking of the Lusitania caused serious tension between the United States and Germany and led to America's declaration of war against Germany.

Pearl Harbor, 1941:

In the summer of 1940 Roosevelt ordered the Pacific Fleet to relocate from the West Coast to Hawaii. When its commander, Admiral Richardson, protested that Pearl Harbor offered inadequate protection from air and torpedo attack he was replaced.

On October 7 1940 Navy IQ analyst McCollum wrote an eight-point memo for Roosevelt on how to force Japan into war with U.S., including an American oil embargo against Japan. All of them were eventually accomplished.

On 23 June 1941 – one day after Hitler's attack on Russia – Secretary of the Interior and FDR's Advisor Harold Ickes wrote a memo for the President in which he pointed out that "there might develop from the embargoing of oil to Japan such a situation as would make it not only possible but easy to get into this war in an effective way. And if we should thus indirectly be brought in, we would avoid the criticism that we had gone in as an ally of communistic Russia."

On 18 October Ickes noted in his diary: "For a long time I have believed that our best entrance into the war would be by way of Japan."

The U.S. had cracked key Japanese codes before the attack. FDR received "raw" translations of all key messages. On 24 September 1941 Washington deciphered a message from the Naval Intelligence HQ in Tokyo to Japan's consul-general in Honolulu, requesting grid of exact locations of U.S. Navy ships in the harbor. Commanders in Hawaii were not warned.

Sixty years later the U.S. Government still refuses to identify or declassify many pre-attack decrypts on the grounds of "national security."

On November 25 Secretary of War Stimson wrote in his diary that FDR said an attack was likely within days, and asked "how we should maneuver them into the position of firing the first shot without too much danger to ourselves. In spite of the risk involved, however, in letting the Japanese fire the first shot, we realized that in order to have the full support of the American people it was desirable to make sure that the Japanese be the ones to do this so that there should remain no doubt in anyone's mind as to who were the aggressors."

On November 25 FDR received a "positive war warning" from Churchill that the Japanese would strike against America at the end of the first week in December. This warning caused the President to do an abrupt about-face on plans for a time-buying modus vivendi with Japan and it resulted in Secretary of State Hull's deliberately provocative ultimatum of 26 November 1941 that guaranteed war.

On November 26 Washington ordered both US aircraft carriers, the Enterprise and the Lexington, out of Pearl Harbor "as soon as possible." This order included stripping Pearl of 50 planes or 40 percent of its already inadequate fighter protection. On the same day Cordell Hull issued his ultimatum demanding full Japanese withdrawal from Indochina and all of China. The U.S. Ambassador to Japan called this "the document that touched the button that started the war."

On November 29 Hull told United Press reporter Joe Leib that Pearl Harbor would be attacked on December 7. The New York Times reported on December 8 ("Attack Was Expected," p. 13) that the U.S. knew of the attack a week earlier.

On December 1 the Office of Naval Intelligence, ONI, 12th Naval District in San Francisco found the missing Japanese fleet by correlating reports from the four wireless news services and several shipping companies that they were getting signals west of Hawaii.

On 5 December, 1941 FDR wrote to the Australian Prime Minister, "There is always the Japanese to consider. Perhaps the next four or five days will decide the matters."

Oklahoma City, 1995:

Both the Federal government and the ADL were "tracking" Timothy McVeigh long before the Oklahoma City Bombing of 1995. McVeigh and at least a half-dozen other men planned the bombing while encamped at "Elohim City," a heavily-infiltrated "Christian Patriot" community in rural Oklahoma. ATF informant Carol Howe infiltrated Elohim City before the Oklahoma bombing. ATF internal documents prove Howe was an informant who overheard McVeigh and his accomplices plotting to blow up the Alfred E. Murrah building. Howe sent over 70 reports to her superior, ATF Special Agent Angela Finley, warning that a number of people at Elohim City were planning to bomb a federal office building in Oklahoma City.

Howe was not the only government agent privy to the Oklahoma bombing however. The shadowy Aryan Republican Army (ARA) gang of bank robbers were also complicit. Aryan Nations "East Coast Ambassador" and FBI informant Mark Thomas assisted ARA leader Peter Langan, an asset of the US Secret Service. Langan, the son of a US Marine Intelligence officer, was arrested for a robbery in 1992. The U.S. Secret Service intervened, however, arranging for Langan to be released on merely a signature bond.

