To Whom It May Concern:

RE: Scott Bosley

I have been teaching for over two years and have advised a number of students on obtaining real life experience within their field of study. I was able to get to know Mr. Bosley because he made it a point to attend my weekly Visual Basic classes. Mr. Bosley has the tenacity, analytical abilities, and good communications skills that will be asset in his future endeavors.

I was quite impressed by Mr. Bosley's ability to complete all work assigned to him on time, if not before they were due. The level of professionalism that he displayed in class, which appeared in the assignments that he submitted, is unparallel. During the course of the class, Mr. Bosley has proven himself to be an able student, a hard worker and a talented programmer.

Because of Mr. Bosley's attention to detail and relentless effort to know the material prior to each lecture, he was in the top 5% of his class. Mr. Bosley has the analytical skills required to obtain a career in Information Technology.

The only fault I have encountered in him is his retiring nature. His modesty sometimes hides a young man of remarkable strength and broad interests. Overall, Mr. Bosley is a very conscientious and able student. I certainly believe that he has what it takes to make a successful information technology professional someday.