Langan subsequently formed the ARA, which was, from its inception, a government black op. For example, the ARA never encountered any bank guards or other police during any of their twenty successful bank robberies. Langan and his lieutenant were only arrested in connection with the robberies after independent investigators began to publicize Elohim City's ties to McVeigh. It was at Elohim where the ARA leaders, among whom was "John Doe No. 2" (Michael Brescia), held three meetings to plan bank robberies and other activities. (Langan's lieutenant conveniently "committed suicide" while in custody).

Many government black ops use Halloween Satanists as a cover for their crimes. In Oklahoma City it was "white supremacists" and "neo-Nazi" patsies. The orchestration was finite and detailed, right down to the appointment of District Attorney Robert Macy -- the prosecutor who allegedly stymied all efforts to get to the bottom of the Oklahoma City conspiracy --to head the special Grand Jury proceedings to investigate a conspiracy. This is the same Robert Macy who, when asked by Oklahoma state Rep. Charles Key why Macy didn't proceed with an investigation, allegedly replied, "They won't let me."

Macy's Grand Jury delivered no indictments of ATF agents or of shadowy right wing, neo-Nazi "useful idiots" like Chevie Kehoe. No, the only one indicted was the investigative journalist David Hoffman (no relation to this writer), author of the seminal book, The Oklahoma City Bombing and the Politics of Terror (Feral House, 1998). Rare book collectors take note: the entire remaining stock of David Hoffman's book was pulped and destroyed under legal threat from lawyers for agents of the FBI.

Chevie Kehoe murdered gun dealer William Mueller and his entire family in Arkansas in 1996 because Mueller had inside information on Timothy McVeigh and the OK City bombing conspiracy.

As part of the "Revelation of the Method," recall that Aryan Nations member and L.A. daycare center shooter Buford Furrow "miraculously" eluded the largest police dragnet in the history of the LAPD, to report directly to his FBI handlers in Las Vegas in full view of the television cameras.

By the same process, Chevie Kehoe of Yaak, Montana and his partner, Danny Lee of Yukon, Oklahoma, killed the Mueller family while "dressed in FBI raid outfits" (Spokesman-Review, [Spokane, Wash.] April 8, 1999, p. B-3).

In both these cases a symbolic hint was being intentionally sent to the public concerning who Kehoe and Furrow's real handlers are. At the time of the Mueller murders Kehoe was a resident of the Shadows Motel in Spokane, Washington, where he had been staying on and off since 1994. Kehoe was often visited at the motel by a child rapist and Aryan Nations activist who was also a master gunsmith and machinist.

"Witnesses also believe McCrea and Kehoe met Timothy McVeigh at the Shadows Motel shortly before the April, 1995 Oklahoma City bombing... A former manager of the motel has reported seeing McVeigh visiting Kehoe there a few weeks before the Oklahoma City bombing.

"...But the possible link between the Shadows Motel, Kehoe and McVeigh has been given little, if any, attention by the FBI... With McVeigh and his friend Terry Nichols convicted of the Oklahoma City bombing, there is reluctance to reopen the investigation, federal officials say." (Spokesman-Review, April 11, 1999, pp. B-1 and B-6).

Here is a frank admission of the government's refusal to apprehend other guilty parties in connection with the Oklahoma City bombing. The conviction of the scapegoats satisfies the Federal police. Why? Because any further indictments would tend to risk losing control over perpetrators who might reveal embarrassing details and unaccounted for facts that point to orchestration of the bombing by the Federal government itself.

Elohim City was presided over by Robert Millar, himself an informant who reported to FBI Senior Agent Peter Rickel, according to June, 1997 court testimony. Millar's son-in-law, Jim Ellison, was also a Federal informant. The "chief of security" at Elohim City was Andreas Strassmeier, a German intelligence officer who was in direct contact with McVeigh in the weeks preceding the bombing and who Carol Howe implicated as a co-conspirator.

Federal Judge Richard Matsch prohibited Howe from testifying at McVeigh's trial, saying her testimony might "confuse" the jurors. After Howe went to the media with her evidence, the government indicted her on a trumped up charge of explosives possession. She was put on trial in August, 1997. Her attorney showed that Howe possessed the explosives at the direction of the ATF and Howe was acquitted of all charges by a jury.

BOOK: The CIA's Greatest Hits
by Mark Zepezauer

In order to survive, nations need strong intelligence services. But the idea that the CIA is primarily an intelligence-gathering operation is itself one of the agency's greatest propaganda triumphs.

Despite its name, the Central Intelligence Agency's main purpose is, and has always been, carrying out covert operations involving economic warfare, rigged elections, assassinations and even genocide.

The CIA is also expert at distorting intelligence to justify its own goals, and this "disinformation" leads to dangerous illusions among our policymakers. But covert operations are its life's blood.

Excerpts from Former CIA Director Philip Agee's Book: "CIA Diary"

"... what the Agency [CIA] does is ordered by the President and the NSC [National Security Council]. The Agency neither makes decisions on policy nor acts on its own account. It is an instrument of the President."

"Secret CIA operations constitute the usually unseen efforts to shore up unjust, unpopular, minority governments, always with the hope that overt military intervention ... will not be necessary. The more successful CIA operations are, the more remote overt intervention becomes, and the more remote become reforms. Latin America in the 1960s is all the proof one needs."

"But what counter-insurgency really comes down to is the protection of the capitalists back in America, their property and their privileges. US national security, as preached by US leaders, is the security of the capitalist class in the US, not the security of the rest of the people."

"A considerable proportion of the developed world's prosperity rests on paying the lowest possible prices for the poor countries' primary products and on exporting high-cost capital and finished goods to those countries. Continuation of this kind of prosperity requires continuation of the relative gap between developed and underdeveloped countries -- it means keeping poor people poor. Increasingly, the impoverished masses are understanding that the prosperity of the developed countries and of the privileged minorities in their own countries is founded on their poverty."

"American capitalism, based as it is on exploitation of the poor, with its fundamental motivation in personal greed, simply cannot survive without force -- without a secret police force.

Now, more than ever, each of us is forced to make a conscious choice whether to support the system of minority comfort and privilege with all its security apparatus and repression, or whether to struggle for real equality of opportunity and fair distribution of benefits for all of society, in the domestic as well as the international order. It's harder now not to realize that there are two sides, harder not to understand each, and harder not to recognize that like it or not we contribute day in and day out either to the one side or to the other."

A Sampling of Recent Precedents for False Terror Attacks

Operation Himmler

On the night of August 31, 1939 a small group of German operatives led by Naujocks seized the Gleiwitz station and broadcast a message in Polish that urged the Poles living in Silesia to strike against Germans. The Germans' goal was to make the attack and the broadcast look like the work of anti-German Polish saboteurs.

In order to make the attack scene more convincing, the Germans brought in Franciszek Honiok, a German Silesian known for sympathizing with the Poles, who had been arrested the previous day by the Gestapo. Honiok was dressed to look like a saboteur; then killed by lethal injection, given gunshot wounds, and left dead at the scene, so that he appeared to have been killed while attacking the station. His corpse was subsequently presented as proof of the attack to the police and press.

In addition to Honiok, several other convicts were kept available for this purpose. The Germans referred to them by the code phrase "Konserve" ("canned goods"). For this reason some sources incorrectly refer to the incident as "Operation Canned Goods".

At the same time as the Gleiwitz attack there were other incidents orchestrated by Germany along the Polish-German border, such as house torching in the Polish Corridor and spurious propaganda output. The entire project, dubbed Operation Himmler and comprising 21 incidents in all, was intended to give the appearance of Polish aggression against Germany.

On the day following the Gleiwitz attack, 1 September 1939, Germany launched the Fall Weiss operation — the invasion of Poland — initiating World War II in Europe. In a speech in the Reichstag, Adolf Hitler cited the 21 border incidents, with three of them called very serious, as justification for Germany's "defensive" action against Poland.

The Reichstag Fire Empowers Hitler to Seize Dictatorial Power

Just days before the crucial election of March 5th, a fire destroys the main chamber of the Reichstag in Berlin; the Nazis immediately declare that this is the work of the Communists. Minister without Portfolio Hermann Göring shouts to the new Gestapo chief: "This is the beginning of the Communist revolution! We must not wait a minute. We will show no mercy. Every Communist official must be shot, where he is found. Every Communist deputy must this very night be strung up." [The following day Hitler persuaded President von Hindenburg to sign an emergency decree that suspended seven crucial articles of the Constitution: freedom of the person, freedom of expression, freedom to assemble, secrecy of mail and other forms of communication, sanctity of property and of the home as a place of refuge. Trucks of brown-shirted SA (Sturm Abteilung) thugs swarmed over Berlin and the provinces, breaking into homes, and carting victims off to be beaten and tortured. Over four thousand Communist leaders and Social Democrats were arrested, including many members of the Reichstag. The opposition press was closed down, and ten-year prison sentences were given to any person providing news to foreign governments that was "not in the best interests of Germany." Opposition rallies were banned or broken up by bullies; only the Nazis and their Nationalist Party allies were able to campaign unmolested. It was widely believed, in Germany and abroad, that the fire had been set by the Nazis themselves.]

The fire was ostensibly set by Marinus van der Lubbe, a dim-witted Dutch communist who liked to play with matches. He was picked up by the SA after he had been heard boasting in a bar that he would set fire to the Reichstag. They encouraged him with his plans, but first a group of SA men (later eliminated by Hitler in the Night of the Long Knives, 6-30-34) carried quantities of gasoline and self-igniting chemicals through an underground passage from Göring's headquarters to the Reichstag which they scattered in strategic places. At van der Lubbe's trial in Leipzig it was clear that he could not have set such fierce fires and in so many places simultaneously with the meager materials he had brought. He was, nevertheless, convicted and decapitated. Shirer, Rise and Fall, pp. 192-195; Sherwin and Markmann, One Week in March, (1961) pp. 81-83.

Operation Susannah: The Lavon Affair

Israeli Agents Blew up Buildings in Egypt, Planted Evidence Framing Arabs

In July 1954, Israeli Military Intelligence ordered an espionage network of Egyptian Jews it had formed three years earlier to launch "Operation Susannah" -- a campaign to fire bomb the main Alexandria post office, the United States Information Agency offices in Cairo and Alexandria, the Cairo train station, and several movie theaters in Cairo and Alexandria. The saboteurs (today we would call them terrorists, especially if they were Arabs or Muslims acting against Israel or the United States) were quickly apprehended and brought to trial in December 1954. The verdicts and sentences delivered in January 1955 spanned the range of options. Sami (Shmu`el) Azar and Musa (Moshe) Marzuq were sentenced to death along with the Israeli handlers of the network -- John Darling (Avraham Dar) and Paul Frank (Avraham Seidenweg) -- who were not apprehended and tried in absentia. Me'ir Meyuhas and Me'ir Za`fran received seven years in prison. Victor Levy and Philip Natanson were sentenced to fifteen years in prison. Marcelle Ninio and Robert Dassa were condemned to life in prison. Caesar Cohen and Eli Na`im were acquitted. Max Binnet, an Israeli spy apprehended with the network but not directly involved in its operations, committed suicide in jail.

KGB Used a Wave of Bombings to Put (KGB Agent) Putin in Power

The bombing campaign came out of the blue in 1999, just as Boris Yeltsin's tenure was coming to an end. It caused panic and led to calls for vengeance from ordinary Russians.

Mr Putin responded by invading Chechnya later that year and rode a resulting wave of popularity to electoral victory the following spring.

According to critics, who include the exiled tycoon Boris Berezovsky, then a Kremlin insider, the FSB organised the explosions as part of a campaign to create support for their boss.

Senior military and intelligence officers have claimed that a parallel invasion of Dagestan, a southern Russian republic, by Chechen warlord Shamil Basayev, was also tacitly encouraged by the FSB.

"I myself heard tapes of officials from Moscow speaking with Basayev to discuss arrangements for the attack," an FSB officer told The Telegraph. At the time Russians hawks were itching for an excuse to rekindle the war in Chechnya.

When the explosions began, the Kremlin pointed the finger at Chechen rebels who had used terrorist tactics before in their fight to gain independence. But on September 22, 1999, locals in the regional town of Ryazan saw three men emerging from the cellars of a block of flats who later turned out to be FSB officers. When local police checked the cellars they found sacks of high explosive wired up to a detonator.

The FSB later attempted to explain away the incident by claiming that the entire operation had merely been a drill and the explosive was in fact sugar, despite a test that proved the contrary.

In true Soviet style they rewarded the three locals who notified the authorities with colour television sets.

Turkish Government Caught Bombing Their Own, Then Blaming it On a Political Group They Wished to Suppress

The Van Third Criminal Court's decision in the case of the bookstore explosion in Semdinli on November 9, 2005 said that the two noncommissioned officers found guilty of the crime could not have carried out the act without the tacit approval, protection and involvement of more senior officers.

On June 19. the two noncommissioned officers, Ali Kaya and Ozcan Ildeniz, were found guilty and sentenced to serve 39 years and 10 days in prison. The court said the criminal gang responsible could not have been funded or led by the noncommissioned officers. "Those who founded this gang weren't the noncommissioned officers. Without the protection and involvement of senior officers, they could not have carried out these acts."

On November 9, 2005, a bomb exploded in a bookstore in Semdinli, located on the mountainous border with Iraq and Iran in the southeastern province of Hakkari. Authorities initially suspected the terrorist PKK in the attack, but allegations soon surfaced that paramilitary forces may have been involved.

The explosion occurred in a store owned by a former PKK member who had served 15 years in jail for terrorist activities, only a week after a car bomb, blamed on the PKK, injured 23 people in the same town. It was revealed that a series of bombs had exploded in the region for six months leading up to the incident.

The explosion on Nov. 9 killed one and injured five. Locals captured the suspected bomber and two gendarmerie officers who were standing next to a car that apparently belonged to gendarmerie, according to documents seized in the car. An explosive device was found in the car, similar to the one used in the explosion.

The three were turned in to the local police, but the two officers were later released. Hours later, another paramilitary officer fired shots at a protesting crowd, killing one person, as an opposition lawmaker and the local prosecutor examined the crime scene. That officer was immediately arrested.

The Semdinli attack set off days of rioting that left four people dead as well as a flurry of speculation that the security forces could be reverting to summary executions of supporters of the PKK, which were not uncommon in the 1990s when the fight against the terrorist group was at its most intense.

Former Indonesian President Says Government Had Role in the Bombings in Bali

Indonesian police or military officers may have played a role in the 2002 Bali bombing, the country's former president, Abdurrahman Wahid says.

In an interview with SBS's Dateline program, on the third anniversary of the bombing that killed 202 people, Mr Wahid says he has grave concerns about links between Indonesian authorities and terrorist groups.

While he believed terrorists were involved in planting one of the Kuta night club bombs, the second, which destroyed Bali's Sari Club, had been organised by authorities.

Asked who he thought planted the second bomb, Mr Wahid said: "Maybe the police ... or the armed forces."

"The orders to do this or that came from within our armed forces not from the fundamentalist people," he says.

The program also claims a key figure behind the formation of terror group Jemaah Islamiah was an Indonesian spy.

Former terrorist Umar Abduh, who is now a researcher and writer, told Dateline Indonesian authorities had a hand in many terror groups.

"There is not a single Islamic group either in the movement or the political groups that is not controlled by (Indonesian) intelligence," he said.

Abduh has written a book on Teungku Fauzi Hasbi, a key figure in Jemaah Islamiah (JI) who had close contact with JI operations chief Hambali and lived next door to Muslim cleric Abu Bakar Bashir.

He says Hasbi was a secret agent for Indonesia's military intelligence while at the same time a key player in creating JI.

Documents cited by SBS showed the Indonesian chief of military intelligence in 1990 authorised Hasbi to undertake a "special job".

A 1995 internal memo from the military intelligence headquarters in Jakarta included a request to use "Brother Fauzi Hasbi" to spy on Acehese separatists in Indonesia, Malaysia and Sweden.

And a 2002 document assigned Hasbi the job of special agent for BIN, the Indonesian national intelligence agency.

Security analyst John Mempi told SBS that Hasbi, who was also known as Abu Jihad, had played a key role in JI in its early years.

"The first Jemaah Islamiah congress in Bogor was facilitated by Abu Jihad, after Abu Bakar Bashir returned from Malaysia," Mr Mempi said.

"We can see that Abu Jihad played an important role. He was later found to be an intelligence agent. So an intelligence agent has been facilitating the radical Islamic movement."

Hasbi was disembowelled in a mysterious murder in 2003 after he was exposed as a military agent and his son Lamkaruna Putra died in a plane crash last month.

Another convicted terrorist, Timsar Zubil, who set off three bombs in Sumatra in 1978, told the program intelligence agents had given his group a provocative name - Komando Jihad - and encouraged members to commit illegal acts.

"We may have deliberately been allowed to grow," he said.
